JUDGMENT.

FLETCHER, J.—This appeal is preferred under clause 15 of the Letters Patent.

The only question involved in the appeal is, what was the market value of certain land compulsorily acquired under the provisions of the Land Acquisition Act.

The land acquired is a hill in the Sonthal Perganas which is called Bahadurpur and Belpahari. It was acquired in connection with the construction of the Lower Ganges Bridge. The value of the land as a quarry was the subject-matter of the enquiry in the proceedings out of which this appeal arises and also was the basis of the argument before us.

The declaration is dated the 9th August 1909.

The Collector awarded Rs. 976-6-0 in respect of the land the subject of the present appeal. The District Judge increased this amount to Rs. 3,125.

On appeal to this Court the appeal came to be heard by Digambar Chatterjee and Beachcroft, JJ. They were divided in their opinion, Digambar Chatterjee, J. was of opinion that the amount awarded by the District Judge ought to be increased to Rs. 8,734-4-0 whilst Beachcroft, J., was of opinion that no ground had been shown for increasing the amount awarded by the District Judge. Before the District Judge as well as before Digambar Chatterjee and Beachcroft, JJ., there were two claimants. The present appellant who was the claimant No. 1 and is the proprietor of the land. The claimant No. 2, Mr. Atkinson, took a lease for 4 years of the property on the 5th August 1908.

The claimant No. 1 alleges that the lease to Atkinson covers only 6 bighas of the property, although the property acquired contains an area of 127 bighas.

Claimant No. 2 before the Collector claimed Rs. 31,00,000. Claimant No. 1 did not make any claim before the Collector as he was not served with notice, but on his application for a reference to the Judge he claimed Rs. 1,60,000. The Collector valued the land in 3 villages at Rs. 1,394-8-0. We are only concerned with the land in 2 villages Banjikand and Shampur and as already mentioned the amount awarded in respect of these 2 villages was Rs. 976-6-0

The Collector relied on a valuation made by Mr. Green, Superintending Engineer to the Government. Foolishly a copy of this valuation was not annexed to the award and for some time the parties were refused a copy of the same. A copy, however, was ultimately given and the claimants do not appear to have been prejudiced in any way by the refusal to supply a copy in the first instance.

Claimant No. 1 has preferred this appeal under clause 15 of the Letters Patent. No appeal has been preferred by claimant No. 2.

In the first place I will deal with the suggestion that was made that the lease to Atkinson comprised only 6 or perhaps 20 bighas. The lease is of the Khaspatil Belpahari hill in Mouza Belpahari excepting lands settled with tenants. The northern boundary is given in the lease as Mouza Banjikand and the southern boundary as Shampur. The lands according to the description in the lease bear the Khasra No. 2 in Mouza Belpahari. The claimant No. 1 produced a khasra Exhibit 2 of Mouza Shampur, which they say is the khasra referred to in the lease. The claimant No. 1 also called a witness Ketabuddin Sheikh who stated that Shampur is also called Belpahari. This witness perhaps by oversight was not cross-examined on this point. But if Shampur and Belpahari are one and the same, the southern boundary as given in the lease of Shampur is not explained. It may be that the khasra referred to in the lease is a false demonstration. The evidence in my opinion does not show that all that Atkinson got under his lease was 6 or 20 bighas. The main point, however, argued on this appeal is as to the amount of compensation to be allowed. The present appeal is valued at Rs. 8,734-4-0, the amount that Digambar Chatterjee, J., thought should be allowed. The valuation of that learned Judge proceeded on this basis. He took the terms of a provisional agreement, dated the 29th of April 1909, as varied on the 28th of May 1909 between Mr. Atkinson and Mr. Gales, the Engineer-in-Chief in charge of the construction of the Lower Ganges Bridge, Under the terms of that agreement the Engineer-in-Chief was to get a lease from Mr. Atkinson of Belpahari up to October 1912, the date when Atkinson's lease from the claimant No. 1 terminated. The terms of the proposed lease were a monthly rent of Rs. 42, a royalty of 7 annas per 100 cubic feet of material removed from the quarry, the minimum amount to be removed being guaranteed at 40,000 cubic feet a month and that the agreement could be determined by the lessee on one month's notice. On this basis Digambar Chatterjee, J., thought that the compensation should be based, on the assumption that this agreement should run untill October 1912 and calculating the minimum amount to be worked a month at the royalty of 7 annas per 100 cubic feet and adding the dead rent he arrived at the figure of Rs. 8,734-4-0.

I am wholly unable to agree with the view of the learned Judge.

The evidence of Mr. Green, which in my opinion is not really challenged, shows that the amount of stone that could be conveniently and profitably worked was 4,81,032 cubic feet.

Suggestions have been made that Mr. Green neglected to take into consideration stone when the overlay was more than 3 feet and also when the stone lay below 15 feet. The evidence does not show that with regard to the land in question Mr. Green's method was inaccurate and it is obvious that a prudent purchaser before he acquired an unopened quarry would consult an expert as to the amount of stone likely to be gotten. There is nothing to suggest that an expert so consulted would have proceeded differently or come to a conclusion other than that arrived at by Mr. Green.

Evidence of what may be the working conditions or the value of stone in other quarries seems to me to be of little or no value. I think the estimate of Mr. Green as to the quantity of stone capable of being worked should be accepted, and as to the rate that should be paid there is no difficulty. The parties agreed upon a rate of 7 annas per 100 cubic feet and this cannot be departed from on the ground that the Government paid in excess of this rate with regard to small quantities either to terminate disputes or to avoid litigation. In the result I think the proper basis of the compensation is the amount of workable stone as estimated by Mr. Green taken at the agreed rate of 7 annas per 100 cubic feet.

On that basis the amount given to the claimants by the learned District Judge is in excess of the value. The present appeal I think, therefore, fails and must be dismissed with costs. Three hundred rupees.

GREAVES, J.—I agree.

SHAMSUL HUDA, J.—I regret I am unable to agree with the majority of the Court in the conclusions arrived at by them. As observed in the case of Harish Chunder Neogy v. Secretary of State for India (1), it is generally necessary in cases of this kind to take two or all the methods of valuation available in order to arrive at a fairly correct valuation. Exact valuation is practically impossible. The approximate market value is all that can be aimed at. In this case three methods of valuation have been discussed before us. The first is the valuation based on Mr. Green's report supported by his evidence in Court. Mr. Green, however, is not an expert in matters of quarrying. He made his valuation on the result of certain trial pits that he dug all over the land at regular intervals. He admitted that he had not before tried this method for the purpose of valuing quarries. Mr. Green's valuation, I may state, was the basis of the Collector's award. The District Judge, however, did not accept his valuation, as he considered the royalty of 4 annas per hundred cubic feet of stone was too low. In this Court Mr. Justice D. Chatterjee did not accept his valuation also and Mr. Justice Beachcroft was not wholly satisfied with it. "It may be," says Mr. Justice Beachcroft, "that in fact Mr. Green has under-estimated or over-estimated the quantity of workable stone. But that is not the point. The question is, would a prospective purchaser, apart from the question of low rates, have come to much the same conclusion." I am unable to accept Mr. Green's estimate for two main reasons. In the first place, Mr. Green only valued stone that could be reached within 3 feet of the surface and he also did not take into account any stone below a depth of 15 feet. In this respect the other expert witnesses are not in accord with him. For instance in regard to the overlay of more than 3 feet, Mr. Martin, the first witness for the Secretary of State, said that it would pay to remove about 5 or 6 feet of earth unless one struck solid stone; and regarding the depth up to which a quarry can be worked, Mr. Edward, Executive Engineer of State Railways of India, who had actual experience of quarrying at Belpahar, being in charge of the quarries for over a year, says that in his experience it does not pay to work down more than 15 or 20 feet on a slope such as Belpahar. I think, therefore, Mr. Green's estimate is an under-valuation and should not be accepted.

The second method of valuation is based on the lease granted to Atkinson, the claimant No. 2, by the claimant No. 1, dated the 5th August 1908. It seems that Atkinson had taken a lease for some land in Belpahar for four years at a rental of Rs. 250 a year, the whole of which amount, namely, Rs. 1,000 was paid in advance. The difficulty in basing a conclusion on this lease has arisen from the uncertainty regarding the quantity of land covered by it. It has been contended on behalf of the appellant that this lease covered an area of 6 bighas only as it is expressly stated in the lease to belong to khasra No. 2. It appears from Exhibit 2 that khasra No. 2 of Mouza Shampur has an area of 6 bighas and 5 cottas only. It has, however, been contended on behalf of the Secretary of State that Shampur is different from Belpahar, and that, therefore, Exhibit 2, the khasra of Shampur, gives no indication of the quantity of land covered by the lease. As has been pointed out by Mr. Justice D. Chatterjee, the first witness examined on behalf of the first party stated in the very boginning of his examination-in-chief, "I know the Bandi Khord and Sham-pur Mahal. Shampur is also known as Belpahari", and there was no cross examination on the point. I cannot think that the statement like this would have gone unchallenged if it were untrue. Assuming, however, that the lease covered the whole of the waste land of the mouzah, as pointed out by Mr. Justice D. Chatterjee, it would cover an area of 20 bighas. It was, however, claimed by claimant No. 2 that the lease covered the entire area of the mouzah, but it is clear that his lease was in respect of the Khaspalit hill excepting the settled land and lands cultivated by tenants. On the footing of the lease covering an area of 20 bighas, the rent for 4 years of 127 bighas would amount to Rs. 6,350. It is not, however, shown that four years' quarrying by Atkinson would have exhausted the entire quantity of stone and left the property wholly valueless. All that can be said on the basis of this lease is that the value should in no case be less than Rs. 6,350.

The third basis of valuation is the provisional agreement between claimant No. 2 and the Engineer-in Chief of the Lower Ganges Bridge. By that lease the lessee agreed to pay to Atkinson for Belpahar a rental of Rs. 42 per annum for the period from April 1909 to October 1912. Three other mouzahs were also included in this lease on similar terms with a difference in the rent. When the Secretary of State took possession in December 1909 the lease had 35 months yet to run. If that lease had been in force under its terms as subsequently varied, Atkinson would have received for Belpahari Rs 42 into 35 = Rs 1470 as rent and royalty calculated on a minimum quantity of 40,000 cubic feet of stone per month at the rate of 7 annas per hundred cubic feet, which would have amounted to Rs. 6,125, the whole amounting to Rs. 7,595. The only question as to the acceptance of this basis is that the lease was terminable on a month's notice. No doubt the lessee guarded himself against contingencies by this special provision, but there is nothing to show that such an option was at all likely to be exercised by the lessee. It is noticeable that in accordance with the terms of the provisional lease a formal lease was subsequently executed in respect of the three other mouzahs. When the evidence in Court was being recorded, the term of the lease of the three mouzahs had expired and yet there is not a word in the evidence to suggest that as regards those mouzahs the option had to be exercised in any case and I have no reason to think that the term of the provisional lease, namely, the period from April 1909 to October 1912 did not represent an expectation on the part of the lessee to continue quarrying till the end of the lease. The reason why Belpahar had to be acquired, instead of being held in lease like the other three mouzahs, was that there was a defect in the title of the lessor. That, however, does not affect the present question. The valuation on this basis is strongly supported by the valuation based on Atkinson's lease of 5th August 1905, the difference between Rs. 6,350 and 7,595 being accounted for by the chance of some value being still left in the quarries at the end of Atkinson's lease, which there is nothing to negative. I would, therefore, agree with the valuation arrived at by Mr. Justice D. Chatterjee and decree accordingly.

Appeal dismissed.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O XXI, rr. 43, 54, 55—Attachment of property, order for, after hearing judgment-debtor's objections—Application, subsequent, for raising attachment, maintainability of.

Where an order for attachment of the judgment-debtor's property is passed after hearing his objections, the order is conclusive and debars the judgment-debtor from raising other objections in the same proceedings. [p. 5, col. 2.]

Mungul Pershad Dihcit v. Grija Kant Lahiri, 8 C. 51; 11 C. L. R. 113; 8 I. A. 123; 4 Sar. P. C. J. 249; 4 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 32, followed.

Appeal against the order of the Court of the Temporary Subordinate Judge, Cocanada, in Appeal Suit No. 47 of 1916, preferred against the order of the Court of the District Munsif, Peddapur, in Execution Petition No. 3231 of 1915, in Original Suit No. 264 of 1905.

FACTS.—Respondent, in execution of a decree obtained by him against the appellant, attached the latter's property. The order for attachment was passed by the Court after notice to the judgment debtor and after disallowing his objection that the decree was satisfied. The appellant subsequently filed an application praying that the attachment might be raised on various grounds. The Court refused to raise the attachment and the judgment-debtor applied against that order, first to the lower Appellate Court and then to the High Court.

Mr. G. Venkatramiah, for the Appellant.—The attachment has been ordered without considering the available pleas of the appellant. The Court did not discuss or decide on the question of limitation. It is open to the judgment debtor to move for the raising of the attachment.

Mr. P. Narayanmoorthy, for the Respondent.—The order has been passed after notice to the judgment-debtor. He raised the plea that the decree was satisfied and, consequently, that there could be no attachment. The Court negatived his contention, and passed an order for attachment. The order has become final and it is no more open to the judgment-debtor to question it by fresh objections in the same proceeding.

Mr. G. Venkatramiah was heard in reply.

JUDGMENT.—We can dispose of this appeal on only one of the grounds in the appeal memo., the fifth, and we, therefore, express no opinion on the others.

The order under appeal is one refusing to raise the attachment of the property of the defendant-appellant in execution of respondent's decree. The appeal has been resisted on the ground that appellant had notice to appear on 14th August 1915 and show cause against the attachment and that he appeared accordingly, but that the Court after considering his contention, that the decree was satisfied, made an order for attachment which, it is contended, debars him from subsequent objection on any ground. There is no doubt regarding the facts: and following Mungul Pershad Dichit v. Grija Kant Lahiri (1), we must hold that the order was conclusive. Argument to the contrary has been based on the fact that the order was passed without reference to the plea of limitation now relied on and in fact without its being submitted to the Court. We do not think it necessary to go through the authorties cited to show that, in such circumstances, the propriety of the order can be questioned by a subsequent petition, because they all relate to attempts to question it in subsequent distinct proceedings, suits or execution petitions, not as here in the same proceeding at a later date. To allow appellant's contention would deprive the decision reached at any particular stage in an execution proceeding of finality and enable the judgment-debtor to protract that proceeding indefinitely. Law and convenience being against him, the appeal must fail. The respondent, however, has succeeded on a point not taken in the lower Courts. We, therefore, dismiss the appeal but in the circumstances without costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Mr. S. N. Banerjee and Babu Probodh Kumar Dass, for the Appellant.

Babu Hiralal Chakrabutty, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

FLETCHER, J.—This is an appeal by the defendant No. 1 against the judgment of the learned Subordinate Judge of Darjeeling, dated the 2nd March 1915, decreeing the plaintiff's suit. The plaintiff brought his suit on the allegation that he was the adopted son of a deceased Hindu of the Maheswari caste of Bikaneer—the name of the person who had adopted being Amar Chand Karnani—and he sought to recover from Mathura Das Karnani and others, who were the natural relations of the deceased Amar Chand Karnani, a certain property and for consequential relief by way of accounts and discovery. The case set up by the plaintiff was that there was a Hindu of the Maheswari caste called Swairam Karnani. He had three sons, Katchi Das who was the father of Mathuradas, the defendant No. 1, Amar Chand Kernani the adoptive father of the plaintiff, and Jaithrupa who was the husband of the defendant No. 3. The plaint alleged that Amar Chand had been adopted by one Gangadas and, therefore, according to the ordinary rules of the Hindu Law, Amar Chand ceased on that adoption to be a member of the family of Swairam and passed into the family of Ganga Das. That allegation was made distinctly in the pedigree that formed a portion of the plaint and it was not traversed in the written statement nor in the course of the trial. It is, therefore, an admitted fact that Amar Chand passed out of the family of Swairam and passed into the family of Ganga Das. No evidence was offered as to who Ganga Das was. There has been a suggestion made in reply that Ganga Das was some sort of relation of Swairam and that, therefore, although Amar Chand in his adoption passed out of the family of Swairam, it does not follow that the other sons of Swairam, who remained joint with their father, ceased to be the reversionary heirs of Amar Chand on his death. That case was not made or suggested in the course of the proceeding and it is much too late in the course of the reply to put forward a case unsupported by any evidence or any statement made in the Court below.

Now, the facts are these—and these facts are not disputed. The three sons of Swairam had built up a business in the district of Darjeeling. Katchi Das, the eldest son, died in 1880 and his only son and heir is the defendant No. 1. Jaithrupa died in 1888 leaving his widow the defendant No. 3. Amar Chand died in 1899 after having been adopted by Ganga Das, leaving him surviving his widow the defendant No. 2. The business after the death of Amar Chand was carried on by the 1st defendant. There were some disputes between the defendant No. 1 and the widow of Amar Chand, the defendant No. 2, in the year 1903 and apparently her remittances that she had been accustomed to get from the business in Darjeeling were stopped. She then went to Darjeeling and there the parties arrived at certain agreements which were reduced in writing, the agreements being dated the 21st April 1903. Under the terms of those agreements, a sum of Rs. 7,500 was deposited with certain Marwari bankers, the interest being payable to the defendant No. 2 for her maintenance and the capital sum to go to the defendant No. 1 on the death of the defendant No. 2. The documents seem to me to have been quite clearly executed on the footing that the defendant No. 1 would on the death of the defendant No. 2 become entitled to the estate of the deceased Amar Chand Karnani. The agreements do not seem to have put an end to the disputes between the parties, and in 1903 the defendant No 2 is said to have adopted the plaintiff as the adopted son of her deceased husband Amar Chand Karnani.

The main controversy in this case has turned on the question as to whether the evidence establishes the case that the plaintiff was duly adopted. Both parties admitted that the parties were governed by the Mitakshara School of Hindu Law. The learned Counsel for the defendant-appellant in opening the appeal asserted that the admission meant that the rights of the parties were regulated by the Benares School of Hindu Law. But after consideration of the evidence the learned Counsel was bound to admit that the evidence established important variations applicable to the parties which were not in accordance with the opinion held by the Benares School of Hindu Law. It is quite true that he did not admit that the rights of adoption applicable to the parties were different to those laid down by the Benares School of Hindu Law; but he was bound to admit that in certain particulars the rights of the parties in this case were shown to be different from those prevailing in the Benares School of Hindu Law. It seems to me that that is an important fact, because you at once get rid of the suggestion put forward that the admission meant that the parties were governed by the Benares School of Hindu Law simpliciter because it is admitted that there were variations from that. The Mitakshara as varied from the Benares School applies in a large portion of India. It applies in Bombay, Western India and Southern India, and in all those different Schools of Law there are variations of Mitakshara not consistent with the view adopted in the Benares School. It seems to me quite clear in the present case that the admission did not amount to a statement that the rights of the parties as to adoption could be ascertained from the principles held by the Benares School of Hindu Law. If you get to that, you have got to look at the evidence. The evidence that has been given in this case as to what is requisite for a valid adoption is not the evidence of learned persons but the evidence of shop keepers, Marwaris being largely a trading caste. These shopkeepers, it may be said, do not know the principles of the Hindu Law, but the evidence shows without doubt that these shopkeepers have undergone the process of adoption, as many as four times. The evidence also shows that the ceremonies required for a valid adoption by a person belonging to this class are not formal. The evidence is that on the adoption of a boy the guests and relations receive cocoanuts and sweets and the adopted son has got to have payjama placed on his head. These seem to be the only ceremonies that are requisite for a valid adoption. The adoption is not also limited, according to the evidence, to the case of children of tender age. There may be an adoption, as in this case, of a person of full age and it does not matter whether that person is married or not. That is the evidence in this case and the learned Judge says that the custom seems to be the same as that obtaining in Bombay or in Western India. It has been suggested that the learned Judge of the Court below stated that the law as applicable in the Presidency of Bombay applied in the State of Bikaneer. I do not read the judgment of the learned Judge in that way. I think what he remarks is that the evidence shows that the law as to adoption is the same in Bikaneer as in Western India.

Then, the question was whether the consent of the relatives was necessary. That seems to be the point that was debated not only in the Court below but also in the suit in the Bikaneer Court, and the view that was taken was this: That this was not the case of a widow adopting a son to introduce him into the family consisting of the defendants, but it was the case of a widow of a separated brother who, although she had no authority from her husband to adopt, had adopted of her own motion the plaintiff. That seems to have been the case put forward. Then the learned Judge came to the conclusion that that case had been established in accordance with the custom prevailing in Bombay and Western India. The evidence, it is quite true, is not all one way; there are statements made by the witnesses on both sides. But the learned Judge had the opportunity of seeing the witnesses in the witness-box and remarking who were the most intelligent and also the truthful witnesses amongst them, and he came to the conclusion that this custom had been satisfactorily established. There does not seem to be any reason to disagree with the conclusion arrived at by the learned Judge of the Court below.

The next question that was raised was as to whether the adoption had or had not been made. That does not seem to have been seriously contested in the Court below. The widow, that is, the defendant No. 2 who adopted the plaintiff, states in her deposition that the child was given to her by his natural father and received by her in adoption and there do not seem, according to the evidence, to be any other ceremonies required beyond those observed in this particular case.

Then reference has been made to the proceedings of the Court at Bikaneer and it is said that the adoption cannot have taken place on the date alleged by the plaintiff. I do not read the proceedings of the Court at Bikaneer in the way that the learned Counsel for the appellant has attempted to read them. The proceeding originated out of an application by the widow for what is called a khola, that is, a certificate of adoption. That is a certificate of the Court at Bikaneer that the widow has, in fact, adopted the plaintiff as a son to her deceased husband, Amar Chand. On that application being made for certificate, the present defendant No. 1, that is, the plaintiff in the Bikaneer Court, brought a suit for an injunction to restrain the widow, that is, the adoptive mother of the present plaintiff from proceeding on the footing of the adoption, for the reason that by the deeds of 1903 the widow had precluded herself from making an adoption of any person, and the grounds so far as I can gather from the judgment of the Judges of the Chief Court at Bikaneer were these:—That the deeds executed in 1903 operated as a release by the widow of Amar Chand of her interest in the property so as to accelerate the estate of the defendant No. 1 Muthura Das, so that he having taken an absolute interest in the estate of Amar Chand, the widow was incapable of making an adoption so as to defeat him of the rights in the properties he had acquired. The case came on before one of the Munsifs in the State and he decided one of the issues against the present defendant No. 1. On appeal to the Sudder Nizamut of the State, the Judge of that Court held that the appropriate fee payable to the State on the plaint not having been paid the suit must fail. On appeal to the Chief Court, the learned Judges of that Court disagreeing with the view of the Judge of the Sudder Nizamut held that the plaint was properly stamped but they came to the conclusion that there was nothing in the deeds to prevent the widow of Amar Chand from proceeding to adopt the present plaintiff. That, so far as I gather from the judgment of the Chief Court at Bikaneer, was the matter in dispute there. After the determination of that litigation, the khola, that is, the certificate of adoption, was issued by the State to the widow of Amar Chand. This is the fact, so far as it can be ascertained from the judgments of the Courts at Bikaneer.

It is said in this case that the plaintiff asked the Court to set aside the deeds of 1903 on the ground that they had been obtained by fraud or undue influence. The learned Judge of the primary Court came to the conclusion that there was no fraud or undue influence. That seems to be clearly correct because there is no evidence of either fraud or undue influence having been exercised by the defendant No. 1 in obtaining the deeds. Then the learned Judge remarks that the deeds would appear to show that the parties had entered into them on the footing of a common mistake, because they had been entered into by the widow of Amar Chand and the present appellant on the footing that the present appellant was the sole reversionary heir to the estate of his natural brother Amar Chand. But the learned Judge says that it is an admitted fact that Amar Chand had passed out of the family on his adoption by Ganga Das and that, therefore, the deeds could not be by way of a family arrangement, as the appellant before us was not a member of the same family as the deceased Amar Chand. He, therefore, came to the conclusion that as against the plaintiff, the adopted son of Amar Chand, the deeds could not be set up as a bar to his rights to Amar Chand's properties that he would acquire on his adoption. That, I think, is right. The evidence in this case, as we have it, shows quite clearly that it is an admitted fact that Amar Chand passed out of the family of which the present appellant is a member into the family of Ganga Dass. There is nothing on the record to suggest that Ganga Dass was a close or any relation of Swairam, the grandfather of the appellant, so that on the death of Amar Chand his reversionary heir would be his brother's son Mathura Das, the present defendant No. 1. That is the case that has been suggested in reply, but there is not a word to support such an allegation on the record. It seems to me quite clear in this case that these deeds entered into by the widow only with reference to her maintenance cannot be set up as deeds of family arrangement between the members of the family then in existence barring the rights of the adopted son, the plaintiff in the present suit. If that is so, the plaintiff is entitled to recover the share of Amar Chand and the learned Judge of the Court below has decreed to the plaintiff relief in that form. No objection has been raised or urged that the form of the relief that the learned Subordinate Judge has given to the plaintiff is incorrect, nor is it suggested that the finding that the learned Judge has arrived at, namely, that the plaintiff is entitled on his adoption to $\frac{2}{3}$rd of the properties is wrong. If that is so, I think there are no reasons to come to any conclusion different from that arrived at by the learned Judge of the Court below, namely, that the plaintiff having proved that he was duly adopted by the widow of Amar Chand as a son to her deceased husband is not barred by the deeds of April 1903 from recovering the property of the deceased Amar Chand.

A point has been made in this case that there is a decision reported somewhere in some of the unauthorized reports (27 Indian Cases*) of the Chief Court in the Punjab to the effect that an adoption of this sort amongst Maheswari Hindus is not permitted. The case does not establish anything of the sort. In that case, it was stated that one of the widows in a joint and unseparated Hindu family had attempted to adopt without the consent of the kinsmen a son into the joint family. That is a totally different case from the case of a widow of a separated brother adopting of her own motion a son to her deceased husband, as in the present case.

I think the conclusion arrived at by the learned Subordinate Judge of Darjeeling was correct. The present appeal, therefore, fails and must be dismissed with costs.

PUNJAB CHIEF COURT.

FIRST CIVIL APPEAL No. 143 OF 1915.

December 17, 1917.

Present:—Mr. Justice Shah Din and Mr. Justice Scott Smith.

ALLAH YAR—PLAINTIFF—APPELLANT

THAKAR DAS AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Mortgage—Lekha mukhi mortgage—Redemption, suit for—Failure of mortgagee to keep full and regular accounts, effect of Presumption—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908, O XXII, r. 4—Death of respondent—Application for bringing legal representative on record not made within limitation—Appellant living at great distance from respondent—Sufficient cause—Limitation Act IX of 1908, s. 5

In a suit for redemption of a lekha mukhi mortgage, the question of the liability of the mortgagor and the mortgagees inter se was referred to a Local Commissioner, who found that the mortgagees did not keep full and regular accounts of the income and expenditure of the land in suit and who, therefore, based his report on the statement of the mortgagees' daubir:

Held, (1) that it was the duty of the mortgagees to keep full and regular accounts of the income and expenditure of the mortgaged land; [p. 11, col. 1.]

(2) that in view of their failure to keep such accounts every presumption should be made against them; [p 11, col. 2.]

(3) that the report of the local Commissioner based on the statement of the mortgagees' own daubir must be accepted as correct. [p. 12, col. 1.]

One of the respondents in an appeal died on the 7th April 1915. An application to bring his legal representative on the record was not made till the 3rd December. It appeared from the affidavit of the appellant that the deceased lived in Multan City while the appellant himself lived in a village in Muzaffargarh District and that, therefore, he did not know of the death of the respondent till shortly before he made the application:

Held, that the appellant had sufficient cause for not making the application within the prescribed period of limitation. [p. 10, col. 1.]

Appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Multan, dated the 12th October 1914, decreeing the claim on payment by the plaintiff of the sum of Rs. 7,200 to defendants.

The Hon'ble Mr. Muhammad Shafi, for the Appellant.

ALLAH YAR v. THAKAR DAS.

Bakhshi Tek Chand, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The learned Pleader for the respondents has urged as a preliminary objection that since one of the respondents, Sukha Nand, died on the 7th April 1915 and no application to bring his legal representatives on the record was made till after the expiry of more than six months from that date, the appeal has abated. From the affidavit, which the appellant filed in support of his application, dated the 3rd December 1915, it appears that Sukha Nand deceased lived in Multan City, while the appellant lives in a village in the Muzaffargarh District, and, therefore, did not know of the death of Sukha Nand until shortly before he made the application of the 3rd December. We think that the appellant had sufficient cause for not making the application of the 3rd December within the prescribed period of limitation and we, therefore, set aside the abatement, and overrule the preliminary objection.

This appeal has arisen out of a suit brought on the 13th October 1912 by plaintiff-appellant against the defendants-respondents for possession, by redemption, of 2·37 kanals 8 marlas of land, situate at Khera Shahamad in the District of Multan, which was mortgaged with possession to the defendants-respondents other than Sheikh Abdul Hakim by a registered mortgage-deed, dated the 12th March 1896 (Exhibit P 2), for a sum of Rs. 7,500. One of the original mortgagees was one Kaura Malik, who had advanced to the mortgagor Rs. 6,000 out of the mortgage money; a few years after the date of mortgage he transferred his rights to Sheikh Abdul Hakim, and the latter has, therefore, been sued by the plaintiff as a mortgagee in possession. In his plaint the plaintiff alleged that the whole of the mortgage money Rs. 7,500 had been paid off from the produce of the mortgaged land, and that in fact on a proper settlement of accounts it would be found that the mortgagees had realised from the produce a larger amount than was due to them on account of the principal mortgage money and the interest due thereon and the expenses incurred by them, and the plaintiff, therefore, claimed a decree for possession of the mortgaged property without payment of any money and for recovery of the surplus amount, if any, that may be found due to him from the mortgagees according to the lekha mukhi accounts. In their written jawab-i-dawa, dated the 10th November 1912, the mortgagees pleaded, inter alia, that besides the principal mortgage money, Rs. 7,500, a sum of Rs. 7,794-13-9 was due to them by the mortgagor on account of interest and lagat under the terms of the mortgage-deed, and that the total amount of the charge on the land was, therefore, Rs. 15,294-13-9, without payment of which amount the plaintiff was not entitled to redeem the mortgage. Upon the pleadings of the parties the District Judge framed seven issues, which are printed at pages 105 and 106 of the paper-book. Of those issues the last three are the most important, as in view of the arguments advanced before us at the hearing, it has become wholly unnecessary to record any decision on the first four issues.

The District Judge appointed Mehta Tek Chand, Pleader, as local Commissioner to examine the account books of the mortgagees and to submit a report regarding the income and expenditure of the mortgaged land during the currency of the mortgage. Mehta Tek Chand submitted his report on the 2nd January 1914, which is printed at pages 123 to 127 of the paper-book. The District Judge also appointed another local Commissioner, Munshi Abdul Rahman, for inquiry and report regarding issues Nos. 5, 6 and 7 (page 106 of the paper-book), and Munshi Abdul Rahman submitted his report on the 25th January 1914 (pages 131 and 132 of the paper-book). On the 22nd January 1914 the mortgagees filed objections to the report of Mehta Tek Chand, and on the 2nd March 1914 they also filed objections to Munshi Abdul Rahman's report. Munshi Abdul Rahman was examined in Court as a witness on the 17th June 1914 (pages 139 and 140), and Mehta Tek Chand was similarly examined on the 23rd June 1914 (pages 143 and 144). On the 12th October 1914 the District Judge delivered his judgment by which he gave the plaintiff a decree for redemption of the land in suit on payment of Rs. 7,200 by the end of November 1914 and directed the parties to pay their own costs.

The plaintiff has appealed to this Court and in support of his appeal the principal contention advanced by [illegible] Counsel is that since the District Judge has held that the mortgagees, who had held possession of the mortgaged land under a lekha mukhi mortgage, had not kept full and proper accounts of the produce realised by them, every presumption should be made against them, and that, therefore, the District Judge should have accepted the report of Munshi Abdul Rahman, based as it is on the statement of the mortgagees' own daubir Sewa Ram that during the seventeen years that the mortgagees had held possession of the land the estimated value of the produce realised by them amounted to Rs. 36,325-15-9. According to that report, it has been contended by the learned Counsel, the mortgage money, together with interest due thereon and the amount of the expenditure legitimately incurred by the mortgagees under the terms of the deed of mortgage, have been paid off out of the produce of the land and a considerable surplus is due to the mortgagor from the mortgagees, for which he should be given a decree in this case.

The first and most important question for consideration is whether the mortgagees had kept full and regular accounts of the income and expenditure of the land as they were bound to do under their lekha mukhi mortgage. On this point the report of Mehta Tek Chand is clear and his conclusion has been accepted by the District Judge. The District Judge says in his judgment at page 147: "Tek Chand's report as to accounts is clear and well reasoned. No accounts are forthcoming for the first four years after the mortgage, as they were with the previous mortgagees from whom the defendants, to whom the mortgage was assigned, have derived their title. The books of accounts produced by the mortgagees defendants are not regularly kept, and no daily balances are struck in them. An entry in such books can be made at any time and they carry no presumption of correctness as attaches to regular books of accounts."

The learned Counsel for the mortgagor strongly relies on the above finding recorded by the District Judge and urges that in view of that finding and according to the uniform current of decisions of this Court and of the High Courts, every presumption should have been made against the mortgagees and that his client was entitled to get credit for the income which could have been derived from the mortgaged land by the highest estimate. The mortgagees' own daubir Sewa Ram was examined by Munshi Abdul Rahman, local Commissioner, and his statement is printed at page 130. Munshi Abdul Rahman says in his report (page 131): "The parties have not produced before me any proof in respect of the rates of produce. Papers relating to the income of produce from 21 harvests, i. e., from kharif 1902 to kharif 1912, were prepared and the rate was charged according to the statement of Sewa Ram, daubir of the defendants. According to these papers, after deduction of expenses on kamins and fodder for bullocks Rs. 21,936-15-9 on account of the mahsul of produce is realised for 21 harvests, and Rs. 500 on account of mahsul bhusa, the estimate whereof has been made, according to the statement of the defendants' daubir Sewa Ram, at the rate of 4 annas per maund of wheat, the total of which comes up to Rs. 22,436-15-9. As regards the calculation of income of the remaining 13 harvests, there are no other means but that it may be made in proportion to the income of the above mentioned 21 harvests, which amounts to Rs. 22,436-15-9. According to this proportion, the estimate of the income of 13 harvests comes up to Rs. 13,889. Adding them to Rs. 22,436-15-9 on account of the income of 21 harvests, the estimate of income of 34 harvests in suit comes up to Rs. 36,325-15-9." The mortgagor's learned Counsel has laid great stress on this part of Munshi Abdul Rahman's report, and has strongly urged that, in view of the absence of proper and regular accounts which the mortgagees were in law bound to keep, his client is entitled to take credit to the extent of Rs. 36,325-15-9 as the value of the produce that must be presumed to have been taken by the mortgagees during the period of their possession of the mortgaged land. It is further contended that since Munshi Abdul Rahman has, in his statement in Court, fully supported his report which has not been shown to have been based upon wrong data, there is no reason whatever for not accepting that report in full. This part of Munshi Abdul Rahman's report is based on a detailed statement prepared by him according to the rates given by Sewa Ram, daubir of the mortgagees, which statement, though not printed on account of its great length, is on the record of the District Judge and constitutes a valuable piece of evidence in support of the plaintiff's claim. Nothing was brought out in the evidence of Munshi Abdul Rahman in Court to show that the statement prepared by him was in any particular erroneous.

It will be seen from Munshi Abdul Rahman's report that he also prepared an estimate of the income of 21 harvests according to the jhar bandobast and that according to that estimate the income of the produce, after necessary deductions, comes up to Rs. 15,283-15-0. Calculated on the above basis, the estimate of the income of 34 harvests amounts to Rs. 26,850-3-6. In dealing with Munshi Abdul Rahman's report the District Judge has accepted the estimated income according to the jhar bandobast from the produce of 21 harvests as a more reliable figure than the estimated income of the same number of harvests according to the statement of the mortgagee's daubir Sewa Ram, which amounts to Rs. 22,436-15-9. The District Judge has also set off the expenditure of the first four years of the mortgage against the income of the land during the same period, and calculating the estimated income for the remaining thirteen years or 26 harvests on the basis of the jhar bandobast he has arrived at the conclusion that the mortgagees must be taken to have realised an income of Rs. 18,922-11-0 from the produce of the land during the entire period of their possession. According to him, the total amount of money which the mortgagees are entitled to recover from the mortgagor up to kharif 1912 comes to Rs. 26,200-14-6; and deducting from this figure the sum of Rs. 18,922-11 0 above referred to as the estimated income of 26 harvests, he finds that the balance due to the mortgagees is Rs. 7,278-13-6 (page 148 of the paper-book). The District Judge further holds that during the two years from the rabi 1913 to kharif 1914, i. e., the period during which the suit was pending in his Court, the income derived by the mortgagees exceeded the amount due to them by the mortgagor on account of interest, land revenue and other expenses by Rs. 92. He accordingly held that a round sum of Rs. 7,200 was due by the mortgagor to the mortgagees at the end of kharif 1914.

In our opinion there is great force in the contention advanced by the mortgagor's learned Counsel that the estimated income of the land for the period of seventeen years during which the mortgagees have been in possession, as based on the statement of their daubir Sewa Ram, should be accepted as more reliable than the estimated income based on the jhar bandobast, especially in view of the fact that the mortgagees have omitted to keep full and regular accounts of the income and expenditure of the land. But even if this contention be not accepted in its entirety, we fail to understand why the District Judge has not accepted the estimated income according to jhar bandobast for the full period of seventeen years during which the mortgagees have been in possession, and which, according to the report of Munshi Abdul Rahman, comes to Rs. 26,853-3 6. Since no accounts of the income and expenditure are forthcoming for the first four years of the mortgage, every presumption must be made against the mortgagees, and it is not right to counterbalance the expenditure against the income during that period, for the gist of Munshi Abdul Rahman's report is that the income derived from the land was much more than the amount of interest due on the mortgage money and the expenditure incurred by the mortgagees in possession. The case is one in which it is impossible to be mathematically accurate in defining the respective liabilities of the mortgagor and the mortgagees in terms of the amounts of money due by each party to the other, and the result must be based on rough calculations. After giving the matter our best consideration, we have come to the conclusion that the one thing which is clear and established on the record is that the mortgagees have, during the period of their possession of the mortgaged property, derived an amount of produce the value of which is at least equal to the total amount of money to which the mortgagees are entitled under their lekha mukhi mortgage of the 12th March 1896.

Upon this finding the plaintiff-appellant is entitled to a decree for possession by redemption of the mortgaged land without payment of any money. We accordingly accept this appeal and in modification of the decree of the District Judge grant a decree in the above terms. The mortgagees will pay the costs of the mortgagor in both Courts.

Appeal accepted.

Execution - Assignment of decree—Question whether assignee real or ostensible transferee, whether can be decided in execution proceedings—Pleader and client—Pleader for judgment-debtor purchasing decree, effect of—Judgment-debt, whether satisfied.

N took an assignment of a mortgage-decree and applied to the execution Court to have her name substituted in the place of the decree-holder The judgment-debtors lodged an objection to the effect that N was not the real assignee of the decree, but that her husband, who was the Pleader for the judgment-debtors in the execution case, was the real purchaser of the decree, and that the effect of the purchase of the decree by the Pleader for the judgment-debtors was to satisfy the decree and to discharge the judgment-debtors:

Held, that the Pleader was not and could not be a party to the execution case and no question could consequently be decided as between him and his wife as to who was the beneficial owner of the decree. [p 14, col. 2.]

That the effect of the purchase of a decree by the Pleader for the judgment-debtors is not to satisfy the decree and to release the judgment-debtors from their liability, although the Pleader holds the decree assigned to him in trust for his clients, and, if called upon by his client to do so, is bound to assign the decree to him. No Court will, however, decree such a re-conveyance except upon equitable terms. [p. 15, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal against an order in an execution case to the effect that the decree must be considered as satisfied and the judgment-debtors fully discharged The events which have led up to this order are not in controversy at this stage. On 19th February 1907, Rani Mrinalini, wife of Raja Narendra Lal Khan of Narajole, obtained a consent decree in a mortgage suit against the respondents. There were various proceedings in execution, which need not be recited for our present purpose. On the 15th February 1915, the present appellant, Nagendra Bala Dassi, applied to the execution Court to have her name substituted in the place of the decree-holder, on the allegation that she had taken an assignment of the decree on the 7th February 1915. On the 20th February 1915, the original decree-holder intimated to the Court that she had transferred the decree and had no objection to the grant of the application. The judgment-debtors took time to put in objections, but as they did not enter appearance on the day fixed, the name of the appellant was duly substituted and execution was directed to proceed at her instance. Four of the judgment-debtors subsequently applied to the Court to reconsider the matter, and their application was granted. Thereupon, they lodged an objection to the effect that the appellant had not really taken an assignment of the decree, but that her husband Babu Nabakumar Hazra, who was the Pleader for the judgment-debtors in the execution case, was the purchaser of the decree and had put forward his wife as the ostensible transferee. The Subordinate Judge then proceeded to determine the question, whether Nagendra Bala Dasi or Babu Nabakumar Hazra had taken an assignment of the decree and came to the conclusion that the Pleader had purchased the decree with his own money. The Subordinate Judge also found that the assignment had been taken for Rs. 11,500, while a much larger sum was due under the decree. The Subordinate Judge next proceeded to consider what he calls the legal and equitable aspect of this transaction and held that the effect of the purchase of the decree by the Pleader for the judgment-debtors was to satisfy the decree and to discharge the judgment-debtors. Nagendra Bala Dassi has now appealed to this Court, and on her behalf the decision of the Subordinate Judge has been assailed substantially on two grounds, namely, first, that the evidence does not establish that she was not the real purchaser of the decree, assuming that the question can be raised in execution proceedings, and secondly, that the decree cannot be treated as extinguished even if it be found that her husband had made the purchase with his own money. We are of opinion that the order of the Subordinate Judge cannot possibly be supported.

In the first place, the Subordinate Judge has decided the question of the reality of the assignment of the decree to the appellant, as if her husband were a party to the present proceedings. The Pleader, however, is not and could not be a party to the execution proceedings, and no question could consequently be decided as between him and his wife as to who was the beneficial owner of the decree.

In the second place, even if it were assumed that the Pleader had taken an assignment of the decree (which we do not decide upon the evidence), it is plain that the decree could not be deemed as extinguished and the judgment-debtors treated as fully discharged. The Subordinate Judge has not correctly appreciated the law applicable to cases of this character. It is well settled that while the relation of Pleader and client continues, the Pleader cannot as against his client acquire absolutely a beneficial interest in or title to the subject-matter of the litigation antagonistic to that of his client; in the language of the framers of section 88 of the Indian Trusts Act, 1882, a legal adviser, who under such circumstances gains a pecuniary advantage, must hold for the benefit of his client the advantage so gained. The reason for this rule is obvious; no person in the position of a Pleader, who rightly enjoys the confidence of his client, can be allowed to derive any benefit to the detriment of his client by reason of information acquired during the course of his employment. In Hobday v. Peters (1) a mortgagor consulted a solicitor who turned her over to his clerk to assist her gratuitously. The clerk, by reason of information derived during such consultation, bought up the mortgage for less than half the amount. It was ruled by Romilly, M. R., that he was a trustee for the benefit of the mortgagor. In Macleod v. Jones (2) a solicitor who had purchased securities given by his client for smaller sums than the amount secured, was not allowed to hold the purchased securities as a security to himself for a larger sum than the amount which he had expended in making the purchase. But as the Court had a discretion with regard to the allowance of interest in such cases, the solicitor was allowed five per cent. on the sum he had expended in making the purchase. Macleod v. Jones (3), Unsworth's Trust, Re (4) and Douglas v. Culverwell (5). The leading decision on the subject is that of Carter v. Palmer (6), where the House of Lords ruled that the employment of Counsel as Legal Adviser disqualified him from purchasing for his own benefit charges on his client's estates without provision, and that even though the confidential employment ceases, the disability continues as long as the reason on which it is founded continues to operate. Broun v. Kennedy (7), Pisani v. Attorney-General (Gibraltar) (8), MacPherson v. Watt (9), Luddy's Trustee v. Peard (10), Rhodes v. Bate (11) and Austin v. Chambers (12). These principles have been recognised and applied in a variety of cases in Indian Courts. Fuzeelun Beebee v. Omdah Beebee (13), Nundeeput Mahta v. Mr. Alexander Shaw Urquhart (14), Subbarayudu v. Kotayya (15), Aghore Nath Chuckerbutty v. Ram Churn Chuckerbutty (16) and Goshain Jug Roop Geer v. Chingun Lal (17). These cases, however, do not support the view taken by the Subordinate Judge. Assume that a decree for Rs. 10,000 has been purchased, by the Pleader for the judgment-debtor, from the decree-holder for Rs. 5,000. On principle and on the authorities, the Pleader holds the decree assigned to him in trust for his client, and, if called upon by his client to do so, is bound to assign the decree to him. But no Court will decree such re-conveyance except upon equitable terms. It is impossible on any conceivable principle to justify the position that the effect of the assignment to the Pleader is forthwith to extinguish the judgment-debt and to release the judgment-debtor from liability. In the case before us, such of the judgment-debtors as have entered appearance have not offered to bring into Court the sum which, according to their own case, the Pleader had paid for the purchase of the decree. An additional difficulty has been created by the fact that there are several sets of judgment-debtors, whose liabilities are apparently distinct under the decree and who have from time to time paid different sums in reduction of their respective liabilities. Under these circumstances, it is not practicable in these proceedings to go behind the decree and to alter the liabilities of the parties, after investigation of the sum which would be equitably payable by the judgment-debtors to the assignee of the decree before they can obtain a re-conveyance thereof. We hold accordingly that this appeal must be allowed and the order of the Subordinate Judge set aside. The assignee (the appellant before us) will be entitled to proceed with the execution of the decree and the execution proceeding will stand revived for that purpose. No steps, however, will be taken in execution till the 1st January 1918, so that the judgment-debtors may have ample time to institute, if they are so advised, a suit against the assignee of the decree and her husband to obtain a transfer of the decree in their own favour, on proof of the allegations they have made and upon payment of such sum as the Court may determine. The appellant is entitled to her costs both here and in the Court below. We assess the hearing fee at five gold mohurs in this Court.

The penalty provided in the first part of section 41 of the Madras Court of Wards Act as to cessation of interest on unnotified claims is final, the claimant being left to prosecute his legal remedies for the amount already accrued due to him. [p. 16, col. 2.]

A restrictive construction should not be put on the highly general provisions of section 41 of the Madras Court of Wards Act. [p. 16, col. 2.]

The latter part of the section postponing unnotified claims to those notified or admitted under section 38 cannot be construed as depriving secured creditors who have notified their security or as authorising the application of money raised on their securities otherwise than in satisfaction of their claims. It only prohibits payments to them by the Court of Wards out of the unencumbered funds at its disposal, and does not prohibit the realisation of the security and satisfaction out of the proceeds of the secured creditors' claims. [p 16, col. 2; p. 17 col. 1.]

The prohibition of payment in the section is confined to the Court of Wards and does not extend to the authorities executing decrees even during the continuance of its superintendence. Creditors, whether they have notified or not, are not prevented from obtaining decrees and executing them. [p. 17, col. 1.]

The provisions of the section do not affect the duties of executing Courts or the functions of the decree-collector under sections 321 to 325 (c) of the Civil Procedure Code of 1882. [p. 17, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.

WALLIS, C. J.—In construing the provisions of section 41 of the Madras Court of Wards Act, I of 1902, regard must be had to the scope and object of the amendments introduced into the Madras Court of Wards Regulation V of 1804 by Madras Act IV of 1899 and reproduced without substantial alteration in the Act of 1902. The object was to save the estates of embarrassed proprietors or at least a portion of them for their owners, and it was hoped that, with the aid of the additional powers conferred on it, the Court of Wards would be able to provide for the full discharge of the proprietor's debts and liabilities. If not, the creditors were left to their ordinary remedies, which were only interfered with as expressly provided. Among the powers conferred on the Court of Wards and its agent the Collector, specified in the order under section 19 of the Act, was that of requiring all persons having pecuniary claims on the ward, whether decrees or not, to notify those claims within a specified period, failure to do so being visited with the penalties prescribed by sections 41 and 42. With the information thus acquired and with further powers of ousting usufructuary mortgagees from possession and converting them for the time into simple mortgagees and of reviving improvident leases, it was hoped that the Court of Wards might find itself in a position to raise sufficient money to discharge all the liabilities. Section 41 imposes two penalties with regard to claims which have not been duly notified. The first of them is that "it shall, notwithstanding any law, contract, decree or award to the contrary, cease to carry interest from the expiration of the period prescribed by section 37, for notifying claims." This threatened loss of interest was strong inducement to notify claims and having regard to the express provision that interest shall cease even when payable under a decree and to the absence of any provision as to its again becoming payable except in the event specified in section 55 (4), I agree with both the learned Judges that under the section, the cessation of interest is final and that the claimant is left to prosecute his legal remedies for the amount already accrued due to him.

As regards the second penalty that the unnotified claim "shall not be paid until after the discharge or satisfaction of the claims notified or admitted under section 38", it may be observed, in the present place, that the provision cannot be construed as depriving secured creditors of their security or as authorising the application of money raised on their securities otherwise than in satisfaction of their claims. If not paid, the secured creditor is entitled to retain his security till he is paid. In these circumstances to hold that the Court of Wards is prohibited by this section from raising money on the security and discharging the secured creditor and applying the surplus in the discharge of the general indebtedness would merely be to prevent the Court from raising money for the beneficial purposes specified in section 323 (3), Civil Procedure Code, and would unnecessarily embarrass it in the discharge of the difficult function entrusted to it without advantage to anybody. This cannot, I think, have been the intention of the Legislature, and I think that, therefore, we are not justified in putting a restrictive construction on this highly general section and that in the case of secured creditors who have not notified, it only prohibits payments to them by the Court of Wards out of the unencumbered funds at its disposal, and does not prohibit the realization of the security and satisfaction out of the proceeds of the secured creditors' claim.

If the prohibition of payment in section 41 is directed to the Court of Wards, it follows, of course, that it must cease, as held by Krishnan, J., when the Court of Wards withdraws from superintendence. I am disposed to think that it must be confined to the Court of Wards, and that it does not extend to the authorities executing decrees even during the continuance of the superintendence of the Court of Wards. Creditors, whether they have notified or not, are not prevented from obtaining decrees and proceedings to execute them. If the execution is left to the Civil Courts, each Court must execute the decree before it with due regard to the rights of secured creditors and to the rights of the unsecured decree-holders to rateable distribution. It can hardly have been intended that, on each occasion of executing a decree, the executing Court should have to embark on an enquiry whether all the notified debts have been paid, and I think that sufficient effect may be given to section 41 without construing it as affecting the duties of executing Courts, and that if it had been intended to affect them there would have been express provisions to that effect. Again, when the Local Government exercises its power under section 45 of transferring decrees against the Ward to the Collector for execution, I think the same considerations apply and that the provisions of section 41 as to the order of payment do not affect the decree-collector, as he is called, in the discharge of his duties under sections 321—325 (c) of the old Code of Civil Procedure, which are made applicable by section 47 subject to the rules prescribed by the Local Government under section 45 (2) which, however, apply only to procedure and do not affect the substantive right of the parties. In the case of decrees such as the present obtained by secured creditors ordering the sale of immoveable property in pursuance of a contract specifically affecting the same, the decree-collector has the powers conferred upon him by section 321 and is required by section 324 (a) to apply the moneys realized by him, subject to the claims of maintenance-holders, in execution of the decree for which the Court ordered the sale of the immoveable property, and in the case of other decrees to apply such moneys by way of rateable distribution. Under section 323 (3) the decree-collector is also empowered to discharge the claim of any encumbrancer, whether it has matured or not, "for the purposes of improving the saleable value of the property available or any part thereof or rendering it more suitable for letting or managing, or for preserving the property from sale in satisfaction of an encumbrance". I do not think that the second part of section 41 was intended to affect the decree-collector as regards these powers and duties.

This is an attempt to execute a mortgage decree passed in 1895 It is stated by the District Judge of North Arcot in his order on the connected Execution Petition No. 79 of 1912, dated 21st November 1912, that the Court of Wards assumed management on 26th July 1899 and gave up management of the estate on 27th September 1905, and that decrees were transferred to the Collector for execution and re-transferred to the Civil Courts on 27th February 1903. It is also stated that the Court of Wards again assumed superintendence on the 27th August 1907 and relinquished it on 15th January 1910, but it is stated that decrees were again transferred to the Collector for execution during that period, and that execution still remains with the Civil Courts. As it is now more than 18 years since the Court of Wards first took over management and the other secured and unsecured claims have not yet been satisfied, it seems exceedingly unlikely that they ever will be satisfied and if they are not, the money which has been realised on account of the defendant's security and which is in Court must, according to the District Judge's order, remain there for ever, a result which the Legislature can certainly not have contemplated. In passing the order, the learned District Judge relied on a ruling contained in a judgment to which I was a party with Krishnaswami Ayyar, J., in Depuru Kalappa v. Umade Rajaha (1) that the provisions of section 41 are absolute, except in so far as they are cut down by section 55 (3) and Oldfield, J., has also relied on this ruling. That was an appeal against an order in which the District Judge had held that the zemindari was not liable to be proceeded against for money debts incurred by the previous holder and the order was reversed on the ground that his view was wrong. Apparently the District Judge's ruling in that case, that section 41 was not applicable when the decree was being executed in the Civil Court, was also questioned before us; and, as to this, I now think we expressed ourselves too broadly, because while I am still of opinion that the provisions of section 41 as to the cessation of interest continue to apply, I have come to the conclusion on a fuller consideration of the subject that the further provisions of the section are inapplicable, for the reasons already given, to the present case. In the result we agree with the order proposed by Krishnan, J. Costs of the appeal to abide the result.

(1) 8 Ind. Cas. 392; (1911) 1 M. W. N. 75; 8 M. L. T. 297.

Pleader and client—Admission of fact by Pleader, whether binding on client—Appeal—Appellate Court, failure of, to consider admission—Remand.

An admission of fact by the Pleader of a party is binding upon his client and the opposite-party cannot be arbitrarily deprived of the benefit of the admission. [p. 19 col. 1.]

A Munsif made the following statement in the course of his judgment: "The learned Pleader for the plaintiff concedes in his argument that the land in suit is included in the lands mentioned in the sale certificate." In decreeing the appeal from the decision of the Munsif, the Appellate Court entirely ignored this admission or concession of the Pleader made in his argument in the Trial Court:

Held, that as the Appellate Court did not appreciate or realise the legal effect of the admission by the Pleader, the case must be remanded to that Court in order that the appeal thereto might be re-heard, on the footing that the admission in question was in fact made in the Trial Court. JUDGMENT.

RICHARDSON, J.—This appeal turns upon a short point. The contest relates to certain property. The plaintiff in the suit Srimati Ajimannessa Bibi makes a title to the property under a hiba-bil-ewaz dated the 28th Chaitra 1316 B. S. (April 1910) executed in her favour by her deceased husband Kebad Ali. The principal defendant, defendant No. 3, on the other hand claims to have purchased the property in the year 1901 at a Court sale held in execution of a decree obtained against Kebad Ali. One of the questions which arose was, whether the property claimed by the plaintiff was identical with the lands specified in the sale-certificate issued to defendant No. 3. On this point the learned Munsif in the Trial Court makes the following statement in the course of his judgment: "The learned Pleader for the plaintiff concedes in his argument that the land in suit is included in the lands mentioned in the sale-certificate." Now the learned Munsif is plainly speaking of an admission made by the plaintiff's Pleader of the identity of the land claimed in the suit with the land mentioned in the sale-certificate. In the Court of Appeal below, however, the learned Subordinate Judge entirely gave the go-by to this admission. He seems to have treated the admission or concession as an admission made for the purpose of the argument.

That is clearly not the nature of the admission and it is impossible on the face of the record, regard being had to the whole tenour of the Munsif's judgment, to accept the learned Judge's view of what took place in the Trial Court. Having disregarded the admission the learned Subordinate Judge has found that the property in question is not identical with the property mentioned in the sale-certificate and so finding, he took what may be termed a short cut to the decision of the appeal. I am of opinion that he was not entitled to deal with the case in that way. An admission of fact by a learned Pleader is binding on his client and the opposing party cannot be arbitrarily deprived of the benefit of the admission. If any authority is required, reference may by made to the case of Sreemutty Dossee v. Pitambur Pundah (1). It is evident that the learned Subordinate Judge did not appreciate or realize the legal effect of the admission as an admission by a Pleader on behalf of his client.

I may add that if there was any mistake on the Munsif's part, it seems extraordinary that no steps were taken in his Court by way of review to correct the plain and clear statement in his judgment. The point again was not taken in the grounds of appeal filed in the lower Appellate Court and it is impossible to suppose that if the admission had not in fact been made, that point would have been omitted. In the circumstances, I am of opinion that the judgment and decree of the lower Appellate Court must be set aside and the case must be remanded to that Court in order that the appeal thereto may be re-heard on the footing that the admission in question was in fact made in the Trial Court. The costs of the appeal will abide the result.

BEACHCROFT, J.—I agree.

MAHABIR SAHU AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS —APPELLANTS

versus

RAM SARAN SAHU AND OTHERS— PLAINTIFFS—RESPONDENTS.

Riparian rights—Upper and lower owners, rights of—Natural right to use water of stream for irrigation—Prescriptive right to exclusive use of water, acquisition of.

Riparian owners have a natural right to use the water of a natural streamlet for purposes of irrigation so long as that use is reasonable. [p. 21, col. 1.]

Where, however, a lower riparian owner has acquired a prescriptive right to the exclusive use of the water of a rivulet for irrigation purposes, a higher owner cannot use the water of the streamlet so as to interfere with the rights of the lower owner. [p. 21, col. 2.]

Appeal from a decision of the Subordinate Judge, Ranchi, dated the 22nd November 1916 FACTS.—In the District of Palamau, a streamlet called Dhaura takes its rise in the Ulgarah hills and falls into the river Amanat. On its eastern bank there are situated two villages, Taliderih and Nuru. Taliderih is situated higher up the streamlet and Nuru a little lower down it. The plaintiffs, who were owners of the village Nuru, constructed a pucca dam across the streamlet in front of the village forty years ago and thereby diverted the water to irrigate 100 bighas of their land. Defendants recently constructed a kacha dam in front of their village Taliderih to irrigate 5 bighas of their land. The plaintiffs brought the present suit for removal of the kacha dam constructed by the defendants and for an injunction preventing them from at all using the water for irrigation purposes. The Munsif ordered the removal of the dam constructed by the defendants but declared that they as upper riparian owners had a natural right to use the water for the purposes of irrigation to a reasonable extent, notwithstanding the prescriptive right of the plaintiffs to dam up the streamlet and divert its water for irrigating their land. On appeal the District Judge found that the plaintiffs had acquired a prescriptive right to dam the rivulet and use its water for irrigation and that the defendants had proved no such right in their favour. He gave the plaintiffs a declaration that the defendants had no right to use the water for irrigation purposes at all.

The defendants appealed to the High Court.

Mr. Parmeshwar Dayal, for the Appellants.—The terms of the injunction granted by the Court below were too wide. According to the ordinary law each riparian owner has a right to use the water for irrigating his land abutting on a natural stream, provided that he does not thereby cause material injury to other like owners. The defendant being a higher riparian owner has a natural right to use the water for the purposes of irrigation. Dinkar v. Narayan (1), Sheo Narain Singh v. Chandrabhal (2), Balbhadra Persad Singh v. Najiban (3); Halsbury's Laws of England, Volume XXVIII, page 426.

India is an agricultural country, irrigation is one of the common objects for which the water of a natural stream may be utilized. Illustration (g) to section 7 of the Easements Act, V of 1882, lays down the same principle. English Law also goes very much on the same lines. Lord Halsbury in his Laws of England, Volume XXVIII, at page 426 says that a riparian owner may use the water for the irrigation of his land if he returns it into the river opposite his land with no other diminution than that caused by absorption or evaporation attendant on the irrigation. Thus it is clear that according to the English and Indian Law a riparian owner has a natural right to use the water of a streamlet for the purpose of irrigation to a reasonable extent. He further relied on Secretary of State v. Ambalavana Pandara Sannidhi (4), Dinkar v. Narayan (1), Sheo Narain Singh v. Chandrabhal (2) and Balbhadra Persad Singh v. Najiban (3).

The prescriptive rights acquired by the plaintiffs to divert the water of the streamlet as it reaches the village Nuru has got a double effect:

(1) It deprives the lower riparian owners of their right to receive the water of the streamlet undiminished by the act of the plaintiffs. As they have allowed the plaintiffs to divert the water by erecting the dam for forty years, they cannot now compel the plaintiffs to remove the bund and let the water flow down undiminished to their lands.

2. As against the higher riparian owners it has secured for the plaintiffs a right to make the water flow back in times of plenty so as to inundate their lands.

An upper riparian owner cannot complain of the inundation thus caused by the dam on his land.

As against the defendants who are higher riparian owners, the plaintiff has acquired no right to the exclusive user of the water of the streamlet. The plaintiff is not entitled to prevent the higher riparian owners from using the water in the exercise of their natural rights. He cannot say that he has, by virtue of his dam, acquired a vested right in the entire volume of water running down the stream from Ulgarah hills. He has no right to compel the higher owners to send to him the whole body of water without using a drop of it. Goddard on Easement, page 347.

[IMAM, J.—But the defendants have not been using the water for a long time. They have begun to use it only recently.]

The effect of non user is not to extinguish their natural rights. A riparian owner is not bound to use the rights that his riparian ownership gives him, but he may begin to do so whenever he likes and he can maintain an action against any other riparian owner for any act which may infringe his rights though he has never used them. Haslbury's Laws of England, Volume XXVIII, page 426.

Mr. Kulwant Sahai, for the Respondents.—The rivulet is a small stream. It hardly carries water sufficient to irrigate 100 bighas of plaintiffs' land. Under such circumstances, the defendant has got no right to use its water for irrigation.

Mr. Parmeshwar Dayal replied.

JUDGMENT.—The appellants are aggrieved by an order of the learned Subordinate Judge of Ranchi, who has reversed the order of the Munsif of Daltongunge. The plaintiffs' suit was for declaration that they have acquired by right of easement an absolute right to the entire water of a certain rivulet, that the principal defendants in the case have no right to take any water from this rivulet to irrigate their lands and that the plaintiffs should be awarded Rs. 200 as damages and that there should be a perpetual injunction against the defendants prohibiting them from putting up a bund across the said rivulet.

It appears that a small stream rises from the Ulgarah hills and falls into the river Amanat. The defendants' village Taliderih and the plaintiffs' village Nuru are contiguous standing on the right bank of this rivulet. Taliderih is the higher village and Nuru is the lower one. The learned Subordinate Judge has come to the distinct finding that the plaintiffs who are the proprietors of Nuru have for more than forty years erected a pucca dam across this rivulet and that thereby they have been irrigating about 100 bighas of their lands situated in Nuru. It has also been held that this use that they have made of the water by putting up a bund has been an uninterrupted one. The learned Subordinate Judge has also come to the distinct finding that the defendants who were the proprietors of Taliderih have failed to prove that they have any right whatsoever to put a bund across this rivulet.

The principal point taken up in argument by the learned Vakil appearing on behalf of the appellants is that even if these findings are against the defendants, the judgment of the learned Subordinate Judge contains one declaration which is in excess of these findings and that he ought not to have allowed this additional burden to be placed upon the shoulders of the defendants. The passage in question in the judgment of the learned Subordinate Judge runs as follows: "It is further declared that defendants have no right to use the water of this streamlet for the purpose of irrigation." It is contended on behalf of the appellants that this order trenches upon their rights as riparian owners to make use of the water of this rivulet for the purpose of irrigation so long as that use is reasonable and natural. My attention is drawn to various authorities on the point and it may be conceded that so far as the proposition goes in relation to the rights of one riparian owner with reference to the rights of another riparian owner it is a sound one, but the case before me stands on a different footing altogether. The proprietors of Nuru are the plaintiffs in this case. Their right is not only of riparian owners, but as a matter of fact they have got a higher right in respect of the water of this rivulet by their having constructed the pucca dam across the stream so long as forty years ago and by their making use of the water all these years without any interruption. The learned Subordinate Judge has also come to the distinct finding that this streamlet as a matter of fact has a small supply of water and this is so little that the water of this streamlet is barely sufficient for the purposes of irrigating the plaintiffs' lands. It is evident, therefore that there is no such abundance of water coming through this streamlet as to irrigate the lands of the defendants without the lands of the plaintiffs suffering from want of water and as the right of the plaintiffs is established by prescription to the exclusive use of this water for the purpose of irrigating their 100 bighas of land, the ordinary incidents of riparian rights cannot be applied to their case.

In the circumstances the appeal is dismissed with costs.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. VII, rr. 14, 18—Document not filed with plaint nor within time fixed by Court, admissibility of.

The plaintiff brought a suit for enhancement of rent on the basis of a kabuliyat which was not filed with the plaint as required by Order VII, rule 14, Civil Procedure Code, but was filed in Court after the time within which parties were directed by the Court to file their documents, and was therefore not received in evidence at the hearing of the suit:

Held, that as there was no doubt that the document was in existence at the date of the institution of the suit, and also having regard to the proceedings which had taken place in the suit, the rejection of the document by the Courts below was not a proper or judicial exercise of the discretion conferred by Order VII, rule 18. [p. 23, col. 1.]

Appeals against the decrees of the District Judge, Noakhali, dated the 21st March 1914, confirming those of the Munsif at Lakhipur, dated the 22nd April 1913

FACTS of the case appear from the judgment.

Babu Probodh Kumar Das, for the Appellants.—In refusing to admit the kabuliyat into evidence the Courts below did not properly exercise their discretion under Order VII, rule 18, Civil Procedure Code. No doubt the kabuliyat was not filed in proper time. When it was filed in Court it was ordered to be kept on the record. Then there was a local enquiry by an Amin to find out whether the defendants were in possession of land exceeding that for which rent had been previously paid. The Amin gave his report in favour of the plaintiff. At the hearing of the suit the kabuliyat was not admitted into evidence, and the suit so far as it related to the claim for increase of rent for excess area was dismissed. Having regard to the circumstances of the case and to the fact that the kabuliyat was in existence at the date of the suit the Courts below were wrong in rejecting the document. See Mewa Lal Sahu v. Kumerji Jha (1) and Devidas Jagjivan v. Pirjada Begam (2).

Babu Surendra Nath Das Gupta, for the Respondents.—The kabuliyat being the basis of the suit the Courts below were right in holding that it should not be admitted into evidence, and there is no sufficient reason for interfering with the discretion exercised by them.

Order VII, rule 14, of the Code of 1908 makes it incumbent upon the plaintiff to file with the plaint any document upon which he sues, if that document remains in his possession or power. Here the kabuliyat was in the possession of the plaintiff at the date of the suit, and he not having filed it in proper time the discretion under Order VII, rule 18, has been rightly and properly exercised by the Courts below.

Babu Probodh Kumar Das shortly replied.

JUDGMENT.

IN S. A. No. 1710 OF 1916.

This is an appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment and decree of the District Judge of Noakhali, dated the 21st March 1914, confirming the decree of the Munsif of Lakhipur, dated the 27th April 1913. The suit is a suit for rent at an enhanced rate on the footing that the tenants, the defendants, are in possession of an area in excess of that for which rent had previously been paid. The suit was instituted on the 15th April 1912. The first date for hearing was the 3rd July 1912. But thereafter there were a number of adjournments and on the 10th August 1912 the parties were directed to file their documents within seven days and the kabuliyat to which this appeal relates was in fact filed by the plaintiff on the 9th September 1912. The order then made was that the documents should be kept on the record. Further proceedings followed, including a local enquiry by an Amin. The case did not come on for hearing till the 21st April 1913. Then in the course of the examination of one of the witnesses the kabuliyat to which I have referred was tendered in evidence on behalf of the plaintiffs. The learned Munsif refused to admit it on the ground that it had been filed out of time. He decreed the suit for rent at the previous rate but dismissed it in so far as it related to the claim for increase of rent. The learned District Judge agreed with the Munsif that the kabuliyat was filed out of time and dismissed the plaintiff's appeal preferred in his Court. It appears that the Courts below refused to accept this kabuliyat in evidence on the ground that being a document on which the suit was in part based it was not filed along with the plaint under rule 14 of Order VII. In such cases rule 18 of the same Order gives these Courts a discretion to accept a document not filed with the plaint. The rule says that a document which ought to have been produced in Court by the plaintiff when the plaint was presented and was not so produced "shall not without the leave of the Court be received in evidence at the hearing of the suit." Now the cases of Devidas Jagiivan v. Pirjada Begam (2) and Mewa Lal Sahu v. Kumerji Jha (1) illustrate the principle applicable to the exercise of the discretion thus conferred. The kabuliyat in question appears to have been exhibited in a previous suit and no doubt is suggested that the document was in existence at the date of the institution of the present suit. Having regard, moreover, to the proceedings which had taken place and the expense which had been incurred in connection with the local enquiry by the amin, we find ourselves unable to say that the rejection of this document by the Courts below was a proper or judicial exercise of the discretion which rule 18 confers.

The result is that the decrees of both the lower Courts must be set aside and the suit remitted to the first Court in order that it may be re-tried on the evidence on the record and such other evidence as the parties may produce. The costs of this appeal will abide the result.

This judgment will govern the analogous appeal (Second Appeal No. 3818 of 1914.)

JAGIR SINGH, MINOR, THROUGH MUKAND SINGH—RESPONDENT.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O XLI, r 10—Application for security for costs, when to be made.

Applications for security for costs must be made promptly, not only on the ground that the respondent should apply for security for costs before he incurs them but also on the ground that it is unreasonable that security should not be applied for till the appellant has incurred costs of the appeal. [p. 24, col. 1.]

Pooley's Trustee v. Whetham, (1886) 33 Ch. D. 76; 56 L. J. Ch. 41; 55 L. T. 462, Bhobonath Lahiri v. Radhaprosad Lahiri, 5 C. W. N. 119, Srinivasa Sastrial v. Subramania Aiyar, 17 M. L. J. 583, Farkhandatunnissa v. Collector of Meerut, A. W. N. (1889) 147, followed.

Where, therefore, an appeal was preferred on the 17th July 1913 and was admitted on 11th October 1913 and the application for security for costs was not made till the 29th March 1917, when the appellant had incurred all the costs of printing the paper-book and engaging Counsel and the appeal had even been fixed for hearing for no fewer than four times and had been actually heard on the 3rd January 1917, when the Court decided that the appeal in forma pauperis could not be entertained and directed the appellant to pay the Court-fee leviable on the memorandum of appeal, which order was also complied with on the 26th February 1917, more than a month before the application was made:

Held, that the application was a belated one and could not be entertained. [p. 23, col. 2.]

Petition under Order XLI, rule 10 of the Civil Procedure Code, for having the security furnished by the respondent for the costs of the appeal case noted above before the date fixed for its hearing.

Mr. Abdul Ghani, for the Petitioners.

Bakhshi Tek Chand, for the Respondent.

ORDER.—This application for security made under Order XLI, rule 10, Civil Procedure Code, must fail on the ground that it was not made promptly and that the law requires that such applications should be made without unreasonable delay, at any rate before the applicant has incurred the costs of the appeal. It appears that the appeal was preferred on the 17th July 1913, and was admitted on the 11th October 1913. The application was, however, not made until the 29th March 1917, more than three years after the date of the admission of the appeal. In the meanwhile the paper-book had been printed, and the appellant had incurred all the costs of printing the paper book and engaging Counsel. Even the respondents had engaged Counsel, and the appeal had been fixed for hearing for no fewer than four times. On the last occasion it came up for hearing on the 3rd January 1917, when the Division Bench after hearing arguments on both sides decided that the appeal in forma pauperis could not be entertained and directed the appellant to pay the Court-fee leviable on the memorandum of appeal. Even this order was complied with on the 26th February 1917, more than a month before the application in question was made.

On these facts there can be no doubt that the application is a belated one and should not be entertained. The rule followed by the English Courts has always been that applications for security for costs must be made promptly, not only on the ground that the respondent should apply for security for costs before he incurs them, but also on the ground that it is unreasonable that security should not be applied for till the applicant has incurred costs of the appeal, vide, Pooley's Trustee v. Whetham (1). This rule has been followed by the different High Courts in India, vide, Bholonath Lahiri v. Radhaprosad Lahiri (2), Srinivasa Sastrial v. Subramania Aiyar (3) and Farkhandatunnissa v. Collector of Meerut (4).

For the aforesaid reasons I dismiss the application with costs.

Bengal Tenancy Act (VIII B. C. of 1885), s 52—Landlord and tenant—Landlord, whether can claim additional rent for excess area within boundaries specified in pattah.

Where rent is fixed for the whole area within the boundaries specified in a pattah, the landlord is not entitled to additional rent on account of excess area merely because the area within the boundaries specified in the pattah is considerably more than the area stated therein, although he may claim additional rent for excess lands outside the boundaries, Babus Dwarka Nath Chakrabarty, Hemendra Nath Sen and Dhirendra Nath Sen, for the Appellant.

Babu Samatul Chandra Dutt and Babu Biraj Mohan Mazumdar, for the Deputy Registrar.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit brought by the original plaintiff (the appellant before us) for enhancement of rent of a certain holding. It appears that the tenancy was created by a pattah marked Exhibit A. According to that pattah it would seem that rent was fixed for the whole area within the boundaries specified, though that area may have been estimated at 40 bighas. If that is so, the plaintiff is not entitled to additional rent on account of excess area merely because the area within the boundaries is proved to be more or considerably more than 40 bighas. The question whether any land in respect of which additional rent is claimed lies outside the boundaries specified in the pattah has apparently not been considered in the Courts below. If any part of the lands is outside the boundaries, the judgment leaves it open to the plaintiff in any future proceedings he may be advised to take to claim additional rent in respect thereof. With these observations the appeal is dismissed with costs.

We ought to add that this appeal only relates to the 3-annas 4-pies portion of the holding and does not affect the judgment of the Court below in respect of the 8 annas share of the holding, to which that judgment refers.

MAHABIR DUBE AND ANOTHER—DECREE-HOLDERS—RESPONDENTS.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 48, O. XX.,

JURAWAN v. MAHABIR DUBE.

v. 11—"Subsequent order", meaning of—Scope of s. 48 —Limitation Act (IX of 1908), s. 15, applicability of, to s. 48 of Civil Procedure Code—"Prescribed", scope of —Order granting time to judgment-debtor, whether order staying execution.

"A subsequent order directing payment of money", in section 48 (b) of the Civil Procedure Code, means a subsequent order made by the Court which made the decree and acting as that Court, and not an order of a Court executing a decree. In all probability the section contemplates orders made under Order XX, rule 11, of the Code. [p. 26, col. 1.]

An order of an executing Court granting time to the judgment-debtor is not a "subsequent order directing payment of money" within the meaning of section 48 of the Civil Procedure Code and does not operate to extend the period of limitation for the execution of the decree. [p. 26, col. 1.]

Section 48 of the Civil Procedure Code does not in a strict sense provide a period of limitation. It is an enactment which forbids an order for execution upon a decree which is more than twelve years old. [p. 26, col. 1 & 2.]

An order granting time to the judgment-debtor is not an order staying execution of the decree within the meaning of section 15 of the Limitation Act. [p. 26, col. 1.]

The word "prescribed" in section 15 of the Limitation Act refers to periods prescribed by that Act, and has no application to the provisions of section 48 of the Civil Procedure Code. [p. 26, col. 1.]

Execution second appeal from a decree of the Additional District Judge, Gorakhpore.

Mr. Peary Lal Banerji, for the Appellants.

Mr. Radha Kant Malaviya, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of execution proceedings. The decree was dated as far back as the 28th of June 1904. In March 1915, an application was made for execution by attachment of certain property of the judgment-debtor. On that application (the 23rd of September 1915), two months' time was granted to the judgment-debtor to pay the balance of the decretal amount, he having paid Rs. 22 on account. No further step appears to have been taken on this application and it was struck off. On the 6th of September 1916, the present application was made. It sought execution in a different way. The application of the 31st of March 1915 was for execution by attachment of property. In the application of the 6th of September 1916, execution was sought by the arrest of the judgment-debtor. The judgment debtor raised an objection that having regard to the provisions of section 48 of the Code of Civil Procedure the decree being now more than twelve years' old, an order for execution could not be made. The First Court allowed the objection. The learned District Judge upon appeal held, first, that the application was within time holding, that the twelve years mentioned in section 48 ran from 1915 and secondly, that the application was within time under Article 179, clause 4, of the Limitation Act. The judgment-debtor has appealed. The learned Vakil, for the decree-holder, admits that Article 179, clause 4, of the Limitation Act does not apply, but he contends that the order of the 23rd of September 1915, when the judgment-debtor was allowed two months to pay the decree, was a "subsequent order", within the meaning of that expression in section 48, clause (b), of the Code of Civil Procedure, and secondly, that in calculating the period of twelve years mentioned in section 48 of the Code of Civil Procedure the two months, which were given to the judgment-debtor by the order of the 23rd of September 1915, should be excluded having regard to the provisions of section 15 of the Limitation Act. Amongst the authorities cited by each side were Ram Nath Tewari v. Chatterpalman Tewari (1), Jogobundhoo Dass v. Hori Rawoot (2), Balchand v. Raghunath Das (3), Raghunath Prosad v. Kashi Prosad (4), Tata Charlu v. Konadala Ramachandara (5) and Perumal Naickar v. Davood Rowther (6).

Section 48 of the Civil Procedure Code is as follows:—"Where an application to execute a decree not being a decree granting an injunction has been made, no order for the execution of the same decree shall be made upon any fresh application presented after the expiration of twelve years from (a) the date of the decree sought to be executed, or (b) where the decree or any subsequent order directs any payment of money or the delivery of any property to be made at a certain date or at recurring periods, the date of default in making the payment or delivery in respect of which the applicant seeks to execute the decree."

As already mentioned, it is contended that the order of the 23rd of September 1915, giving the judgment-debtor two months' time, is a subsequent order directing the payment of the balance of the money. It must be remembered that this order was made by the Court executing the decree. It may perhaps have so happened in this case that it was the same Court which granted the decree of the 28th of June 1904, that was executing the decree. But if the argument put forward by the decree-holder is good, it would equally apply to a case where the decree had been merely transferred to another Court for execution. It would almost seem to follow that even an adjournment of an application for execution would give a fresh period of twelve years from the expiry of the period of adjournment. After consideration we have come to the conclusion that a subsequent order directing payment of money in section 48, clause (b), means a subsequent order made by the Court which made the decree and acting as that Court, and not an order of a Court executing a decree. In all probability the section contemplates orders made under Order XX, rule 11. We may say in passing that the order of the 23rd of September 1915 was not made under Order XX, rule 11. As to the argument put forward grounded on the provisions of section 15 of the Limitation Act, this section runs as follows:—"In computing the period of limitation prescribed for any suit or application for the execution of a decree, the institution or execution of which has been stayed by injunction or order, the time of the continuance of the injunction or order, the day on which it was issued or made, and the day on which it was withdrawn, shall be excluded."

In the first place, the order of the 23rd of September was not strictly an order staying the execution of the decree. Furthermore, the Limitation Act itself prescribes periods of limitation for bringing suits and periods of limitation for the execution of decrees, and it seems pretty clear that the word "prescribed" in this section refers to periods prescribed by the Limitation Act. Section 48 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not in a strict sense provide a "period" of limitation. It is an enactment which forbids an order for execution upon a decree which is more than twelve years old. We must allow the appeal, set aside the order of the Court below and restore the order of the Court of first instance with costs in all Courts.

Order set aside.

Babus Siba Prasanna Bhattachariya and Pasupati Nath Sastri, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—In this case the plaintiff Sridam Mahata sued to recover possession of 137 bighas odd in Mouza Dakhina, on the ground that he had a mourasi mokurari jote mondali right under the defendant No. 1. The plaintiff pleaded dispossession on 29th July 1898 and he filed his suit on 22nd June 1910, just within 12 years. The point of limitation was taken both in Courts below and in this Court but has not been seriously pressed before us, as it appears that the suit of the plaintiff which was first filed in the 4th Munsif's Court was presented by him in that Court with due diligence and was only returned to be presented before the higher Court when it was found that the value of the land exceeded the amount of the Munsif's jurisdiction.

The point of law relied upon by the defendant No. 1, who is the appellant in this Court, is that the title of the plaintiff was extinguished by the sale by the landlord, defendant No. 1, in pursuance of the decree in the suit of 1894 which the predecessor of the defendant No. 1, Ishwar Chandra Deb, brought against Gangadhar Mahata, the defendant No. 4, one of the heirs of Pahal Singh—the original owner of the property. It was argued that the defendant 1 had the right to ignore the present plaintiff as he was not registered as the tenant of this property. It is not disputed that the land in question originally belonged to Pahal Singh—the father-in-law of the present plaintiff—who by his Will dated 13th December 1880 left it to the plaintiff. That Will was duly proved in 1883 after the death of Pahal Singh, and it appears that the plaintiff was in possession from 1883 to 1887 and again from the date of his decree at the end of 1894 until he was dispossessed in 1898. The Subordinate Judge in the Trial Court has found that the suit brought by Iswar Chandra against Gangadhar in 1894 was collusive and in fraud of the plaintiff. The plaintiff had during the pendency of that suit been suing the heirs of Pahal Singh and also Iswar Chandra. That suit was decreed against the heirs of Pahal Singh and the plaintiff's right to this property was duly decreed. The suit was dismissed formally against Iswar Chandra, because he was not a party to the dispossession of the plaintiff at that time. But the decree was passed in his presence and it is clear that he knew perfectly well that the plaintiff Sridam Mahata was the transferee of the property and that the defendant No. 4 against whom he brought the suit for rent had no right whatever to it. Reliance was placed by the defendant on the Full Bench ruling in the case of Sham Chand Koondoo v. Brojonath Pal Choudhry (1). In that case it was held that it was intended that the zemindar should be at liberty to treat as the holder of the tenure, and as the person whom he might sue for the arrears of rent, the person who was registered in his books as the owner, unless any one could show that there had been a transfer, and that there was sufficient cause for its non registration. That exception is very important in this case, because undoubtedly here there was a transfer in favour of the present plaintiff and equally without doubt the defendant No. 1 knew all about it, having been a party to that suit. Instead of doing as he ought to have done under section 26 of the Transfer of Property Act, namely, admitting the plaintiff's transfer to registry, he brought the fraudulent and collusive suit against defendant No. 4, carried that decree to execution and brought about what was an equally fraudulent and improper sale of the property with the express view of ousting the present plantiff. It appears to us that that creates an exception in this case from the general rule and that it would be impossible for the Court to give relief on the bare statement of the law to a man who has thus behaved.

Another point was intimated by the learned Pleader for the appellant which affects the respondent more materially than the defendant-appellant, and that is that the decree in the case is incapable of execution inasmuch as, while the Courts have declared that the plaintiff is entitled to khas possession of the 137 bighas odd in Mouza Dakhina, they have not specified to which 13 bighas they refer. We think, for the further security of the plaintiff-respondent, that the learned District Judge should be asked to specify by boundaries, after such enquiry as he may find necessary, the 137 bighas 7 cottahs 9 chataks in respect of which the decree was passed. On his reporting to this Court, the decree in this appeal will be drawn up. The learned District Judge should be asked to correct the decree in this particular within a month from the receipt of the record by him.

The plaintiff-respondent must have his costs of this appeal from the defendant-appellant.

Let the record be sent down without delay.

Record sent down.

The Hon'ble Mr. Motilal Nehru, the Hon'ble Dr. Tej Bahadur Sapru Messrs. S. C. Mukerji and Gulzari Lal, for the Applicant.

Mr. A. E. Ryves, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—These are two applications by Bisheshar Nath, High Court Vakil, practising at Ghaziabad, against an order of the Munsif of Ghaziabad, which was really a judgment in a civil suit, (a) directing him to show cause why he should not be committed to the Criminal Court under section 476 of the Criminal Procedure Code and also (b) directing him to show cause why proceedings should not be taken against him under section 14 of the Legal Practitioners Act.

The circumstances of the case are unusual, and it is to be hoped exceptional. I have had the advantage of reading an English translation of the entire pleadings, order-sheet, and evidence. A suit was brought in the Court of the Munsif by one Chajju Mal against Jasram upon a promissory note alleged to have been given by the defendant on the 31st of December 1913 for Rs. 150 with interest at Re. 1-4-0 per cent. per mensem. The claim was for Rs. 216-14-0 only. The plaint was filed about the 22nd December 1916, and the claim would, therefore, have been barred in a few days.

Paragraph 2 of the written statement alleged that the plaintiff was in jail, that the suit had not been presented on his behalf and that the permission of the jail authorities had not been given to the plaintiff's signature.

The following issue was framed:—

1. Whether the suit was properly and duly filed on behalf of the plaintiff and is maintainable or not.

The Munsif describes it as the most..... important issue in the case.

Bakhtawar Singh, brother in-law of the plaintiff, was called and swore that he was asked by the plaintiff's wife, in consequence of a letter written by the plaintiff from jail, to file the suit, and he accordingly instructed the applicant, Bisheshar Nath. Hardwari Lal, the plaintiff's munim called by the defendant, attempted to identify the plaintiff's signature but he was not certain about it. A jailor was called by the defendant who contradicted the statement of Bakhtawar Singh that the plaint was signed by the plaintiff in the presence of the jail authorities, though he stated that, about the date in question, two or three people called to see Chajjoo Ram who was at work outside the jail, and the signature might have been obtained in the jailor's absence. The learned Munsif is incorrect in saying that the jailor swore no person had any interview with the plaintiff in the month of December.

These witnesses, whose evidence was recorded on the 14th February and the 13th April, are the only relevant ones upon the point as to the manner in which the plaintiff's signature was obtained.

On the 19th April the plaintiff himself was put into the box and was asked the question, "who signed the plaint in this case?" After a highly technical discussion about the onus of proof, which I confess is beyond my comprehension, the question was disallowed. So that issue No. 1 was decided after the deliberate refusal to hear the evidence of the principal person concerned who was in a position to speak to it. To talk of forgery under such circumstances is of course out of the question.

I will assume that the plaintiff's signature was appended so as to constitute a breach of the jail regulations. I will assume further, though it is by no means proved, that he did not write it himself, although he had authorized the suit, and that although he might have authorised some one to sign his own name, he was prepared, or badly advised, under a mistaken fear of the consequences of telling the truth, to commit perjury by swearing that a signature written by some one for him was written by himself. There is not, so far as I can see, in the absence of a repudiation of his signature by the plaintiff himself, a scrap of evidence of forgery, and not a shadow of a suggestion in the evidence that the present applicant knew it was forged.

The learned Munsif appears to have felt the difficulty himself. He says the signatures of the plaintiff to the plaint and vakalatnama were "most probably forged." He further concludes that the applicant was guilty of gross negligence in not concluding that there had been a breach of the jail regulations. It is impossible to reconcile this finding with the ultimate conclusion that the applicant produced two documents in Court which he either knew or had reason to believe were forged. Without considering whether the Munsif had jurisdiction to deal with any disciplinary question under the Legal Practitioners Act, or whether the occasion was one in which, in any event, he ought to have exercised the power given by section 476 of the Criminal Procedure Code, I hold that on the evidence before him the course which the Munsif took with the Vakil, the present applicant, had no foundation in fact and was an unwarrantable abuse of his power, and an irregular exercise of jurisdiction.

As, however, the judgment in this case raises several points of practical importance and the whole proceedings evidence a lamentable waste of judicial time, and a fruitless expenditure of costs, all of which apparently will fall upon one or another of these two unfortunate litigants, I think it desirable to deal with the other points raised.

The Munsif has entered into a learned and exhaustive examination of the Jail Manual and Regulations. These are wholly irrelevant. He says they have the force of law. This does not mean that they alter the general law. A plaint signed, or a suit authorised, by a man in jail is just as good as any other plaint or suit, however many jail regulations are broken. The breach of regulations, whether by the prisoner his friends or Pleader, are matters for the jail authorities or the Local Government or whoever has the duty of enforcing them or punishing their breach. They no doubt have the force of law but they cannot destroy a cause of action, or invalidate a plaint. The second part of the second plea in the written statement which raised this point ought to have been struck out and no issue should have been framed thereon.

Order VI, rule 14, which requires a pleading to be signed by a party is merely a matter of procedure. It is the business of the Court to see that this provision is carried out. It is also the business of the Court to see that a suit is authorized by the plaintiff. Of course if it is not, the suit ought to be dismissed, and the persons responsible for it made to answer for their conduct. The authority for the bringing of a suit is a question of principle. But where a suit is duly authorised, the proper signing of the plaint is a matter of practice only and if a mistake or omission has been made it may be amended at any time. Sections 151 and 153, which the Courts below seem too often to ignore, were plainly intended for such cases. And the latter part of Order VI rule 14, enabling a person duly authorised by the party, when the party is unable to sign the pleading himself, to sign for him, makes this clear. In the present case I see no reason why Bakhtawar Singh could not have signed for the plaintiff. I delivered a judgment recently myself upon this very point where I endeavoured to make it clear. But there is abundant authority if any were required for such an obvious proposition. Basdeo v. John Smidt (1) decided it in this Court many years ago.

But the most unfortunate incident of the whole case is the proceeding of the 19th April when the plaintiff presented himself in the box, and the Munsif disallowed a most obvious, necessary and proper question. Why the Munsif did not then realise the position, and put an end to further waste of time and invite the plaintiff to sign the plaint and vakalatnama then and there, I am at a loss to understand. The fact that a fresh suit would probably be barred by limitation would seem an additional reason for doing so.

BISHESHAR NATH v. EMPEROR.

I have not thought it necessary to discuss the high technicalities about the attestation of the vakalatnama. All defects might and ought to have been cured by the exercise of a little common sense, and may, in my opinion, still be cured if the suit is remanded or the Court which hears the suit in appeal does what the Munsif might and ought to have done [vide Rajit Ram v. Katesar Nath (2)].

It cannot be impressed too often upon the inferior Courts that as Bowen, L. J., said in Cropper v. Smith (3):

"The object of Courts is to decide the rights of parties, and not to punish them for mistakes which they make in the conduct of their cases, by deciding otherwise than in accordance with their rights. Courts do not exist for the sake of discipline, but for the sake of deciding matters in controversy."

Of course where it is sught to abuse the process of the Court, or to overreach the other party by some fraud, it is another matter.

I have thought it necessary to refer to some of the broader questions raised by this case, and to reiterate these time-honoured principles, because in my short experience I have found from time to time a good deal of misconception and confussion of thought with regard to these matters in the procedure of inferior Courts. They cannot be impressed too strongly upon Courts of Justice. The suit is not before me and is, I understand, under appeal before the District Judge of Meerut, who has postponed the hearing pending these applications. It is to be observed, however, that although according to the Munsif's judgment the defendant admitted his signature to the note so that the onus was upon him, the plaintiff gave evidence and the defendant did nothing but rely upon a discharged servant of the plaintiff. The Munsif dismissed the suit on the merits. If he was right in so doing there was the less reason for this elaborate expenditure of time and money over a trivial matter of Rs. 200.

The appellant alleges that there have been private and personal differences between himself and the Judge. Except that his judgment is under review, the Munsif is not before me. I have not heard what he has to say and I will merely content myself by saying that if there has been any thing of the kind, the Munsif and the Vakil should lose no time in healing the sore and making friends. Both are members of the same profession, and where ill-feeling prevails work is certain to suffer. The Government Advocate is probably right in saying that the parties have, for some reason best known to themselves, expended a great deal of unnecessary heat over this little suit. The defendant and his representatives are partly to blame for this unfortunate miscarriage by having raised the question in their plea, apparently because the plaintiff, who was a former employer of the defandant, had been sent to jail. If there was a good defence to the suit, it was superfluous. If there was no defence, it was irrelevant to any question unless the suit had not been authorised by the plaintiff. This, which is the sole question of importance, has not been decided at all.

I will merely add that it would in my opinion be better, as a general rule, where the Court has reason to think that there has been any breach of professional etiquette or any matter calling for the exercise of disciplinary powers, in the conduct of the Pleader or Advocate in the case, to decide the merits, and reserve any such question for further consideration after the disposal of the suit. If there were no other reason for this course, and there are several in my judgment, it is in any case not a matter which concerns the parties or one in respect of which they ought to be penalised either by prolonging the suit or increasing the costs. This case seems to have occupied the time of the Court on six days, including the framing of the issues and the delivery of judgment, and lasted for more than six months. I direct the order of the Munsif so far as it affects the applicant, to be cancelled.

Order cancelled.

Shamilat deh recorded as shamilat tarf—Declaration, suit for—Admission, effect of—Appropriation of compensation money, effect of—Limitation, commencement of—Fresh invasion—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), s. 23.

In a suit for a declaration to the effect that the plaintiffs were the owners of a certain share of the village shamilat land, it appeared that the land in suit was entered as shamilat deh in the Settlements of 1856, 1868 and 1891-92. But in 1893 the entry was changed and the land was shown as shamilat of taraf Bedi—one of the 3 tarafs in the village, the plaintiffs' taraf being known as taraf Vedi—in consequence, as was urged on behalf of the Bedi defendants, of an admission made by the plaintiffs or their ancestors in that year. It appeared further that portions of the land having been acquired by the Government in 1906 and again in 1911 the compensation money was taken by the Bedis on the last occasion:

Held, (1) that the old entries being all in plaintiffs' favour the admissions of the Vedis meant nothing more than that the Bedis should continue to manage the land taking whatever income might accrue and incurring whatever expense might occur; [p. 31, col. 2.]

(2) that the action of the Bedis in 1911 in taking all the compensation money was a fresh invasion of the plaintiffs' rights and the suit was, therefore, within time. [p. 32, col. 1]

First appeal from the decree of the Senior Subordinate Judge, Gujranwala, dated the 1st October 1914, decreeing the claim.

The Hon'ble Pandit Sheo Narain, R. B., and Mr. Taj-ud-Din, for the Appellants.

The Hon'ble Mr. Muhammad Shafi, K. B., for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The facts are as follows. In village Santpura there are three tarafs, one tarf Bedi, one tarf Vedi, and one tarf of other tribes. The Bedis are decendants of the original founder Nand Rup, who brought in the Vedis and the other tribes seem to have drifted in by degrees.

The land in dispute was entered a shamilat deh in the Settlements of 1856 and 1868. The same entry was repeated in 1891-92. But in 1893 the entry was changed and the land was shown as shamilat of tarf Bedi. And in 1906 and again in 1911 the Bedis took the money allowed by Government when some of the land was compulsorily acquired.

The plaintiffs, Vedi proprietors, sue for a declaration that the land is shamilat deh, and the lower Court having given them a decree the Bedis appeal.

It is urged on behalf of the Bedis that the present plaintiffs or their ancestors are nearly all identical with the parties who in 1893 admitted that the land was shamilat tarf Bedi.

We see that according to the record Tara Singh, Gopal Singh, Gurdit Singh and Harnam Singh Vedis in 1893 stated before the Deputy Superintendent that the Vedis had no concern with the shamilat, except that they were entitled to graze their cattle there free of grazing dues. But Gurdit Singh said the former entries were correct, he said the income of the shamilat went towards the expenses, and the Vedis had never taken any share of the income.

Two Brahmins and a Jogi disowned all claim to the shamilat.

Then the land was entered as shamilat tarf Bedi. Where this enquiry was held and whether the usual proclamation in the village was made are matters on which we have not been enlightened. The whole affair seems to us suspicious and we are not at all satisfied that the Vedis realised fully what their statements as recorded amounted to. What we think very probable is that the Bedis as the leading tribe managed the shamilat, taking whatever income might accrue and incurring any expense which might occur, and we think that the Vedis possibly meant nothing more than that the Bedis should continue to manage the land. Gurdit Singh's statement is clear that the former entries as to ownership were correct, and we think it probable that he was the only Vedi who understood matters fully and was aware of the effects of the proposed change in the entries.

As to the compensation money taken by the Bedis in 1906 and again in 1911, we have not been told how much this was. The Vedis may not have thought it worthwhile to dispute about in 1906 especially if, as Sher Singh, plaintiff, says (see page 42), the money was spent on the samadh of Nand Rup.

As to grazing dues plaintiffs deny that any income has ever been realised. We note that except a general statement that the Bedis had collected tirni there is no proof that any such dues have ever been collected.

The old entries are all in plaintiffs' favour and we are not satisfied, in spite of the recorded admissions of certain Vedis in 1893, that those Vedis fully understood the real state of affairs or that the old entries are incorrect. Nor are we greatly impressed by the failure of the Vedis to claim a share of the compensation in 1906. It was apparently their failure to get a share in 1911 which led to this suit.

The action of the Bedis in 1911 in taking all the compensation money was a fresh invasion of plaintiffs' right and we hold this suit to be within time.

We uphold the lower Court's decree and dismiss this appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Bengal Cess Act (IX B. C. of 1880), ss. 54, 56—Plaintiff, whether can recover road-cess on basis of re-valuation without notice under s. 54.

Plaintiff brought a suit to recover arrears of road cess due and payable under the re-valuation of 1907 in respect of certain rent-free lands held by the defendants within the plaintiff's tenure:

Held, that under the terms of section 56 of the Cess Act the notice required by section 54 not having been published by the plaintiff the defendants were not bound to pay cesses upon the basis of the re-valuation of 1907.

Appeal against the decree of the Subordinate Judge, First Court, Burdwan, dated the 20th of February 1915, affirming that of the Munsif, Additional Court, Katwa, dated the 30th of March 1914.

Babu Mohendra Nath Roy and Brojolal Chakrabarty, for the Appellants.

Babu Haraprosad Chatterjee, for Babu Hemendra Nath Sen, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit to recover arrrears of road cess in respect of certain rent free land held by the defendants within the plaintiffs' tenure. The defendants are the appellants. The only point with which we are now concerned is the plea taken by the defendants that the notice required by section 54 of the Cess Act (Bengal Act IX of 1880) has not been published by the plaintiffs. In the Court of Appeal below the learned Subordinate Judge has found that as a matter of fact the notice in question has not been published. He has, however, come to the conclusion that the defendants are concluded on the ground of res judicata by the decree made in Suit No. 370 of 1908, which was also a suit for arrears of road cess between the same parties. In that suit, however, cesses were recovered in respect of the period from 1311 to 1314. Now the present claim is made under a re-valuation, which the learned Subordinate Judge says took place in the year 1907. It is difficult, therefore, to see how in the previous suit the defendants could have taken the defence which they now put forward and on which they rely in the present suit. There appears to be nothing on the record to show that the cesses claimed in the previous suit were cesses due and payable under the re-valuation of 1907. In the circumstances we are unable to accept the view of the learned Subordinate Judge that the defendants are concluded by the decree in the previous suit. That decree being out of the way, it is clear, and it is not disputed, that under the terms of section 56 of the Act, the notice required by section 54 not having been published by the plaintiff, the defendants are not bound to pay cesses upon the basis of the re-valuation of 1907.

The result, therefore, is that this appeal is allowed, the decree of the Court below is set aside and the suit dismissed with costs throughout.

Appeal allowed.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), ss. 97, 99, 141—Right of private defence, extent of—Unlawful assembly—Rioting—Evidence Act (I of 1872), s. 154—Hostile witness—Prosecution witness making admission in favour of defence, whether hostile.

The right of private defence extends to section 141 and subsequent sections of the Penal Code just as much as it extends to any other offence punishable under the Penal Code. Where a person in possession of property sees an actual invasion of his rights to that property, if that invasion amounts to an offence under the Code, he is entitled to resist it by force and to collect for that purpose such numbers and such arms as may be absolutely necessary for this purpose, provided only that there is no time to have recourse to the protection of the Police authorities. [p. 34, col. 1.]

A witness is not necessarily hostile because in an absent-minded moment he lets out the truth. It must be shown before a witness can be declared hostile that there is good ground for believing that the statement he has made in favour of the defence is due to enmity to the prosecution. It may be an unfriendly act to let out the truth, but it is not necessarily a hostile act. [p. 33, col. 2.]

Appeal from the decision of the Sessions Judge, Monghyr, dated the 10th November 1917.

Mr. Gour Chandra Pal, for the Appellants.

The Government Pleader, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

ROE, J.—In this case the appellants have been convicted on a charge of rioting. The story told for the prosecution was that while the complainant's party was peacefully cutting crops which they had themselves grown without opposition, Fouzdar Rai mounted on a horse and carrying a garasa attacked the complainant's party with an overwhelming force, with the result that two of the complainant's party were beaten with sticks and one was struck in the stomach with a sharp cutting weapon causing an injury which resulted in his death.

The learned Sessions Judge agreeing with the Assessors is satisfied that the story of the complainant's possession is untrue. The learned Government Pleader contests this finding. His contention is correct that the burden of proof lies on the accused to show that the crops cut belonged to them. The learned Judge based his finding on this point on the discrepancies in the story told by the other party as to various crops sown on the land and various other matters which must have been within their knowledge if they had in fact been in possession and on direct admissions made by two of the complainant's witnesses. It is contended on behalf of the Crown that these two witnesses were hostile witnesses. There is much misconception in the minds of Public Prosecutors in the Courts below as to what constitutes a hostile witness. A witness is not necessarily hostile because in an absent-minded moment he lets out the truth. It must be shown before a witness can be declared hostile that there is good ground for believing that the statement he has made in favour of the defence is due to enmity to the prosecution. It may be an unfriendly act to let out the truth, but it is not necessarily a hostile act. In this case there is nothing to show any hostility in the witnesses who have made these damaging admissions. I am satisfied that the learned Judge was correct in holding that the crop, which was being cut by the complainant's party, had been grown by the accused.

There seeme to be also much misconception as to the real meaning of the decisions in Kabiruddin v. Emperor (1), Maniruddin v. Emperor (2). In Kabiruddin v. Emperor (1) the learned Sessions Judge had summed up the law to the Jury as follows:—"There can be no right of private defence, either on one side or on the other, where both parties are evidently aware of what is likely to happen and turn out in force. The right of private defence cannot be pleaded by persons who expecting to be attacked go out of their way to court an attack. When the parties of the complainant and accused are prepared to fight, it is immaterial who was the first to attack, unless it be shown that the accused were acting in the exercise of the right of private defence". The sole question before the High Court was, therefore, whether the Sessions Court had in thus stating the law misdirected the Jury. The finding of the High Court was that this was a correct statement of the law. The facts in Maniruddin v. Emperor (2) were not dissimilar. There had been a partition of certain land of which the disputed plot formed a part. There was a dispute as to the share to which the disputed plot had fallen on partition. Maniruddin collected a large number of lathials before being attacked by the other side. He took these lathials armed with deadly weapons to the land and on the way called out to his adversary "come out, haramjada, you and your sons. I am going to the field". In the circumstances of these two cases there was an obvious point which deprived the accused of the right of private defence. They had in the one case courted and in the other provoked an attack by the other side. But because of these decisions it seems to be the opinion of many Courts below and of all Police Officers that there can be no right of private defence if there has been a riot. This is not the law. The right of private defence extends to section 141 and subsequent sections, just as much as it extends to any other offence punishable under the Indian Penal Code. Where a person in possession of property sees an actual invasion of his right to that property, if that invasion amounts to an offence under the Code, he is entitled to resist it by force and to collect for that purpose such numbers and such arms as may be absolutely necessary for this purpose, provided only that there is no time to have recourse to the protection of the Police authorities. In the case before us there is nothing to suggest that the accused courted or provoked attack or knew that an attack was imminent. Had they gone to the thana to make a complaint after the attack had begun, their crops would have been removed long before the Police could arrive on the scene. I cannot hold that the accused were at any time members of an unlawful assembly. They cannot, therefore, be convicted of rioting.

(1) 35 C. 368; 7 C. L. J. 359; 12 C. W. N. 384; 7 Cr. L. J. 256; 3 M. L. T. 385.

That the right of private defence was exceeded by some members of this body of rioters is obvious. The right of private defence of property does not extend to striking a man in the stomach with a sharp cutting instrument. But, as the learned Judge has found, the charge that Fauzdar Rai himself caused this wound is obviously untrue, and since there was no unlawful assembly, the accused cannot be punished under section 149.

I would acquit all the accused and direct that they be discharged from their bail.

IMAM, J.—I am in entire agreement with the views expressed by my learned brother on the points raised by the learned Vakil on behalf of the appellants. It is quite clear on the evidence that the private prosecutor Munshi Kumar brought a number of men exceeding five to the land in possession of the appellant Fauzdar Rai and started cutting crops that were undoubtedly raised by the accused. There was resistance by the accused, which resulted in injuries on both sides. It may be that the breach of the peace was the direct result of this encounter, but we have to consider which of these two parties was in the wrong. The accused Fauzdar Rai must have the sympathy of the Court inasmuch as he was in possession and the crops were raised by him. The private prosecutor was undoubtedly an aggressor and was trying by force to cut and remove crops belonging to the accused. In the circumstances it is evident that at one point of time or another the right of private defence accrued to the accused. The question then is, when did this right begin? There being absolutely no evidence on the record to show or suggest that the appellants had any previous information of the intended visit of the private prosecutor with his men to the field, it cannot be held that the accused had notice of the trespass contemplated by Munshi Kumar. In this case the moment the trespass was committed the right in the appellants to resist that trespass and to save the crop commenced. That right was the right of private defence of property. After this the appellant Fauzdar Rai gathered together a number of his friends and adherents and went to his land to stop the aggression and resist the cutting of his crops. It cannot be said that the view of the law taken in Kalimuddin v. Emperor (1) would be applicable to the present case. I feel no hesitation in holding that in this case there was the right of private defence in the appellants and that in the exercise of that right when they came to the field they were not members of an unlawful assembly. The assembly not being an unlawful one the charge of rioting under sections 148 and 147, Indian Penal Code, as against the appellants must necessarily fail.

The conviction and sentence in this case must, therefore, be set aside.

Conviction set aside.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), ss. 441, 443, 456, 509—Lurking house trespass by night—Evidence—Intention—Presumption.

Where the evidence shows that a man has been found lurking at night inside the house of another person, a perfect stranger to him, or a person in whose house he has no apparent business, the prosecution is entitled to ask the Court to infer from these facts that there was a guilty intention on the part of the accused sufficient to bring his action within the purview of section 441 of the Penal Code. [p. 36, col. 2.]

In dealing with cases of this sort Magistrates should not overlook the existence of section 509 of the Penal Code, when they are considering the allegation on the part of the prosecution that the entry by the accused into the premises in question must presumably have been with intent to commit some offence. [p. 36, col. 2.]

Per Walsh, J.—Where in a case of house-trespass the accused alleges that he went to the house to carry on an intrigue with a woman who was the inmate of the house, then if there was an invitation or complicity by the woman, combined with an intention to preserve strict secrecy, it is difficult to say that there was any intention to annoy a third person; but if that third person had expressly prohibited the accused, then his act becomes a direct defiance to an express order, and it is impossible to say that an intention to annoy the author of the order cannot be inferred from it [p. 37, col. 2.]

Criminal reference by the District Magistrate, Banda, dated the 31st August 1917.

JUDGMENT.

IN CR. REV. NO. 837 OF 1917.

This is a case in which a conviction of lurking house-trespass by night (section 456 of the Indian Penal Code) has been recorded by the trying Magistrate and has been confirmed by the Sessions Judge on appeal. The case has come before us in revision, substantially upon the pleading that on the view of the facts taken by the learned Sessions Judge the latter ought to have held that no offence had been proved. One difficulty we must necessarily feel in dealing with the case on these lines is that the learned Sessions Judge has not definitely found the facts to lie in accordance with the argument addressed to us in support of this application. The facts in question were not alleged by the accused himself, but certain circumstances suggesting the possibility of their existence were deposed to by some of the witnesses called for the defence. The learned Sessions Judge has in effect said that even supposing the facts to be as now suggested on behalf of the accused, the conviction must be upheld. In substance the case before us is really governed by the decision of this Court in the case of Mulla v. Emperor (1) and might well have been affirmed on those grounds. Apart from this, we have just been considering in connection with Criminal Reference No. 752 of 1917 the question of law which has been discussed in connection with the present application, and we need only say that we think the conviction in the present case could be justified along the line of argument followed by the learned Sessions Judge. In saying this we are by no means admitting the facts to be as suggested on behalf of the accused. It would be unfair to do so in the face of the express denial of those facts by Musammat Bhagia (the young woman principally concerned) in the evidence given by her before the Court. We dismiss the application and confirm the conviction and sentence passed by the Magistrate. The accused must surrender to his bail to undergo the unexpired portion of his sentence,

IN CR. REF. NO. 752 OF 1917.

PIGGOTT, J.—This is a reference by the District Magistrate of Banda in a case in which one Chhote Lal was tried summarily by a First Class Magistrate of that district. The offence alleged was that of lurking house-trespass by night, and it is clear from the record that the prosecution led evidence to prove, not merely that the house of the complainant was entered by Chhote Lal under circumstances covered by the definition in section 443 of the Indian Penal Code, but also that the lurking house-trespass in question was committed with intent to commit theft. The accused in his defence admitted having been caught at night inside the house of the complainant Badri under the circumstances deposed to by the prosecution witness. He suggested that those witnesses were not speaking the truth with regard to his having stolen or attempted to steal any of Badri's property. He pleaded that his intention in effecting a secret entry into Badri's house had been to carry on an intrigue with the widowed mother of the said Badri. He pleaded further that he had entered the house at the express invitation of this woman. The trying Magistrate refused to inquire fully into the facts. He has left it uncertain whether there was any truth in the defence above set out. He says that, even on the accused's own statement of the facts, an offence, namely, the offence of lurking house-trespass by night, punishable under section 456 of the Indian Penal Code was established. He convicted and sentenced Chhote Lal accordingly. The District Magistrate, in referring the case, has relied upon the reported decision of a Judge of this Court in the case of Gaya Bhar v. Emperor (2). It has been suggested that this decision is inconsistent with that of another Judge of this Court in the case of Mulla v. Emperor (1). In our opinion the two decisions are not inconsistent and we agree substantially with both of them. When the evidence shows that a man has been found lurking at night inside the house of another person, a perfect stranger to him, or a person in whose house he has no apparent business, the prosecution will be entitled to ask the Court to infer from these facts that there was a guilty intention on the part of the accused sufficient to bring his action within the purview of section 441 of the Indian Penal Code. This was clearly laid down in the case of Balmakand Ram v. Ghansamram (3) and also in the case of Premanundo Shaha v. Brindabun Chung (4). And in dealing with cases of this sort we may remark that Magistrates should not overlook the existence of section 509 of the Indian Penal Code, when they are considering the allegation on the part of the prosecution that the entry by the accused into the premises in question must presumably have been with intent to commit some offence. Difficulties are only likely to arise when the accused himself pleads in his defence and establishes, either by direct evidence or by way of reasonable inference from proved facts, that he had some specific intention in entering the house and that the intention in question was neither to commit an offence nor to intimidate, insult or annoy any person in possession of the house. The provisions of section 106 of the Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872) may also be referred to in this connection. In the case now before us the accused alleged two things; firstly, that he had entered the house at the request of one of its inmates and, secondly, that he had no intention of insulting or annoying the complainant Badri. Presumably it might be suggested in his defence that the latter plea was sufficiently established by the precautions taken by him to conceal from Badri the fact of his presence in the house. At any rate it was clearly no part of the case for the prosecution that Badri knew of the existence of any intrigue between the accused Chhote Lal and his mother, or had ever forbidden Chhote Lal access to his house on the ground of his knowing or suspecting the existence of such intrigue. We make these remarks because we think it possible that the decision of the learned Judge of this Court in the case of Gaya Bhar v. Emperor (2) may possibly be interpreted too widely and may be held to apply to cases in which an accused person has forcibly or clandestinely entered a house which he knew to have been definitely closed and barred against him by the owner thereof. In such cases it might not be a sufficient answer to a charge of criminal trespass for the accused to say that he personally hoped that the owner would remain in ignorance of the fact of his entry. The Court may find on the facts that the intention to insult or annoy under such circumstances was so clearly inherent in the acts of the accused as to form an essential part of the purpose with which entry into the house was effected. On this point the remarks of the learned Judges of the Bombay High Court in the case of Emperor v. Lakshman Raghunath (5) are certainly pertinent. In our opinion there should have been a further enquiry into this case before the accused was either convicted or acquitted. He was anxious himself to summon the complainant's mother as his witness, and the trying Magistrate has given no valid reasons for refusing that request. It may be that this woman's evidence would have entirely satisfied the Magistrate as to the facts of the case, and the Magistrate may come to the conclusion that the allegations made by the accused in his defence are wholly false and that he has aggravated his position by putting forward these allegations and dragging a respectable woman into Court on the strength of them. On the other hand, if the Magistrate finds the facts to be as alleged by the accused, the case should be decided on the principles of law laid down in the rulings to which we have referred, including the decision of this Court in the case of Gaya Bhar v. Emperor (2) from which, if the principles laid down are properly limited and understood, we see no reason to dissent, we set aside the conviction and sentence in this case, but we do not acquit the accused Chhote Lal of the offence charged. On the contrary we direct the Magistrate to proceed with the trial, to enquire into the truth or otherwise of the defence set up and to pass such orders in the case as appear to him correct and appropriate.

WALSH, J.—I agree. What I propose to say on the question of law referred to us covers this case and also Criminal Revision No. 837 of 1917 before us for orders. I think it is a question of fact in each case. As Lord Justice Bower says in Edgington v. Fitzmaurice (6), "the state of a man's intention is as much a question of fact as the state of his digestion," and the real question of law is whether when there has been a conviction, there is any evidence of intention justifying the conviction. I think there is no conflict between the reported cases at all and I venture to sum up the result of them in this way. I think they come to this that if there is an invitation, or complicity by the woman, combined with an intention to preserve strict secrecy, then it is difficult to say that there is any intention to annoy a third person, but if that third person has expressly prohibited the accused then his act becomes a direct defiance to an express order, and it is impossible to say that you cannot infer from it an intention to annoy the author of the order. I think this is what has already been established by the decided cases. I agree with the decision of Mr. Justice Knox in Mulla v. Emperor (1) that a man found inside the complainant's house who makes no statement of reasons for being there or gives an explanation which is demonstrably false, is clearly liable to be convicted on the ground that the burden of proof lies upon him and he has not discharged it. I do not understand that Mr. Justice Sunder Lal differed from that decision. On the contrary he seems to have agreed with it. Mr. Justice Sunder Lal held in Gaya Bhar v. Emperor (2) that mere knowledge on the part of the accused that he is likely to cause annoyance is not sufficient, and in coming to that conclusion he merely followed the case of Queen-Empress v. Rayapadayachi (7), where it was held that although a man may know his act is likely to cause annoyance, it does not necessarily follow that he does the act with intent to annoy. And so far I think Mr. Justice Sunder Lal and the Madras High Court were really giving effect to the absence from this section (section 441) of the words found in a cognate section, namely, section 297, where the knowlege that the feelings of a person are likely to be wounded is one of the ingredients of the offence. This view is borne out by the decision in Emperor v. Lakshman Raghunath (5), to which my brother Piggott has already referred. In that case there was a distinct prohibition. The accused only wanted to get at their judgment-debtor and trespassed upon the complainant's house in order to do it. Some people might be annoyed by that while some people might not mind it, and an enemy of the judgment-debtor certainly would not But in the particular case the complainant forbade them to do it and it was held—and I agree with the decision—that, in the face of his order directly forbidding them, an offence was committed within this section. There is a passage in that judgment which I adopt: "When it is uncertain whether a particular result will follow (as in the Madras case in which the accused hoped to keep his conduct secret) there may be no intent to cause that result even though it may be known that the result is likely. But it seems impossible to contend when an act is done with a knowledge amounting to practical certainty that a result will follow that it is not intended to cause that result." Regard must obviously be had to all the circumstances of the case. It may sometimes happen, I suppose in this country as in others, that a man who is making love with another man's wife is doing it not merely with the tacit approval of the husband, but as the result of a conspiracy, if I may use the word, between the husband and the wife to enable the wife to get away from the husband and find a protector. Such cases are not unknown. In such a case the man might not know that his visits were approved by the husband and might think that he was successfully carrying on a secret intrigue, the truth being that the husband was assisting the wife all the time. I take it that no Court ought to find, if those facts were established and although the man complained against himself might have thought that his conduct was likely to annoy, that he had any intention of annoying the husband. I agree with the view taken by the learned Sessions Judge of Cawnpore in the case which is before us, Revision No. 837 of 1917, that if the accused knew that he had been expressly prohibited from entering the house by the uncle it is legitimate to infer that he intended to annoy by persisting. Another example is that of a son in disgrace who persists in entering his father's house after a direct prohibition. I think this feature of the case in Reference No. 837 of 1917 just marks the dividing line between the two cases. I entirely agree with the order proposed in the case before us. The facts must be ascertained before the final decision can be arrived at.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 107, 125—Petition under s. 125—Right of petitioner to be heard—Applicability of s 07—Breach of peace, apprehension of.

A District Magistrate dealing with an application under section 125 of the Code of Criminal Procedure is exercising neither appellate nor revisional jurisdiction and it is not incumbent upon him to hear the Mukhtear of the petitioner before disposing of the application. [p. 39, col. 2.]

Where acts committed by an accused person are of such a nature that the continuity of these acts or the commission of similar acts by the accused is apprehended to be tending to a breach of the peace, section 107 of the Code of Criminal Procedure is applicable notwithstanding that the acts already committed by the accused constitute specific offences under the Penal Code. [p. 40, col. 1.]

Criminal revision from an order of the Magistrate, Cuttack.

Mr. G. C. Pal, for the Petitioners.

The Assistant Government Advocate, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—The petitioners have been ordered by the Magistrate of Cuttack each to execute a bond of Rs. 100 with two sureties in a like amount each to keep the peace for one year or in default to undergo simple imprisonment for the same period unless the required security is sooner furnished. The order is made under section 118 read with section 107 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

Against this order the petitioners moved the District Magistrate of Cuttack under section 125 of the Code. The District Magistrate rejected their petition summarily, saying that he had perused the grounds of motion and the judgment of the Magistrate and that he saw no reason whatever to cancel the bonds executed by the petitioners. Against this order of the District Magistrate the petitioners have now come to this Court.

The main contention of the petitioners has been that their petition to the District Magistrate under section 125 was not legally disposed of, inasmuch as no opportunity was given to them or their Mukhtear to place their case before the District Magistrate. This ground has not been specifically taken in the petition presented to this Court but a letter, dated 2nd October 1917, purported to have been written to the learned Vakil for the petitioners by their Mukhtear who appeared for them before the District Magistrate has been filed. In this letter it is stated that the Mukhtear presented a petition, upon which the District Magistrate directed him to file a supplementary petition as the one filed was argumentative in nature. The amended petition was filed the next day when the District Magistrate had not come to Court, and it was sent to his house along with the first petition which set forth all the arguments on behalf of the petitioners. The District Magistrate in his order says that he perused the petition and also considered the judgment of the first Court and then rejected the petition summarily.

The petition under section 125 of the Code could not be treated as an appeal, for there is no appeal from an order under section 118 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. As there is a special section 125, that petition could not be treated as a petition under section 435 and, therefore, the Magistrate was not exercising either appellate or revisional jurisdiction in dealing with the petition in question. Section 125 of the Code gives power to the Magistrate to cancel any bond directed to be executed by order of any Court subordinate to him for reasons to be recorded in writing I do not think that it was incumbent upon the District Magistrate to hear the Mukhtear for the petitioners before disposing of the application under section 125. Section 440 of the Code says that no party has any right to be heard either personally or by Pleader before any Court in the exercise of its revisional power subject to the limitation of section 439, sub-clause 2, which specially provides for giving an opportunity to the accused to be heard in revision before any order is passed to his prejudice. So that unless the petition in question was an appeal or a revision which, as shown, it was not, the party had no right to be heard. The contention of the learned Vakil for the petitioners should be overruled. But I have heard the learned Vakil at length on the merits of the case and I have carefully gone through the judgment written by the Magistrate who tried the case. The proceedings before the Magistrate are not challenged as being in any way affected by illegality or any irregularity in the proceedings. It is, however, contended that there is no sufficient evidence of overt acts against the accused persons which would justify an inference that there was a likelihood of a breach of the peace to be committed by them. The Magistrate has addressed at length on this point. He has come to the conclusion that all the seven accused belong to a different faction in the village headed by accused No. 1. Khetrabasi and that the opposite party belong to the opposite faction and that the two parties are fighting for sometime; that the party of the accused is strong and overwhelming in numbers and are threatening with violence and harassing the opposite party in various ways. The Magistrate says that it has been satisfactorily proved that the accused persons threatened to beat Daitari Sahu and Uchhab Sahu, the opposite party, and harassed them in other ways and that there is every likelihood of a breach of the peace by them. The Magistrate has given specific instances when these violent acts of aggravation were committed by the accused under the orders of Khetrabasi. One instance is that the accused Daitari Sahu once threatened to beat him at the zemindar's kacheri This is said as having been corroborated by the zemi dar himself.

The accused persons are said to have gone to the house of Daitari Sahu and abused him filthily for his having deposed before the Inspector of Police in connection with the case. This is said to have been supported by the evidence of Lochan Sahu (P. W. No. 9). Daffadar (P. W. No. 11) says that the accused persons once threw brickbats into the house of Daitari Sahu. The chaukidar had to be directed to keep strict watch over the accused persons so that no breach of the peace might be committed. On the evidence the Magistrate has held that the accused and some other persons of their party held sittings at Khetra's house at intervals of 2 or 3 days at about midnight and that the people of the locality are all afraid of them.

It is contended by the learned Vakil for the petitioners that the overt acts alleged in this case were specific offences themselves and should have been dealt with under the Indian Penal Code instead of under section 107 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The argument appears to be inconsistent with the earlier part of the learned Vakil's argument where he said no overt act was proved. For an inference that there would be a likelihood of a breach of the peace it is necessary to show overt acts, but each overt act from which a breach of the peace could be inferred would be in itself an offence punishable under the Indian Penal Code. I cannot conceive an act from which an imminent danger of the breach of the peace could be gathered without that act being penal in itself. This is not a real distinction, but the distinction is that where the acts committed by the accused are of such a nature that the continuity of these acts, or the commission of similar acts by the accused is apprehended to be tending to breach of the peace, section 107 would be applicable notwithstanding that the acts already committed by the accused constituted specific offences under the Indian Penal Code.

It was also contended that the acts in this case specified by the Magistrate were past acts of long standing and that there was no immediate apprehension of the breach of the peace.

From the summary of the findings of the learned Magistrate on the point that I have given above, it is apparent that these persons are in conspiracy to annoy and to harass the opposite party and that at intervals of 2 or 3 days meetings are held at the house of accused No. 1 and further that the opposite party is so much horrified that they remain confined. The opposite party consists of only two persons who are compelled to confine themselves in their houses and are prevented from carrying on their ordinary avocation. I could not imagine a stronger case for an action under section 107, where the people of the whole village on the side of the accused have combined against two helpless persons.

The finding of the Magistrate if correct certainly justifies action under section 107. The learned Vakil does not challenge the finding upon the ground that it is not based upon evidence, and as a matter of fact the evidence that has been placed before him goes to show that the findings are justified by the facts on the record.

I, therefore, do not find any ground for interfering in this case. I reject the petition.

Petition dismissed.

Persons who exercise their right of resisting an unlawful trespass on their property do not become members of an unlawful assembly by repelling attacks made on them or by exceeding their right of private defence. [p. 41, col. 1.]

High Court to revise the judgment of the Court of Session, Kistna Division, in Criminal Appeal No. 57 of 1916, preferred against that of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, Bhemavaram, in Calendar Case No. 6 of 1916.

ORDER.—The evidence shows that the Bodi was irrigating the lands of 1st accused and that at least from 1901 the lands of the opposite party were not irrigated by it. The Sessions Judge finds that the spout was only capable of irrigating two acres, which is the extent of field No. 418 belonging to 1st accused. The Deputy Magistrate in the counter-case finds that the Kapus went to the field of the accused in the present case with a spear and sticks to enforce their right and repair the Bodi and ready to repel by force any obstruction to their interfering with the Bodi.

I have little doubt that the accused had the right to prevent the Kapus from entering upon their fields and interfering with the Bodi on it. It is difficult to see how they lost the right of private defence because they did not send word to the Police Station six miles off. By the time a person could have gone there and returned with Police help, the Kapus would have trespassed on the land of the 1st accused and gained all they would. The 1st accused and those on the land were justified in getting help and resisting the trespass attempted by the Kapus.

The only question is whether the accused or any of them exceeded their right of private defence. In this connection I may point out that persons exercising their right are not members of an unlawful assembly by repelling attacks made on them or by exceeding the right of private defence. See Knnja Bhuniya v. Emperor (1). If any person exceeds his right of private defence he will be individually liable for any injury caused.

So far as the accused Nos. 1 to 3 are concerned, the Deputy Magistrate finds that they did not cause hurt to anybody and the Sessions Judge did not differ from him. They were clearly within their right in resisting the attempt of the Kapus to trespass on their land and, as they have not exceeded their right of private defence, it is difficult to see how they can be convicted of any offence. The learned Public Prosecutor is unable to support the conviction so far as they are concerned. As regards the other accused there is the finding that they exceeded the right of private defence. It would have been more satisfactory if the Sessions Judge had discussed the evidence as against each accused, as he was bound to do: In re Ramasamy Naidu (2), but I think no useful purpose will be served by sending the case back.

I set aside the conviction and sentence against accused Nos. 1 to 3 and confirm the conviction as against the other accused. The security bond executed by accused Nos. 1 to 3 will be cancelled.

Conviction against accused Nos. 1 to 3 set aside.

Under section 145 of the Code of Criminal Procedure a Magistrate has in cases of emergency the power to attach the subject in dispute, but he has no power at that stage to appoint a Receiver. [p. 43, col. 1: p. 45, col 2.]

Where a Magistrate takes proceedings under section 145 of the Criminal Procedure Code the object of the law is that he shall confirm the party in actual possession He is not competent to dispossess such a party by appointing a Receiver and the order of attachment which the law empowers him to make has no greater force than any Civil Court attachment the effect of which is generally to restrain alienations. [p. 43, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.

MULLICK, J.—On the 14th of June last a lady named Dulhin Jagat Rup Kuer died in Mouza Lowahi.

It appears that an application was made to the Sub-Divisional Magistrate of Sitamarhi by Musammat Gulab Kuer claiming the house and the moveable and immoveable properties of the lady. In consequence of that application the Sub-Divisional Magistrate went to Lowahi and recorded proceedings under section 145 of the Criminal Procedure Code calling upon Musammat Genda Kuer, first party, Musammat Gulab Kuer, second party, and four other persons described as the third party, to appear before him on the 1st July to support their respective claims to the immoveable properties. At the same time the learned Sub-Divisional Magistrate attached the house under the provisions of section 145 and appointed a gentleman, named Mr. Everett, who was the Manager of Musammat Dulhin Jagat Rup Kuer, as Receiver. On the 16th of June, Mr. Everett appears to have sent a telegram to the Sub-Divisional Magistrate making certain complaints against the servants of Musammat Dulhin Genda Kuer, the first party. That telegram is not on the record, but it is alleged that the complaint was that the servants of Musammat Dulhin Genda Kuer were attempting to loot the properties of the deceased lady. Thereupon the Sub-Divisional Magistrate passed the following order on the Sub-Inspector of Police:—

"Mr. Everett informs me that peon and amlas have been sent to Lawahi by Babu Sarjug Prasad. Go to Lawahi and turn them out and report their names to me. You will obtain Mr. Everett's signature on this paper in token of this having been done to his satisfaction and return this paper to me by to-morrow."

On the 18th of June the Sub-Inspector of Police proceeded to Lawahi and was unsuccessful in inducing the servants of Musammat Dulhin Genda Kuer to leave the premises and he submitted the following report to the Sub-Divisional Magistrate:—"Sir, I proceeded to Lawahi immediately on receipt of the order with the constables available in the Police Station. Babu Brijbihari Singh, who was present here with his peons, did not obey the orders and wrote down a note of disobedience which I herewith attach. I recommend for their prosecution under section 188, Indian Penal Code, and submit a separate report."

The note of disobedience is to the following effect:—

"The Magistrate's order to withdraw has been read over to me to day the 18th June, 1917, at 10-30 A. M. at Lawahi, which I refuse to obey till the proper attachment of the property is done and list prepared."

On the Sub-Inspector's report the Sub-Divisional Magistrate himself proceeded to the house of Musammat Dulhin Jagat Rup Kuer on the 19th of June, 1917, and finding the seven petitioners, who appear to be servants of Musammat Dulhin Genda Kuer, on the premises he arrested them of his own motion and took proceedings for their prosecution under section 448 of the Indian Penal Code. He held a summary trial on the spot and after examining three witnesses for the prosecution convicted the petitioners under section 448, Indian Penal Code, and sentenced them to rigorous imprisonment for one month each.

An application was made to the Sessions Judge against these convictions and sentences but without success. The petitioners have accordingly come to this Court.

Now the first question that arises is whether the appointment of the Receiver was a legal appointment in this case. Under section 145, Criminal Procedure Code, as amended, a Magistrate has in cases of emergency the power to attach the subject in dispute, but it does not appear that he has any power at that stage to appoint a Receiver. There is authority for the proposition that he cannot appoint a Receiver except under section 146, Srinivasa Pillay v. Sathayappa Pillay (1), and the reason for this is quite clear. Where the Magistrate finds that nobody is in possession or that the evidence is so conflicting that it is impossible to find who is in possession, the Magistrate is empowered to attach and to appoint a Receiver, who will take physical possession of the property; but that state of affairs does not exist before the enquiry has been made. When a Magistrate takes proceeedings under section 145 the object of the law is that he shall confirm the party in actual possession. He is certainly not competent to dispossess such a party by appointing a Receiver, and the order of attachment which the law empowers him to make has no greater force than any Civil Court attachment, the effect of which is generally to restrain alienations. The allegation is that Musammat Dulhin Genda Kuer had immediately after the death of Musammat Dulhin Jagat Rup Kuer proceeded to the house and performed the sradh ceremony, but of this we have no evidence before us. It is an undisputed fact, however, that her servants were in possession of at least one outhouse at the time when the Magistrate made his order of attachment and that Mr. Everett was not competent at that stage of the proceedings to eject them. Therefore, unless they committed any Criminal act after that date, it does not appear that there was any ground for proceeding against them. The Magistrate in his explanation suggests that there was a fear that the petitioners would loot the house. It does not appear from Mr. Everett's evidence or indeed from any other evidence on the record that this was the case. When the Sub-Inspector of Police appeared on the scene on th 18th of June, the conduct of Brijbihari Singh was no doubt contumacious, but I am unable to say upon the evidence before us that either he or his subordinates were guilty of any Criminal offence. He stated that he would not vacate the outhouse until a proper attachment had been made and until a list of the property had been prepared.

Now the essence of an offence under section 448 is that there should be an intention to insult, annoy or intimidate the owner of the property or such person as was acting on behalf of the owner. Even assuming that Mr. Everett had been duly appointed to act on behalf of the owner, it does not appear from the conduct of the petitioners that they in any way interfered with his possession or with due performance of his duties. It is stated by the Sub-Inspector of Police in the enclosure to his report of the 18th of June that the petitioners were armed with lathis, but it appears from Mr. Everett's evidence that the lathis were in the kutchery and that the petitioners did not show any intention of using them. On the contrary the conduct of the petitioners was, in my opinion, quite consistent with the plea that they acted in good faith and with the sole object of preventing rival claimants from carrying away any moveable property from the house. From Mr. Everett's evidence it is clear that the house was not securely locked and it is in evidence that the learned Sub-Divisional Magistrate on the 18th of June found a sum of Rs. 20,000 in cash which he carried away to the local treasury.

In these circumstances I think that the plea of bona fides has been made out and that as the petitioners were there merely for the purpose of guarding the property or assisting Mr. Everett in guarding the property, no offence under section 448 has been made out.

Then as regards procedure, I agree that the trial was irregular. The learned Sub-Divisional Magistrate, inspite of the protests of the accused, tried the case at the house of the deceased lady without giving the petitioners the opportunity of being represented by legal practitioners or calling defence witnesses. The learned

Sub-Divisional Magistrate was certainly competent to arrest the accused and to put them on their trial. But in my opinion he exercised his jurisdiction with material irregularity in holding the trial at a place where the accused were totally incapable of making a proper defence. It does not appear that there was any particular reason why the accused could not either have been taken forthwith to the learned Sub-Divisional Magistrate's headquarters or enlarged on bail and tried in accordance with law after being accorded the assistance which they required.

An objection has been taken by Mr. Manuk as to the jurisdiction of the learned Magistrate to try the case himself. It is urged that he acted under section 190 (c) of the Code of Criminal Procedure and that he was not competent to hold the trial himself.

Now although the Magistrate's reason for going to the place of occurrence on the 19th of June was in the first instance prompted by the telegram received from Mr. Everett on the 16th June, I think the report of the Sub-Inspector of Police of the 18th June may be taken to be a report stating facts which constitute the offence of Criminal house-trespass. It is true that the Sub-Inspector of Police himself asked for a prosecution under section 188, Indian Penal Code, only, but the learned Magistrate was competent on the perusal of the report to put the accused on trial for an offence under section 448, Indian Penal Code, if that offence was disclosed upon the facts alleged in the report. Therefore, so far as this ground of objection is concerned, I do not think the learned Counsel for the petitioners has made out his case, but upon the substantial part of his case I agree with him and hold that the convictions and sentences were illegal and should be set aside. The petitioners will be discharged from their bail.

JWALA PRASAD, J.—I agree to the order proposed by my learned brother that the convictions in this case should be set aside. The petitioners cannot possibly be said to be guilty under section 448, for the simple reason that it has not been shown from the evidence on the record that there was any intention on their part to intimidate, insult or annoy any person in possession of the property. This is an essential ingredient for an offence under section 448. The whole case against the petitioners is due to their refusal to obey the order of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate conveyed to them by the Sub-Inspector of Police on the 18th of June 1917. Babu Brij Bihari Singh, the Manager of Musammat Dulhin Genda Kuer, who is said to have been acting as the head of the petitioners at that time, refused to obey the order upon the ground that he would remain upon the premises "till the proper attachment of the property had been done and a list prepared." This shows the intention of Babu Brij Bihari Singh and his men. The house in question belonged to Musammat Dulhin Jagat Rup Kuer who died on the 14th of June, that is, only four days before the order of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate was passed upon the petitioners to leave the premises. She was possessed of large property, moveable and immoveable, as the proceeding under section 145 shows. The house itself is said to have contained very valuable property, so much so that when the list was made by the Court of Wards a large sum of money was found in the house, which was removed to the Sitamarhi Sub-Treasury. Musammat Dulhin Genda Kuer, on whose behalf Babu Brij Behari Singh and the petitioners were acting, treated this property as belonging to her adopted son. On the 15th of June when the Sub-Divisional Magistrate arrived on the spot the only thing that was done was to put some seals here and there, but the proper inventory of the properties was not made and the custody of all moveable property in the house was not taken. The decision of the learned District Judge under the Curators Act (Act XIX of 1841) disposing of the claim of the contending parties to the properties of Musammat Dulhin Jagat Rup Kuer shows that the adopted boy of Musammat Genda Kuer was held to be the rightful owner of the estate left by the deceased lady, and that he was in rightful possession of the property. This subsequent event I have mentioned only with a view to show what must have been the intention of the petitioners at the time when they refused to obey the order of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate. The petitioners refused clearly and boldly, what the Sub-Inspector says sternly, to obey the order of the Sub Divisional Magistrate, because Brij Bihari Singh was at that time conscious of his possession and was fully aware of the danger of leaving the property as it was; and because in the interest of his mistress and the rightful owner of the property he thought he was entitled to remain on the premises and to guard the properties from being removed by the rival claimants or by strangers or from any charge of misappropriation. The petitioners were also interested in a proper list being made of the properties so that no possible charge of theft or misappropriation be brought against them, for just two or three days before the petitioners with their mistress had been in the house after the death of the Musammat Dulhin Jagat Rup Kuer. All that has been proved in the evidence in this case is that the petitioners were in an outhouse of the premises and that they had some lathis in that room. This is consistent with the conduct of persons intent on guarding the properties supposed to belong to them. There is no charge made against them by any of the witnesses, even by Mr. Everett, that the petitioners ever attempted to use violence or ever attempted to force themselves into the house or to remove or touch any of the properties in the house. If we are to judge the intentions of the petitioners by their overt acts, there is only one inference, that the petitioners believed themselves and were acting bona fide in order to guard the properties. This is sufficient to dispose of the present application of the petitioners. Section 448 is not at all applicable to this case. I have no doubt in my mind as to the impropriety of the order passed by the Magistrate under section 145 at that stage, still more uncalled-for was the order of attachment and the appointment of the Receiver at that stage. If the Magistrate thought, and I think that he had reason to think, that there was likelihood of a breach of the peace among the rival claimants to the property of Musummat Dulhin Jagat Rup Kuer, the proper and effective action was under section 144 of the Criminal Procedure Code made to give the Magistrate time to take necessary measures under section 107 or 145 of the Criminal Procedure Code. The order under section 144 would have all the desired effect of preventing a breach of the peace and of preventing the property being interfered with or removed by any of the rival claimants. Mr. Everett, as has been clearly shown by my learned brother, was not the properly constituted Receiver under that Act. He had no right to dispossess or to turn out a person who was in possession of the house. In the present case some of the servants of Musammat Dulhin Genda Kuer were in one of the outhouses before the proceedings under section 145 were instituted. What would have been the effect of the order under section 145 passed on the spot attaching the property and appointing a Receiver thereof if Musummat Dulhin Genda Kuer had herself been on the premises? Probably the Receiver armed with that order would have, as he had done in this case, attempted to turn out the lady from the premises. This is to illustrate how premature was the action of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate in appointing a Receiver at that stage. A Receiver is appointed only when the Magistrate is unable to decide which of the parties is in possession and has a right to remain in possession, and considers it necessary that the property should vest in some person appointed by the Court under section 146. During the pendency of section 145 proceedings the Magistrate can attach the property the subject-matter of dispute, but there is no provision in section 145 for the appointment of a Receiver consequent upon attachment, as in section 146. As said by my learned brother, an attachment under section 145 may have the same effect as an attachment under the Civil Procedure Code. It may possibly amount to something more than that, that is to say, after attachment the Magistrate may take steps for proper care and custody of the property and prevent the removal of the property by any of the rival claimants or strangers. In the present case the petitioners were not trying to remove, or in any way interfere with, the properties attached but were simply guarding them.

For all these reasons I agree that the convictions and sentences should be set aside and the petitioners discharged from their bail.

Convictions and sentences set aside.

SHAHAB-UD-DIN—CONVICT—PETITIONER

EMPEROR THROUGH MUNICIPAL COMMITTEE, HOSHIARPUR—COMPLAINANT—RESPONDENT.

Punjab Municipal Act III of 1911), ss. 13 (a), 175, 219—Street—Removal of obstruction, when justified—Private property.

Section 175 of the Punjab Municipal Act does not authorise a Municipal Committee to call upon anybody to remove a projection or an obstruction, unless it is proved by the Committee that the site on which the projection or obstruction stands is part of a "street" within the meaning of section 13 (a) of the Act. [p. 46, col. 2]

Where, therefore, the petitioner was convicted under section 219 of the Punjab Municipal Act and ordered to demolish a latrine situated in a street close to his house and it appeared that the latrine had been in existence for 65 years, during which time the Municipal Committee treated it as private property:

Held, that the conviction could not stand. [p. 47, col. 1.]

Petition for revision, under section 439 of the Criminal Procedure Code, from the order of the District Magistrate, Hoshiarpur, dated the 6th January 1917, confirming that of the Magistrate of the Second Class, Hoshiarpur, dated the 30th June 1916, convicting the petitioner.

The Hon'ble Mr. Fazl-i-Husain, for the Petitioner.

JUDGMENT.—In this case the petitioner Shahab-ud-Din has been convicted by Lala Banwari Lal, Tahsildar and Magistrate of the Second Class, Hoshiarpur, under section 219 of the Punjab Municipal Act, III of 1911, and ordered to pay a fine of Rs. 10 and to demolish within one week a latrine situate in a street close to his house. The sole question for decision in this revision is whether the site of the latrine in question is part of a street or not; for it is not disputed that if it is not part of a street within the meaning of the Municipal Act, section 175 of the Act, under which a notice was issued to the petitioner by the Municipal Committee of Hoshiarpur requiring him to remove the latrine, would be inapplicable to the case and the conviction under section 219 would not be justified. The District Magistrate, to whom an appeal was preferred by the petitioner from the Magistrate's order convicting him under section 219 of the Municipal Act, has only incidentally observed in his judgment that the piece of the land on which the latrine stands forms part of a street; but the ground on which he has maintained the order of the Magistrate is that since the latrine is right up against the wall of one Lala Basant Rai's house and other people have also to pass the corner in which it is situated, the Municipal Committee is justified in ordering its demolition. It is clear to my mind that the ground on which the District Magistrate has based his order is absolutely untenable; for unless it is proved by the Municipal Committee that the site on which the latrine stands is part of a "street" within the meaning of section 13 (a) of the Municipal Act, section 175 of the Act will not justify the Municipal Committee in requiring the petitioner to remove the latrine. A reference to the record of the case decided in 1871, Kamal Din v. Basant Rai, shows that the latrine in question had been in existence for a long time before 1871 and belonged to one Dulo Kunjra. It stood on the site which was clearly not part of a street, as is shown by the decision of Munshi Muhammad Said-ud-Din Khan, Extra Assistant Commissioner, dated the 5th October 1871. The inference drawn by the Magistrate in the present case from the report of Munshi Hissam-ud-Din, Tahsildar, in the 1871 case and from the plan which is on the record of that case (a copy of which, Exhibit G, is on the present record) is based upon an obvious misconception as to the decision given by Munshi Muhammad Said-ud Din Khan. The latrine, together with its site, has since 1871 formed the subject of several alienations; and the Tahsildar Magistrate admits that the latrine in question has been in existence for the last 65 years. Upon the material on the record there can be no doubt whatever that the petitioner Shahab-ud-Din is owner of the latrine in question; and it is also proved that the Municipal Committee treated it as private property and not part of a street and gave permission to Ganga Ram in 1897 and to the petitioner in 1908 and 1910 to add to it and to roof it over, thereby admitting the right of the owners of it to its user as a latrine and as part of the petitioner's private property.

I hold that the order of the Magistrate convicting the petitioner under section 219 of the Municipal Act was not justified; and I accordingly accept this revision and set aside the Magistrate's order. The fine, if realized, will be refunded to the petitioner.

Petition allowed.

EMPEROR—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 234, 235—Distinct offences committed within 12 months—Joint trial, how far permissible.

Where an accused person commits more than three offences of the same kind within 12 months by distinct, separate and wholly unconnected acts, he may be tried in batches of three at each trial under separate charges. [p. 48, col. 2.]

Where the motive or object which actuates an accused in the commission of several distinct offences of the same kind is the same, the offences do not necessarily constitute one and the same transaction within the meaning of section 235 of the Criminal Procedure Code. [p. 48, col. 2.]

Miscellaneous Criminal revision against an order of the Deputy Magistrate, Darbhanga.

Mr. Rajender Prasad, for the Petitioner.

Mr. Fakhruddin, Government Pleader, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—The accused Sital Prasad was a servant in the Rayan Sugar Factory and he was charged by the General Manager of the factory with having on the 12th of March 1917 issued two false receipts to tenants who came to the factory with the object of selling and delivering sugarcane to the factory, the substance of the offence being that the accused Sital Prasad issued receipts for sugarcane which never was delivered in fact and thus enabled tenants to obtain money from the factory for sugarcane which had never been supplied.

The accused apparently in the month of March 1917 resorted to this form of deception in a series of transactions. A charge was, however, preferred against the accused by Mr. Hoskins, the General Manager of the factory, in respect of two false receipts alleged to have been issued by the accused on the 12th of March 1917 and the accused was charged under sections 468 and 477 (a) of the Indian Penal Code—the charge under section 468 being for forgery with intent to cheat and the charge under section 477 (a) being in respect of the falsifications of accounts with intent to defraud. These two transactions by no means formed the entire of the accused's defalcations or wrong-doing, because on the 4th and the 8th of March he also issued two other false receipts to two other tenants who came to deliver sugarcane to the factory for sugarcane which was not in fact supplied. The charge that has been preferred by Mr. Hoskins under sections 468 and 477 (a) of the Indian Penal Code has been committed to the Court of Session for trial.

A servant of the factory has, since the former case was committed for trial, preferred another charge against the accused under section 420 of the Indian Penal Code in respect of the false receipts issued by him on the 4th and 8th of March 1917. Apparently from the dates it would appear that these offences, more than three in number, were committed within a space of twelve months from the time the first to the last of these offences were committed.

It is contended before me by Mr. Rajender Prasad who appears on behalf of the accused that inasmuch as the charges which have been now made or preferred against the accused are of the same kind as those with which he is being tried in the Sessions Court and exceed three in number, that, therefore, under the provisions of section 234 of the Code of Criminal Procedure the accused cannot be tried for any such offences in excess of the first batch of three. The learned Judges who granted this Rule seem to indicate that to try the accused for more than three charges if the offences took place within the period of twelve months, would be contrary to the spirit of section 234 of the Criminal Procedure Code. I myself cannot follow that line of reasoning, which is unsupported by any authority and which is inconsistent with the only authority which has been cited before me, namely, the case reported as Empress v.

Dononjoy Baraj (1). The provision contained in section 234 of the Code of Criminal Procedure is merely this; that you shall not, at one trial, try an accused for more than three offences of the same kind committed within the space of twelve months from the first to the last. But I do not see any reason for the suggestion that if a person commits 50 different offences within 12 months of the same kind, you can only try him for three and must necessarily abandon the trial of all charges in respect of the remaining 47 offences. In the case referred to as Empress v. Dononjoy Baraj (1), the learned Judges, considering section 453 of the old Code of Criminal Procedure which is almost word for word the same as section 234 of the present Code, say: "Section 453 of the Criminal Procedure Code modifies section 452, which requires a separate charge and a separate trial for every distinct offence, by allowing three charges of three distinct offences of the same kind and committed within one year of each other to be tried at the same time; but this does not mean that, if at one time or within one year a man commits fifty distinct offences of the same kind, he shall not in one day be prosecuted for more than three such offences." This decision seems to be directly in point and to be the correct interpretation and construction to be put upon section 234 of the existing Criminal Procedure Code.

In the alternative it is contended that under the provisions of section 235 the facts out of which the several offences arose formed one and the same transaction and that thus they constituted one offence for which the accused may be charged and tried at one trial as for one offence. The only ground on which it is suggested that these offences formed one and the same transaction is that the motive or object underlying the commission of all these offences was the same, namely, to cheat the factory. It is admitted that the offences were committed on different dates, namely, on the 4th of March, 8th of March and the 12th of March; but it is contended that inasmuch as the motive or object which actuated the accused in the commission of all the offences was the same, that, therefore, the offences constituted one and the same transaction. Clearly this cannot be the meaning of "one and the same transaction" contemplated by section 235 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. That section expresses in its own phraseology what constitutes one and the same transaction and provides that if a series of acts are so connected and more offences than one are committed by the same person he may be charged with and tried at one trial for such offences as one offence.

In my opinion in this case the acts were distinct and separate and wholly unconnected, and the accused is thus liable to be tried separately for each one of such offences or, as more than three offences of the same kind were committed within 12 months, then in batches of three at each trial under separate charges. The argument which has been addressed to me that the case which has been instituted against the accused under section 420 of the Indian Penal Code is illegal must therefore, fail and this application must be disallowed.

Mr. Rajender Prasad has made a very strong appeal to me on the question of punishment. He says it is undesirable that the cases preferred against the accused being ejusdem generis should be tried by different Courts, because such a course might result in punishment being piled up against the accused by different tribunals, one having no knowledge of the punishment awarded by a different Court in a different case. This argument appeals to me and I consider it right and proper that one Court should have seisin of both cases. I would, therefore, suggest to the learned Deputy Magistrate who has now seisin of the charge under section 420 of the Indian Penal Code that as soon as the case is ready it would be right and proper to commit it to the Court of Session for trial with the analogous case pending against the accused under sections 468 and 477 (a) of the Indian Penal Code.

Application rejected.

Bengal Tenancy Act (VIII B C. of 1885), s. 49—Notice to quit by several joint landlords signed by one only, validity of.

A notice under section 49 of the Bengal Tenancy Act purporting to emanate from three landlords but in fact signed by one of them is a proper notice to quit.

There is no necessity that the notice should be signed by the landlord at all. It is sufficient if the notice is at the instance of the landlord calling upon the under-raiyat to quit the land.

Mohendra Nath Sarkar v. Biswa Nath Haldar, 6 C. W. N. 183; 29 C. 231, followed.

Appeal against the decree of the District Judge, Rungpur, dated the 18th March 1915, reversing that of the Munsif, 1st Court at Gaibandha, dated the 8th April 1914.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Babu Girija Prosanna Sanyal for Babu Atul Chundra Gupta, for the Appellants.—The plaintiffs are the appellants, and the appeal arises out of a suit for ejectment of an under-raiyat. The question is whether the notice to quit given under section 49 of the Bengal Tenancy Act was a sufficient and valid notice. There are several landlords and the notice, although it purported to have been given by all, was not signed by all the landlords. The lower Appellate Court was wrong in holding that the notice was not in conformity with the provisions of law. The signature of the landlords is not necessary. It is sufficient if the tenant can have knowledge from the notice that he has been required by his landlord to quit the land. A notice given at the instance of the landlord calling upon the under-raiyat to quit the land is a good and valid notice. See Mohendra Nath Sarkar v. Biswa Nath Haldar (1).

Babu D. N. Bagchi, for the Respondent.—Although the notice need not be signed by all the landlords, yet from the notice it must appear that the under-raiyat was required by all the joint landlords to quit the land. The notice served upon the under-raiyat does not show that the tenant was called upon by all the landlords to quit the land. Therefore, the notice was bad in law and the suit should fail on that account.

Babu Girija Prosanna Sanyal in reply.

JUDGMENT.

CHITTY, J.—In this case the plaintiffs sued in ejectment after notice under section 49 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. The notice purports, as the District Judge has found, to have emanated from all the three plaintiffs, but it was in fact signed by plaintiff No. 1 only. On that ground, without enquiring further into the facts, the District Judge has thrown out the plaintiffs' case. It is clear that this decision is erroneous. The first Court found on the first issue that the notice was duly served and that it was valid and sufficient. The learned District Judge reversed the Munsif's decision on this point alone. His decision is against a decision of this Court in the case of Mohendra Nath Sarkar v. Biswa Nath Haldar (1). There the Court held, and I may say I entirely agree, that "there is no necessity that the notice should be signed by the landlord at all. It is sufficient if the notice is at the instance of the landlord calling upon the under raiyat to quit the land." The learned Judges there remarked: "It is quite immaterial whether the notice is actually given by the landlord himself, or at his instance, provided that the notice signifies to the under raiyat that the landlord has called upon him to quit the land." Here, as the Judge says, the notice purports to emanate from the three plaintiffs. The tenant ought certainly to have regarded it as so emanating, and, no doubt, he did so. The plaintiffs also regarded it as a proper notice to quit, on which they have filed the suit.

The decree of the learned District Judge must be set aside and the case remanded to him to be decided on the other points arising for determination. The plaintiffs-appellants must have their costs of this appeal from the defendant-respondent.

SMITHER, J.—I agree.

Decree set aside; Case remanded.

Court Fees Act (VII of 1870), ss. 12, 17, Sch. I, Art. 1—Mortgage suit—Appeal or cross-objection—Costs, appeal in respect of—Court-fee payable—Taxing Judge, power of—Procedure.

In the case of appeals or cross-objections in suits for redemption or foreclosure in all cases whether a decree for interest has been made in them or not, in which the Court-fee declared by the Court to be due at the date of the decree can be ascertained by reference to the judgment and the decree, it is that amount at which the appeal or cross-objection should be valued and future interest should not be taken into account—i.e., in all original appeals the Court-fee should be levied on the sum due at the date of the original decree and in all second appeals it should be levied on the sum due at the date of the decree of the lower Appellate Court. [p. 51, col. 1.]

When an appeal against costs is distinct and separate from the other parts of the appeal, Court-fee must be paid ad valorem on the costs decreed. [p. 51, col. 1.]

When it is the appellant who failed to pay sufficient Court-fees in the Court below, his appeal will not be heard till the deficiency has been made good. [p. 51, col. 2.]

Where it was the respondent who was in default, no decree shall be executed in his favour until the deficiency has been made good. [p. 51, col. 2.]

The decision of the Taxing Officer in the matter of Court-fees is final. The Court-fee fixed by him must be paid. [p. 51, col. 1.]

Stamp Reference.

FACTS.—Several appeals, including the one noted above, falling in one or the other of the following two types of cases cropped up in the High Court:—

(1) In a suit brought upon a mortgage-deed for recovery of mortgage money (principal and interest) by sale of the mortgaged property, the lower Court decreed the suit and allowed interest at a certain rate from the date of the suit to the date of grace fixed by it in the preliminary decree for sale. The defendant appealed to the High Court. He valued his appeal at the amount claimed by the plaintiff at the date of the suit and paid ad valorem Court-fees on that amount. The stamp reporter relying on Raghbir Prosad v. Shanker Bux Singh (1) submitted that the value of the appeal was the amount declared due at the date of the decree, which included interest from the date of the suit till the date of decree. The appeal was, therefore, undervalued and understamped.

2. In a suit for partition and for mesne profits, the Court awarded decree with costs. Some of the defendants appealed to the High Court. The subject-matter in dispute in appeal was not only the question of partition and mesne profits but also the amount of costs taxed against the appellant in the decree of the Court below. The appellant sought a distinct relief in respect of costs awarded by the decree appealed against. The stamp reporter submitted that the appellant should have paid ad valorem Court-fees in respect of costs, which he questioned in the appeal. He relied on Makki, In re (2), Debendra Mohan Rai v. Sona Kunwar (3) and Krishnaji v. Babaji (4).

All the cases falling under the above two types of cases were referred to the Taxing Officer under section 5 of the Court Fees Act. The Taxing Officer agreed with the stamp reporter, but thinking that the questions involved in the cases were of general importance referred them to the Taxing Judge under the same section for orders.

Mr. Naresh Chandra Sinha, for the Appellants.

ORDER.—Three questions have been referred to me.

1. On what principle should fees be levied in appeals in mortgage suits in which a decree for interest has been made?

2. What is the correct Court-fee when relief is sought with regard to costs independently of the result of the main contest between the parties?

3. What are the Taxing Officer's powers under section 12 of the Court Fees Act?

An application has also been made to me in Court to either refer the matter to a Division Bench, or pass an order that will be open to appeal under the Letters Patent.

The attention of the Bar may be drawn to the case reported as Khachera v.

(1) 21 Ind. Cas. 723; 11 A. L. J. 1016; 36 A. 40.

(2) 19 M. 350; 6 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 950.

(4) B. H. C. Unrep. P. J. (1892-1894), 52.

Kharag Singh (5). A Division Bench has no power to deal with a stamp reference even when made by the Taxing Judge. Nor in my view will it avail the Bar to refuse to pay the Court-fees fixed by the Taxing Officer, and then apply to the Division Bench, before whom the case is laid for orders, to revise the order of the Taxing Officer, Koer Karan Singh v. Gopal Rai (6).

The decision of the Taxing Officer is final. The Court-fee fixed by him must be paid.

My decision on the points submitted after hearing the points fully argued is:—

1. In the case of appeals or cross-objections in suits for redemption or foreclosure, in all cases in which the amount declared by the Court to be due at the date of the decree can be ascertained by reference to the judgment and the decree, it is that amount at which the appeal or cross-objection should be valued and future interest should not be taken into account. See Raghbir Prosad v. Shanker Bux Singh (1) and compare Vithal Hari Athavle v. Govind Vasudeo Thosur (7) with Reference under Court Fees Act, 1870 (8).

The effect of this will be that in all original appeals the Court-fee will be levied on the sum due at the date of the original decree. In all second appeals the Court-fee will be levied on the sum due at the date of the decree of the lower Appellate Court.

2. This case falls under section 17.

When the appeal against costs is distinct and separate from other parts of the appeal, Court-fees must be paid ad valorem on the costs decreed.

3. The position of the Court in these cases is clearly defined in Narain Singh v. Chaturbhuj Singh (9)

When it was the appellant who failed to pay sufficient fees in the Courts below, his appeal will not be heard till the deficiency has been made good.

Where it was the respondent who was in fault, no decree shall be executed in his favour, until the deficiency has been made good.

Order accordingly.

FIRST CIVIL APPEAL No. 49 OF 1917.

January 11, 1918.

Present:—Sir Henry Drake-Brockman, KT., J. C.

RAO VINAYAK AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—APPELLANTS

LAXMAN AND OTHERS—PLAINTIFFS—RESPONDENTS.

Hindu Law—Joint family—Relinquishment by one co-parcener of his share in favour of some of other members of co-parcenary body, effect of—Alienation by co-parcener of joint family property without consent of other co-parceners, validity of—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XLI, r. 33, scope of.

A relinquishment of his share by one member of the co-parcenary body in a joint Hindu family in favour of some members of the body does not enure to the benefit of those members only but enures to that of the entire co-parcenary body. [p. 54, col. 2; p. 55, col. 1.]

Peddayya v. Ramalingam, 11 M. 406; 4 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 283, Thangavelu Pillai v. Doraisami Pillai, 26 Ind. Cas. 211; 27 M. L. J. 272; 16 M. L. T. 393, distinguished.

Under the Law of the Mitakshara joint family property owned by all the members of the family as co-parceners cannot be the subject of a gift, sale or mortgage by one co-parcener except with the consent, express or implied, of all other co-parceners. Any deed of gift, sale or mortgage granted by one co-parcener on his own account of or over the joint family property is invalid and the estate is wholly unaffected by it and in its entirety stands free of it. [p. 54, col. 2.]

Order XLI, rule 33, of the Civil Procedure Code gives to an Appellate Court power to pass any decree and make any order which ought to have been passed or made, the object of the rule being manifestly to enable the Court to do complete justice between the parties to the appeal; but the provision is not intended to enable a defendant to obtain for a plaintiff, not a party to the appeal, a relief which the latter never asked for. [p. 55, col. 2.]

Appeal from the decree of the Court of the District Judge, Saugor, dated the 26th January 1917, in Civil Suit No. 4 of 1916.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Mr. M. B. Kinkhede (with him Mr. D. T. Mangalmoorti), for the Appellants.—The only question is about the effect of the release, whether it operates for the benefit of plaintiffs Nos. 1 and 3 only or of them and defendants Nos. 6 to 8 also. The law on this point is discussed by Trevelyan in his Hindu Law on page 223 and 329 and by Mayne on page 488 of his Treatise on Hindu Law. Peddayya v. Ramalingam (1) relied on by the lower Court is not applicable to the facts of the present case. The circumstances of that case were peculiar. There two sons had sued for partition and in the plaint relinquished their share in the moveables, saying it was their father's wish that their share should go to one of the other sons. The decision as to the effect of the relinquishment rested on the father's wish. It does not appear if the moveables were ancestral.

One co-parcener can relinquish in favour of another. See Sobharam Teli v. Makdu (2) and Mukund Ram Sukal v. Ram Ratan (3). A father may separate his sons at his pleasure, see Colebrook's Mitakshara, Chapter I, section II, 2. Sons have to respect their father's wish. In Peddayya v. Ramalingam (1) there had been separation of two brothers in 1882, so the family was no longer undivided. See Chandar Kishore v. Dampat Kishore (4) and Shivajirao v. Vasantrao (5), referring to Anandrao v. Vasantrao (6), Privy Council judgment in which will be found as a note on pages 262 and 263 of 34 Madras. See Wasantrao v. Anandrao (7).

Mr. G. L. Subhedar, for Respondents Nos. 1 and 3.—Peddayya v. Ramaligam (1) is on all fours with the present case. There as well as here a co-parcenary consisted of many persons and two of the members relinquished in favour of one specified person by means of an entry in the plaint. Here one relinquishes by formal deed in favour of two.

There is nothing in the Madras case to show that property was not ancestral. Motive of the relinquishment is immaterial. Chandar Kishore v. Dampat Kishore (4) gives no reasons and takes an extreme view. See Ramakrishna's Hindu Law, Volume II, page 10, see also Mayne, page 659.

Mr. M. B. Kinkhede, in reply.—A mother is not a co-parcener and no relinquishment can be regarded as enuring for her benefit.

A gift of an undivided share is invalid. See Sahu Ram Chandra v. Bhup Singh (8). As to Peddayya v. Ramalingam (1) the very JUDGMENT.—The family tree of the parties to the suit out of which this appeal arises is as follows:

Anantrao.
Anandi Bai = Ramchandra = Janki Bai plaintiff No. 4.
Govind Rao.
Ganpat Rao defendant No. 1.
Gangadhar Rao.
Vinayak Rao defendant No. 6.
Damodar Rao defendant No. 7.
Vasudeo Rao defendant No. 8.
Lakshman Rao plaintiff No. 1.
Gopal Rao plaintiff No. 2.
Madho Rao= Parbati Bai defendant No. 9.
Kesho Rao plaintiff No. 3.
Trimbak Rao defendant No. 2.
Anant Rao defendant No. 3.
Kashinath Rao defendant No. 4.
Ramkrishna Rao defendant No. 5.
Narain Rao defendant No. 10.
Krishna Rao defendant No. 11.
Mukund Rao defendant No. 12.
Raghunath Rao defendant No. 13.

Anant Rao, Ramchandra Rao, Govind Rao, Anandi Bai, Gangadhar Rao and Madho Rao are all dead. The plaintiffs' claim is for partition of the joint family estate and they have obtained a preliminary decree which declares them entitled to 4/15ths of the property, the rest of the $\frac{1}{3}$rd share to which Ramchandra Rao's branch is entitled going to the 6th, 7th and 8th defendants. The plaintiff Janki Bai was declared entitled to the share 1/5 into $\frac{1}{3}$=1/15, which her husband would have taken had he survived.

The only question with which we are concerned in this appeal, relates to a deed of release (Exhibits 6—8D,-1) executed on the 22nd December 1913 by the plaintiff Gopal Rao in favour of his brothers Lakshman Rao and Kesho Rao. By this document Gopal Rao, who was about to become a Pleader, gave up his share in the money-lending business of the family to his surviving brothers. That share is described as 1/12th, the allotment of a share to Janki Bai not being then in contemplation: the correct figure 1/15th is not now disputed. It is also common ground that the relinquishment cannot benefit any member of the family outside Ramchandra Rao's branch.

In their written statement the 6th, 7th and 8th defendants, who are the appellants here, pleaded that they should participate in the benefit of Gopal Rao's relinquishment. This plea gave rise to the seventh issue which runs thus:—

What is the effect of the release made by the plaintiff No. 2 on the 22nd December 1913? Whether it enures for the benefit of defendants Nos. 6 to 8 also?

The lower Court has held on the authority of Feddayya v. Ramalingam (1) and Than- gavelu Pillai v. Doraisami Pillai (10) that the relinquishment must benefit those co-parceners only in whose favour it was made and included the following clause in the preliminary decree for partition:

(9) 87 Ind. Cas. 321; 12 N. L. R. 113; 20 C. W. N. 1085; 14 A. L. J. 822; 20 M. L. T. 78; (1916) 2 M. W. N. 65; 18 Bom. L. R. 621; 4 L. W. 114; 24 C. L. J. 207; 31 M. L. J. 455; 43 C. 1031; 43 I. A. 151 (P. C.).

"(6) That the share of the money-lending business of the joint family to which plaintiff No. 2 would be entitled and which is specified in the deed of release dated 22nd December 913 will be allotted to the plaintiffs Nos. 1 and 3."

That the clause just quoted is misleading and should be amended is admitted by the 1st, 2nd and 3rd plaintiffs who are the sole respondents. As already remarked, the deed of relinquishment describes Gopal Rao's share in the money-lending as 1/12th, whereas the lower Court's decision puts it at 1/15th only. In any event the clause should be modified by deleting the words " and which is specified in the deed of release dated the 22nd December 1913", and this will be done. That one co-parcener may relinquish his share appears from the text of Manu and Yajnavalkya. Thus in Manu IX, 207, Sacred Books of the East, Volume XXV, page 375, we read:—

"But if one of the brothers, being able (to maintain himself) by his own occupation, does not derive (a share of the family) property, he may be made separate (by the other) receiving a trifle out of his share to live upon."

And in Yajnavalkya II, 116 quoted in the Mitakshara, Chapter I, section II, 11:—

"The separation of one, who is able to support himself and is not desirous of participation, may be completed by giving him some trifle."

The next following placitum of the Mitakshara explains the reason for requiring a trifle to be given by a desire to prevent futile disputes.

In Peddayya v. Ramalingam (1), the earlier of the two cases relied upon by the lower Court, the circumstances were peculiar. Two out of four brothers relinquished their one-half share in the family moveables in favour of the 3rd in order to give effect to a wish expressed by their deceased father and the decision appears to proceed upon the strength of a natural obligation to carry out the father's wish. In the later case the co-parcenary consisted of two members only, a father and his son, and a relinquishment of his undivided half share by the father to the son was upheld. Neither case can, therefore, be said to be quite in point. The earlier one, however, contains the following passage:—

"According to the Smritis, then, the renunciation operates as alienation of one co-parcener's interest in favour of the others. If he can alienate in favour of the other co-parceners as a body, there is no reason why he should not do so in favour of one of them, who alone may need such help."

With all respect to the learned Judges I venture to doubt whether the Smritis treated the renouncement as equivalent to an alienation. In Sahu Ram Chandra v. Bhup Singh (8) it is laid down by their Lordships of the Privy Council that under the Law of the Mitakshara the joint family property owned by all the members of the family as co-parceners cannot be the subject of a gift, sale or mortgage by one co-parcener except with the consent, express or implied, of all the other co-parceners. Any deed of gift, sale or mortgage granted by one co-parcener on his own account of or over the joint family property is invalid; the estate is wholly unaffected by it and in its entirety stands free of it. The same view as to a gift had already been held by this Court in Sobharam Teli v. Makdu (2) and in Mukund Ram Sukal v. Ram Ratan (3). If the relinquishment in the present case is to be treated as a gift then it is invalid. On the other hand, if it is merely a renunciation its effect would be similar to that of the renouncing co-parcener's death.

In Chandar Kishore v. Dampat Kishore (4) it was held that one member of a joint Hindu family cannot transfer his undivided share in the joint family property to another member of the family without the consent of the rest of the co-sharers and that if the alienation be regarded as a surrender of the interest of the person making the alienation, it is a surrender to the whole of the co-parcenary body and cannot enure to the peculiar benefit of one of them. This view appears to me to accord with the general principles laid down by the Privy Council in the passage above quoted from Sahu Ram Chandra v. Bhup Singh (8) (10) 26 Ind. Cas. 211; 27 M. L. J. 272; 16 M. L. T. 393.

It is no doubt true that the Allahabad High Court follows the strict doctrine of the Mitakshara which has been departed from in Bombay, Madras and the Central Provinces, on the ground of an equity favouring purchases for value, but we are concerned here not with a transfer for value but with a voluntary one as to the inefficacy of which there is no dispute.

In Shivajirao v. Vasantrao (5) will be found a recital of the facts of a case which is reported as Wasantrao v Anandrao (7). The decision of the Privy Council in the latter case appears as Anandrao v. Vasantrao (6) and will be found printed in a note at pages 262 and 263 of 34 Madras. In Wasantrao v. Anandrao (7) the joint family consisted of one Kashinath, his two sons Ganpatrao and Madhavrao, Ganpatrao's six sons and Madhavrao's only son Vasantrao. Madhavrao being heavily involved in debt executed a deed of release in his father's favour in return for having his debts paid. It was held in appeal by Jenkins, C. J., and Batchelor, J., that the release should be treated not as for the benefit of Kashinath alone but for that of the whole co-parcenary, the shares on partition being determined as though Madhavrao was dead. The decision as a whole was confirmed by their Lordships of the Privy Council, who remarked that the principles governing the case had been rightly applied in the appellate judgment: it was also expressly stated that the release did not operate to deprive Madhavrao's son of his right as a co-parcener.

Differing from the lower Court I hold that the relinquishment of December 1913 must be treated as benefiting the appellants no less than the plaintiffs Laxshman Rao and Keshorao in whose favour it was executed; clause (b) of the preliminary decree will, therefore, be modified not only by omitting the words "and which is specified in the deed of release dated the 22nd December 1913" but by adding at the end the words and figures "and the defendants Nos. 6, 7 and 8." The 1st and 3rd plaintiffs will take two-thirds of Gopal Rao's 1/15th share, the defendants Nos. 6 to 8 taking the remaining $\frac{1}{3}$rd.

I am asked by the respondents' learned Counsel to modify the lower Court's decree so that the plaintiff Janki Bai also may participate in the plaintiff [Gopal Rao's share in the money-lending business. The result of so doing would be to diminish the respondents' share from $\frac{2}{3}$rds to one half of Gopal Rao's portion and it is difficult to understand why such a request should be made on the respondents' behalf. According to the decision of the Privy Council in Debi Mangal Prosad Singh v. Mahadeo Prasad Singh (11), any share that may be taken by Janki Bai will not be her stridhan but devolve at her death upon all the heirs of her husband so that the appellants will inherit along with the respondents. Janki Bai is not even a party to this appeal and in the plaint made no claim to participate in Gopal Rao's share of the money-lending business to which the plaintiffs Lakshman Rao and Kesho Rao were alleged to be exclusively entitled. Rule 33, Order XLI, First Schedule to the Civil Procedure Code, gives the Appellate Court power to pass any decree and make any order which ought to have been passed or made. But I cannot think that this provision was intended to enable a defendant to obtain for a plaintiff, not a party to the appeal, a relief which the latter never asked for. In Rangamlal v. Jhandu (12) it was held by a Bench of three Judges that the object of the rule is manifestly to enable the Court to do complete justice between the parties to the appeal.

The costs of this appeal will be paid by the respondents. The costs of the parties in the lower Court will be dealt with by that Court's final decree as already ordered by it.

Appeal accepted.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 94, O. XXXIX, r 2, scope of—Injunction, disobedience of—Prohibitory orders, enforcement of.

Orders passed under rule 2 of Order XXXIX, Civil Procedure Code, are not orders enforcing the injunction, but are really orders punishing a party for past disobedience. [p 56, col. 2.]

Ottapurakkal Thazath Suppi v. Alabi Mashur Koyanna Koya Kunhi Koya, 34 Ind. Cas. 588; 39 M. 907; 3 L. W. 430; 30 M. L. J. 523; 19 M. L. T. 314; (.916) 1 M. W. N. 328, followed.

Clause 3 of rule 2 of Order XXXIX applies to injunctions prohibiting the doing of or restraining from doing certain acts. [p. 56, cols. 1 & 2.]

Clause 3 is independent of and is not controlled by the provisions of rule 4 of the Order. [p. 56, col. 2.]

Order XXXIX must be read with section 94 and the provision for punishment for disobedience applies to cases falling under either. [p. 56, col. 2.]

Petition under section 115 of Act V of 1908, praying the High Court to revise the order of the District Court of South Kanara, in Civil Miscellaneous Appeal No. 25 of 1916, preferred against the decree of the Court of the District Munsif, Mangalore, in I. A. No. 352 of 1916 (in Original Suit No. 23 of 1916.)

Mr. B. Sitarama Rao, for the Petitioner.

Mr. K. P. Lakshmana Rao, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—I think that, on the facts found by the District Judge, this is not a case where I should commit Father Coelho, 2nd defendant, to jail for contempt. There was an order of a Criminal Court ordering lac trees to be returned to his servant. The Judge, no doubt, rightly finds that it was his duty to see that his servant did not remove the tree in disobedience to the Civil Court's injunction, but it is possible that the 2nd defendant was bona fide under the belief that he need not interfere as his servant had the permission of the Criminal Court. Though 2nd defendant is technically guilty of contempt, the Court is not bound to commit him to jail. I am of opinion that clause 3 to rule 2 of Order XXXIX of the Code Civil Procedure applies to cases of disobedience, even though the disobedience is of a prohibition to do or abstain from doing a single act. There is no reason to suppose that the Legislature intended to leave such disobedience unpunished. The fact that clause 4 refers to attachment continuing for one year and directing a sale if the disobedience or breach continues, is not conclusive as sub section 3 of rule 2 empowers the Court either to attach his property or to commit the defaulter to prison.

In Ottapurakkal Thazath Suppi v. Alabi Mashur Koyanna Koya Kunhi Koya (1) it was held by the Full Bench of this Court that the Court can, in its discretion, order either arrest or attachment of property and is not bound in the first instance to attach. As pointed out by Srinivasa Aiyangar, J., at page 913*, such orders are not strictly speaking orders enforcing the order of injunction, but really orders punishing a party for past disobedience. It should also be borne in mind that, in many cases, where a single act or abstention is enjoined, it may be in the power of the defaulting party to purge himself of the consequences of his act by restoring the property or making adequate reparation. In such cases it is difficult to see why the Court should not attach his property in order to compel him to restore the property or to make adequate reparation. I do not think there is anything in the wording of rule 2, clause 3, to prevent the Court from committing a party to jail when he disobeys an injunction which contemplates a single act or abstention.

It has been argued that the provision as to punishment for disobedience only applies to suits of the nature contemplated by rule 2 to Order XXXIX. I am unable to agree with this contention. Section 94, clause (c), of the Code is general and empowers the Court to grant a temporary injunction and, in case of disobedience, to commit the person guilty thereof to the civil prison and order that his property be attached and sold: Order XXXIX must be read with section 94. I would be sorry to hold that a person who wilfully disobeys an injunction of Court could escape with impunity, unless there is anything in the Code which compels me to do so. For the reasons already given I do not agree with the Succession—Posthumous son, suit by—Burden of proof—Legitimacy, proof of.

In cases of succession to landed property of a large value as well as to a jagir, more than ordinary care should be taken to place the legitimacy of a posthumous son beyond all possible dispute. [p. 58, col 1.]

One T., a jagirdar and landowner, having died, his landed property was mutated in the names of his widows and his jagir lapsed to the Government. Plaintiff brought a suit for possession basing his claim on the ground that he was the deceased's posthumous son. There was no documentary evidence and the claim rested entirely upon the oral evidence of witnesses, the majority of whom were in some way or other interested in the plaintiff. It appeared that the alleged mother of the plaintiff supported his claim but avoided a medical examination even when called upon by the other widows to do so:

Held, that under the circumstances the plaintiff had failed to prove that he was the son of the deceased proprietor. [p. 58, col 2.]

First appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Jullundur, dated the 3rd July 1913, dismissing the suit.

The Hon'ble Mr. Muhammad Shafi, K. B., for the Appellant.

The Hon'ble Mr. Fazl-i-Husain, K. B., for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—One Thakar Singh, a jagirdar and land owner of Mauza Baloki, Tahsil Nakodar, District Jullundur, died on the 22nd September 1907, leaving him surviving his mother and three widows. The jagir of the deceased lapsed to the Government, and the landed property was, after an exhaustive enquiry into the status of the plaintiff, who claimed to be the deceased's son, mutated on the 26th April 1908 in favour of the widows. The plaintiff Jagir Singh, who was born on the 22nd November 1907 in the village of Ali Sher in the Patiala State, claims to be the son of Thakar Singh by his widow Musammat Nihal Kaur and the sole question for consideration is whether she gave birth to the plaintiff.

There is absolutely no documentary evidence in support of the plaintiff's allegation, and the case rests entirely upon oral evidence. The witnesses examined for the plaintiff may be divided broadly into two main classes;—(a) those who depose to Musammat Nihal Kaur's pregnancy, basing their evidence upon the result of their own observation or upon information imparted to them by the deceased husband; and (b) those who testify to the plaintiff's birth at the lady's parent's house at Ali Sher.

Now, we may say at once that the witnesses are not persons of any status and that the majority of them are in some way or other interested in the plaintiff. It will be observed that Thakar Singh was in the enjoyment of an assignment of land revenue and it is only natural that the members of the family and their friends and followers should do their best to preserve the jagir in the family. In these circumstances it is not at all unlikely that Musammat Nihal Kaur after the death of her husband should give out that she was enceinte and the witnesses, who base their evidence upon what they learnt from her, may be perfectly truthful and yet may be deposing to a matter which does not represent the truth. The rest of the evidence as to the pregnancy is very weak, and is contradicted by the evidence adduced by the opposite party to the effect that Musammat Nihal Kaur was not pregnant and was indeed performing long journeys even a few days before the alleged delivery.

On the question of the plaintiff's birth at Ali Sher the only direct evidence besides Musammat Nihal Kaur's testimony is that given by the midwife, Musammat Jai Kaur, who professes to have attended the lady in her confinement. The cross-examination, however, shows that she is related to Nihal Kaur's brother Sant Singh in the third degree, and her statement does not, therefore, deserve any serious consideration. The other witnesses, viz., Sant Singh and his friends of that village, have no direct knowledge of the affair and their evidence, moreover, appears to be unreliable and interested. Musammat Nihal Kaur, no doubt, fully supports the case set up by the plaintiff, but her deposition read with the documentary evidence shows that her allegation as to pregnancy was flatly contradicted by her co-widow Musammat Dalip Kaur immediately after the death of their husband, and that despite repeated challenges by the latter the former avoided medical examination and went away to her parents' house. In her application dated the 4th November 1907 addressed to the Deputy Commissioner, Jullundur, Musammat Dalip Kaur, after denying Musammat Nihal Kaur's pregnancy and referring to the latter's departure for Ali Sher after remaining at Baloki for only a night, states that "she (Musammat Nihal Kaur) stated that in Patiala State, it was not difficult to palm off a supposititious child as a son. If she was really pregnant, why did she not remain at Baloki?" To a similar effect is her application of the 12th November 1907. Indeed the plaintiff's own witness Muhammad Hussain makes it clear that even the Patiala authorities called upon Musammat Nihal Kaur to appear with her child before a lady doctor for examination, but it appears that she avoided examination by going off to another village.

Now, it is perfectly clear that in a case of this kind involving succession not only to landed property of a large value but also to a jagir, more than ordinary care should be taken to place the legitimacy of a posthumous son beyond all possible dispute, and every facility should be afforded to medical examination both prior and subsequent to the alleged birth of the child. Considering that cases of this type are by no means rare and that efforts are sometimes made to foist supposititious children by widows after the death of their husbands, we can safely presume that Musammat Nihal Kaur was fully aware of the fact that her assertion relating to the birth of a son would be strenuously denied and it was, therefore, incumbent upon her to take all such measures as would support her theory of the birth of a son. In fact, Musammat Dalip Kaur as stated above had actually denied the allegation of pregnancy, and had demanded a medical examination of her co-widow, Musammat Nihal Kaur; but the latter, far from adopting the precautions referred to above, made every possible effort to evade examination and adopted the policy of secrecy.

We consider it unnecessary to labour the point, for we are convinced that the evidence produced on behalf of the plaintiff is wholly insufficient to substantiate the allegation that he is the son of Musammat Nihal Kaur. The learned District Judge has discussed the question fully, and after reviewing the evidence and considering the arguments advanced by the learned Counsel for the appellant we have no hesitation in concurring in the conclusion reached by the lower Court. As regards the contention that the plaintiff should be given a decree at least for the property in possession of Musammat Nihal Kaur who admitted the claim, it is sufficient to say that the admission was purely collusive, and that she can, if so advised, transfer the property to the plaintiff. We do not propose to do anything which might in the least be regarded as lending colour to the allegation that he is in any way connected with the family.

We accordingly affirm the judgment and the decree of the lower Court and dismiss the appeal with costs.

APPEAL FROM ORIGINAL ORDER No. 572 OF 1914.

November 30, 1917.

JAGAT DURLAV MAZUMDAR—
PETITIONER—APPELLANT

INDU BHUSAN MAZUMDAR AND OTHERS
—RESPONDENTS.

Probate and Administration Act (V of 1881), s. 98 (1)

BALRAJ KUAR v. MAHADEO PAL SINGH.

—Order directing executor to furnish accounts annually, legality of.

An order directing an executor to furnish accounts annually is not in accordance with the provisions of section 98 (1) of the Probate and Administration Act.

Appeal against the order of the District Judge, Nadia, dated the 9th and 13th of June 1914.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Babu Bansari Lal Sarkar, for Babu Harish Chandra Roy, for the Appellant:—My submission is that the District Judge ought not to have ordered the petitioner to submit accounts annually and to furnish such an exorbitant amount of security, as he has done by his order of the 9th June modified by an order of the 13th June 1914. So far as the facts and circumstances of this case and the provisions of the Probate and Administration Act are concerned, the order is not maintainable. The petitioner is the executor who obtained the Probate of the Will of his wife, whereby the moveable properties of the testatrix are divided among three persons, the petitioner being one of them, and the immoveable properties are dedicated to an idol whereof the petitioner is appointed a shebait. The provisions of the Will clearly indicate the position of the petitioner, which is unlike that of an ordinary executor. So far as his position is concerned, he is in no way liable to render accounts annually under the provisions of the Probate and Administration Act. The rendition of accounts annually and the furnishing of such a large amount of security is in no way justifiable under these circumstances.

JUDGMENT.—No one appears in opposition to this appeal. The appeal is directed against an order of the District Judge of Nadia, namely, the order of the 9th June modified by the order of the 13th June. By the order of the 9th as thus modified, the petitioner who is the executor and has obtained Probate of the Will of his wife has been required to submit an account annually and he has also been required to give a bond with one surety in an amount representing the full value of the moveables dealt with by the Will and three years' income of the immoveable properties disposed of thereby. By the Will the moveable properties are divided between three persons of whom the executor the husband is one, and the immoveable properties are dedicated to an idol of whom the executor is appointed the shebait. Having regard to these provisions of the Will we think that the amount of security required is somewhat excessive and we, therefore, fix it in the sum of five thousand rupees. As to the number of sureties the order will remain unmodified. The order, in so far as it directs the petitioner to furnish accounts annually, is clearly not in accordance with the provisions of section 98 (1) of the Probate and Administration Act and is accordingly set aside. We may remark that accounts under the Probate and Administration Act cannot be required from the petitioner as shebait but only from the petitioner as executor, and so far as we have been able to appreciate the provisions of the Will, there seems to be no reason why administration should not have been completed long ago and why, if not so completed, it should not be now completed within a very short period of time.

This appeal is accordingly decreed in the terms set out above. We make no order as to costs.

Appeal allowed.

Section 15 of the Oudh Estates Act is a declaratory section, operating both prospectively and retrospectively. [p. 63, cols. 1 & 2.]

BALRAJ KUAR v. MAHADEO PAL SINGH.

Where a person whose estate was entered in List II died before the Oudh Estates Act came into force, bequeathing his estate to his son-in-law, who was neither a taluqdar nor a grantee, nor a person who would have succeeded to the estate, had the testator died intestate:

Held, per Lindsay, J. C, that the effect of section 15 of the Oudh Estates Act was to put the sanad out of consideration altogether, and that the succession to the estate on the death of such a legatee would be governed by the rules which would have governed the succession if the legatee had bought the estate from a person, not being a taluqdar or grantee, or in other words, by the ordinary law, irrespective of the rule of succession contained in the sanad. [p. 63, col. 2.]

Per Kanhaiya Lal, A. J. C., that the effect of the section was to relieve such a legatee from the disability imposed by the Oudh Estates Act on taluqdars and grantees in the matters of transfer and succession, and not from any rules which might be applicable independently of the Act, and that the succession to such legatee would be governed by the rule of succession laid down in the sanad as restricting or qualifying the personal law. [p. 75, col. 2.]

Per Curiam, that the rule of succession contained in the sanad was inapplicable to a person who got the estate otherwise than by inheritance. [p. 63, col. 1; p. 77, col. 1.]

A document sent by a person, containing the relevant particulars relating to the history of his estate and a declaration as to who is to be his successor, in pursuance of an advertisement appearing in a paper announcing the intention of the advertiser to prepare a compilation showing the family history of the taluqdars of Oudh, can for the purposes of Hindu Law be treated as a testamentary declaration by the writer of his intention with respect to his property, which he desires to be carried into effect after his death. JUDGMENT

LINDSAY, J. C.—These two appeals have sprung out of a suit brought by the plaintiff-respondent, Mahadeo Pal Singh, for recovery of possession of a taluqa known as the Dandi Kanch estate, which is situated in the Partabgarh District. The second plaintiff in the suit, Seth Kanhaiya Lal, is a person to whom Mahadeo Pal Singh has sold a portion of his claim for the purpose of raising funds to prosecute the suit. The three principal defendants in the case were Babu Adya Bakhsh Singh (defendant No. 1), Musammat Sukhpal Kuar (defendant No 2) and Musammat Balraj Kuar (defendant No. 3). The remaining defendants in the case were impleaded as persons who had taken transfers of portions of the estate in suit from the first defendant, Adya Bakhsh Singh. Before proceeding to set out the matters which were in issue at the trial in the Court below, it is advisable to say a few words relating to the history of this property. It is admitted that a grant of this estate was made after the annexation to Babu Sripat Singh, who was a Sombansi Thakur. It is also admitted now, though the fact was in dispute in the Court below, that this grant was made to Babu Sripat Singh under a primogeniture sanad. Babu Sripat Singh died in the month of November 1861, long before the Oudh Estates Act (I of 1869) came into force. It is admitted that on the death of Babu Sripat Singh the estate passed into the possession of Babu Dan Bahadur Pal Singh, who was Sripat Singh's son-in-law. Sripat Singh had no son and it is admitted that Dan Bahadur Pal Singh took the estate under a Will executed in his favour by Sripat Singh a few days before his death. Babu Dan Bahadur Pal Singh died on the 14th March 1906. He left a widow Musammat Sukhpal Kuar, who is the second defendant in this suit. He also left a daughter Musammat Balraj Kuar, who is the defendant No. 3, and a grandson (daughter's son) Adya Bakhsh Singh, the defendant No. 1. Adya Bakhsh Singh is the son of the third defendant, Musammat Balraj Kuar. The plaintiff, Mahadeo Pal Singh, is a step-brother of the deceased Dan Bahadur Pal Singh and he based his claim to the estate on the ground of inheritance. In paragraph No. 7 of the plaint it was alleged that at the death of Dan Bahadur Pal Singh the plaintiff Mahadeo Pal Singh became the rightful owner of the estate, (1) in accordance with the conditions of the sanad under which the estate had been granted, and (2) in accordance with the provisions of section 22, clause (5), of the Oudh Estates Act (I of 1869) and the custom prevailing in the family of Dan Bahadur Pal Singh. It was also claimed that if the inheritance to this property were regulated by the Hindu Law, then the first, second and third defendants were excluded from inheritance by virtue of the custom just referred to. In the eighth paragraph of the plaint it was specifically stated that according to the conditions prescribed in the sanad and according to the law and custom, neither the defendant No. 1 as daughter's son, nor the second defendant as widow, nor the third defendant as daughter of Dan Bahadur Pal Singh had any right whatever in the estate of the deceased. Attached to the plaint there were exhibited certain lists of property the subject-matter of the claim. List A contains the names of villages included in the taluqa proper; List B sets forth certain items of property which are described as accretions to the taluqa; while List C contains particulars of certain house property which it was alleged belonged to the taluqa. Coupled with this claim for possession there was a claim for mesne profits to the extent of over Rs. 70,000 and in clause (d) of paragraph 17 of the plaint (that is, the paragraph in which the relief was sought) it was prayed that if the Court considered that the plaintiff Mahadeo Pal Singh was not entitled to immediate possession, he might be given a decree declaring such rights as the Court considered him to possess with reference to his claim to succeed to the estate in suit. The principal defences to be considered are those made by the first, second and third defendants. Leaving out of account the plea which was taken to the effect that the estate was not held by a primogeniture sanad (a matter which is no longer in dispute), the first point to be noticed is that Adya Bakhsh Singh, the first defendant, claimed to be entitled to the property by virtue of a Will alleged to have been executed by Dan Bahadur Pal Singh on the 22nd of November 1899. It was next pleaded that the succession to this estate was not governed by the Oudh Estates Act (I of 1869). By way of alternative it was asserted that even if the Act applied and if it were found that Dan Bahadur Pal Singh died intestate, the defendant No. 1 was still entitled to the property in accordance with the provisions of clause (4) of section 22 of Act I of 1869, inasmuch as he was the daughter's son of Dan Bahadur Pal Singh and had been treated in every way by Dan Bahadur Pal Singh as his own son. The next point taken by way of defence was that in case it were found that the estate was held under a primogeniture sanad, the rule of inheritance laid down in the sanad did not apply inasmuch as Dan Bahadur Pal Singh was a legatee of Sripat Singh and belonged to a different family. Another plea in this connection was that even according to the sanad the defendant Adya Bakhsh Singh would be entitled to take the estate as being the nearest male heir according to the rule of primogeniture. By way of further defence the custom alleged in the plaint was denied and it was asserted that the first and third defendants were not in any way excluded from inheriting the property left by Dan Bahadur Pal Singh. It was also alleged by way of defence that the plaintiff Mahadeo Pal Singh was no heir of Dan Bahadur Pal Singh under the Hindu Law. And lastly the plea was taken that neither the sanad nor Act I of 1869 could in any way affect the rule of succession relating to property which did not form part of the estate which wat granted by the British Government to Babu Sripat Singh. The pleas to which I have referred were all raised in the common written statement filed by the first defendant Adya Bakhsh Singh and by his grandmother Musammat Sukhpal Kuar. The third defendant Balraj Kuar, who is the mother of Adya Bakhsh Singh, filed a separate written statement but her case as set out in that statement contained no new ground of defence, in fact she made common cause with her son the first defendant, Adya Bakhsh Singh. Before the issues were struck certain admissions were made by the Counsel for the parties; one of these was that the succession to the estate in suit was not governed by section 22 of the Oudh Estates Act (Act I of 1869). This fact is obvious, when it is considered that Dan Bahadur Pal Singh came into possession of the property as a legatee long before the Oudh Estates Act came into force; in other words, Dan Bahadur Pal Singh was not a legatee within the meaning of the Act. With regard to the custom referred to in the plaint the learned Subordinate Judge thought it proper to call for a statement of the particulars of the custom alleged. It was finally stated by the plaintiff's Counsel that the custom upon which he relied did not exclude from inheritance the widow of Dan Bahadur Pal Singh in case it should be found that the Hindu Law applied. A pedigree of the family to which Dan Bahadur Pal Singh belonged was put in and it was expressly stated that the custom upon which the plaintiff relied was a family custom prevailing in this family, a family descended from one Karan Pal Singh.

Three issues were framed by the Subordinate Judge.

The first issue related to the Will alleged to have been executed by Dan Bahadur Pal Singh on the 22nd of November 1899.

The second issue was split up into four parts (a), (b), (c) and (d).

Part (a) of the issue related to the question of the terms of the sanad under which the estate was held.

Part (b) raised the question as to whether the rule of succession to be applied to the property was the rule contained in the sanad or the rule to be found in the ordinary Hindu Law.

Part (c) of the issue related to the application of the rule of primogeniture. The question was put whether the plaintiff Mahadeo Pal Singh would according to this rule succeed to the property, both taluqdari and non-taluqdari, in preference to the first defendant, the daughter's son of Dan Bahadur Pal Singh.

Part (d) of the issue related to the question of custom and to the right of the plaintiff to obtain a declaration in case any such custom was proved.

The third issue was concerned with the question of mesne profits.

With regard to the first issue relating to the Will, the finding of the Subordinate Judge is that Dan Bahadur Pal Singh actually wrote the document which the first defendant set up as the Will upon which he relied, but it was held that this document did not amount to a testamentary disposition of the estate.

With regard to the second issue it was found on the first part (2 'a') that the estate was held under a primogeniture sanad. On the second part of the issue the finding of the Court below was that the rule of succession contained in the sanad applied to the case, inasmuch as Dan Bahadur Pal Singh was a "successor" of Sripat Singh in the sense in which that expression is used in the sanad. It was also held that the plaintiff Mahadeo Pal Singh was the nearest male heir according to the terms of the sanad and it was also ruled that the ordinary Hindu Law did not apply to the case. The Subordinate Judge was further of opinion that both kinds of property specified in the lists attached to the plaint, that is, the taluqa proper and its accretions, were governed by the same rule of succession. By his decree, however, he reserved certain houses specified in List C for the accommodation of the first three defendants. In view of the findings arrived at upon these issues the Subordinate Judge recorded no finding on the question of custom raised in part (d) of issue No. 2.

He found on the third issue that the plaintiff was entitled to mesne profits to the extent of Rs. 67,000 odd and he gave a decree accordingly with directions for the payment of profits accrued subsequent to the date of the suit.

Two appeals have been filed against the lower Court's decree, one by Musammat Balraj Kuar the third defendant (First Civil Appeal No. 101 of 1904), and the other by the first defendant Adya Bakhsh Singh (First Civil Appeal No. 114 of 1914); and the following points arise for determination:—

(1) What is the rule of succession applicable to the estate left by Babu Dan Bahadur Pal Singh?

(2) Did Dan Bahadur Pal Singh, as alleged by the first defendant, execute a Will in the latter's favour on the 22nd of November 1899?

(3) Is the plaintiff Mahadeo Pal Singh entitled to a decree for possession of the property which is described in List B as being an accretion to the taluqa? and

(4) Has the plaintiff Mahadeo Pal Singh succeeded in proving the family custom set up in the Court below by which daughters and their sons are in this family excluded from inheritance?

The only other point raised in the grounds of appeal in these two cases relates to the question of the terms of the sanad. That matter, as I have already observed, is no longer in dispute. It has been admitted before us that the estate was held under a primogeniture sanad.

It is, I think, expedient to deal in the first place with the question of the rule of succession which is to be applied for the purpose of discovering who is the person rightfully entitled as heir to the estate left by Dan Bahadur Pal Singh. The estate, it may be mentioned here, is a List II estate. Sripat Singh's name was entered in Lists I and II although, as has already been noticed, he died long before the passing of Act I of 1869. We start with the proposition that the law of succession as laid down in section 22 of the Oudh Estates Act does not apply to the case (there is no question, of course, of the application of section 23). It follows, therefore, that the rule of succession must be sought in the ordinary law which was applicable to property held in the family of Dan Bahadur Pal Singh, and in this connection the question at once arises whether that ordinary law embraces the terms of the sanad by which the property was conferred upon Sripat Singh. The Subordinate Judge has held that the terms of the sanad govern the succession and acting on these provisions he has found that the plaintiff Mahadeo Pal Singh is entitled to Dan Bahadur Pal Singh's estate. I may say at once that in my opinion this decision of the Subordinate Judge is erroneous. My finding is that the rule of succession laid down in the sanad has no application in the present case. This opinion is founded upon the provisions of section 15 of Act 1 of 1869, the terms of which it is now necessary for me to consider. I may mention here that the learned Counsel on either side were not able to refer me to any judgment of their Lordships of the Privy Council containing an exposition of the provisions of this particular section. There is on the other hand at least one ruling of a Bench of this Court in which the terms of this section have been considered and to which I shall presently refer. I think it advisable in the first place to state at once the interpretation which I put upon the language of this section. Section 15 is a declaratory section and operates both retrospectively and prospectively. It purports to lay down the rule which governs the transfer of and succession to an estate or part of an estate which had been transferred or bequeathed before, or which might be transferred or bequeathed after the passing of the Act, to a person who was not a taluqdar or grantee and a person who would not have succeeded if the transferor or testator had died without having made the transfer and intestate. The rule laid down in the section is that the transfer of and succession to the property so transferred or bequeathed is to be regulated by the rules which would have governed the transfer and succession to the property, if the transferee or legatee had "bought" the same from a person "not being a taluqdar or grantee.' Applying this section to the facts of the present case we have it

(1) that Sripat Singh was a taluqdar;

(2) that he bequeathed his estate before the passing of the Act to his son-in-law Dan Bahadur Pal Singh;

(3) that Dan Bahadur Pal Singh was neither a taluqdar nor grantee;

(4) and was not a person who would have succeeded Sripat Singh if the latter had died without having made the bequest.

It seems to me, therefore, that in accordance with the provisions of this section the question of the succession to this estate, which was taken by Dan Bahadur Pal Singh under the Will made by Sripat Singh, is to be decided on two assumptions, namely, (1) that Dan Bahadur Pal Singh bought the estate from Sripat Singh, and (2) that Sripat Singh was for the purposes of that transaction of transfer to be regarded neither as a taluqdar nor as a grantee. This appears to me to be the plain meaning of this section, and if my interpretation is correct it seems to follow necessarily that the terms of the sanad cannot be referred to in dealing with the question as to who is to succeed to the estate left by Dan Bahadur Pal Singh, assuming for the moment that Dan Bahadur Pal Singh died intestate. If, for the purpose of this case, we must, as the section says, hold that Sripat Singh was neither a taluqdar nor a grantee, then he cannot be treated as having held this estate under any special title, that is to say, under a sanad granted by the British Government. The argument for the plaintiff-respondent, so far as I have been able to understand it, is this. It is said that the only result arising from the enactment of section 15 is that the rule of succession laid down in section 22 of the Act ceases to be applicable to the property transferred or bequeathed in the circumstances mentioned in section 15, and that consequently succession must be determined with reference to the personal law of the holder of the property, a law which, it is argued, would in the case given include the conditions laid down in the sanad. This argument is supported by a reference to what was laid down by their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of Debi Bakhsh Singh v. Chandrabhan Singh (1). That was a case of succession ab intestato and their Lordships were called upon to construe the language of clause 11 of section 22 of Act I of 1869. This clause declares that in default of the persons specified in the preceding ten clauses, succession shall be "to such persons as would have been entitled to succeed to the estate under the ordinary law to which persons of the religion and tribe of such taluqdar or grantee heir or legatee, are subject." It was ruled by their Lordships that the ordinary law referred to in this clause would include the declarations and conditions of the sanad being part of the original title to the property. Looking at the language of clause 11 just referred to, as also at the similar language which is adopted in section 23, it will appear that the ordinary law which is there referred to is the law applicable to the tribe and religion of the intestate taluqdar, grantee, or his heir or legatee within the meaning of the Act. In other words, the property which is to be governed by the rules laid down in clause 11 and section 23 is property which up till the time succession opened belonged to the taluqdar, grantee, or his heir or legatee. The case with which we are now dealing is admittedly not one of this kind. Dan Bahadur Pal Singh was neither a taluqdar nor a grantee; nor was he the heir or legatee of a taluqdar or grantee within the meaning of the Act. On the contrary his position, according to the language of section 15, was that of a person who had bought from another person who was neither a taluqdar nor a grantee. In these circumstances it is difficult to conceive how it can be argued that the terms and conditions of the sanad are to control in any way the succession to the estate which has been left by Dan Bahadur Pal Singh. On the face of it the sanad or any of the declarations or conditions contained in it constituted no part of Dan Bahadur Pal Singh's title to this property, for according to section 15 Dan Bahadur Pal Singh's title was a title by purchase. He "bought the estate" from a person who was neither a taluqdar nor a grantee. It has been contended that the words "a person not being a taluqdar" in section 15 indicate merely a person whose name is not entered in List I and that for the purposes of this section such a person ought to be deemed to possess all the other attributes of a taluqdar, including that of being a holder of property under a special grant or sanad; and so, it is said, in spite of the language of section 15 the terms of the sanad must be taken into account. I do not think it is possible to argue in this way. Section 15 deals not merely with persons who are styled taluqdars or grantees. It deals with such persons in relation to their property (estate), and for the purpose of interpreting section 15 the taluqdar cannot be dissociated from the property or taluqa from which he derives his title of taluqdar. A taluqdar must be a person who owns a taluqa or estate and no person is to be found in List I who had not a taluqa or estate, for every taluqdar in List I is mentioned in Lists II, III and IV as the possessor of an estate. When section 15 lays down that the person from whom the property therein referred to has been bought is neither a taluqdar nor a grantee, it seems to me to follow necessarily that such a person must be taken to be a person who held under no special title, that being one of the necessary attributes of a taluqdar or grantee. My opinion, therefore, is that the ruling in Debi Bakhsh Singh's case (1)

(1) 7 Ind. Cas. 724; 32 A. 599 at p. 610; 14 C. W. N. 1010; 12 C. L. J. 303; 12 Bom. L. R. 1015; 8 M. L. T. 273; 13 C. C. 316; 20 M. L. J. 917; 7 A. L. J. 1122; 37 I. A. 168 (P. C.).

does not affect the question now under consideration and does not make the terms and conditions of the sanad any part of the ordinary law which governed Dan Bahadur Pal Singh's family. Then again it has been argued that if the interpretation which I place upon the language of section 15 be adopted, it involves the conclusion that Act I of 1869 operates to divest a title already vested. It is said that if the words "neither a taluqdar nor a grantee" are to be taken to mean a person without a sanad, it follows that the transferee or legatee takes nothing because in that case the testator or transferor mentioned in section 15 had nothing to bequeath or transfer. Obviously this cannot be the effect of section 15, which lays down rules for the transfer of and succession to property which has been transferred or bequeathed. It is assumed that the transferee or legatee has a good title to the property, a title by purchase. It could never have been the intention of the Legislature to render void transfers which were made before the passing of the Act and it is impossible, therefore, to hold that the section lays down that the transferee or legatee has taken no estate at all. My attention has been drawn to a decision of a Bench of this Court which is to be found reported in 18 O. C., at page 188, the Maniarpur case [Ghulam Abbas Khan v. Bibi Ummatul-Fatima (2)] a decision which I understand is now under appeal before their Lordships of the Privy Council. It is pointed out that at page 211* of the report Mr. Stuart, the First Additional Judicial Commissioner, has adopted an interpretation of the language of section 15 which differs from mine. After referring to the provisions of section 3 of the Crown Grants Act (XV of 1895) Mr. Stuart observes that "if the terms of the primogeniture sanad govern succession to the property, succession to property transferred to a person who would not have succeeded according to the provisions of the Act might not be governed by the law that would apply if the transferee or legatee had bought the same property from a person not being a taluqdar, but might be governed by the terms of the sanad." Mr. Stuart then refers to certain observations which were made by their Lordships of the Privy Council in the Mahewa case [Sheo Singh v. Raghubans Kunwar (3)]. It appears to me that this argument rests upon the assumption that the sanad does apply in cases where the property has been transferred or bequeathed in the circumstances mentioned in section 15. But before we reach that stage it is necessary to determine whether the sanad applies at all. My learned colleague in the present case who was a party to the decision just referred to seems also to have been of opinion, and for the same reasons, that the Crown Grants Act operated so as to render it necessary to apply the sanad in spite of the provisions of section 15 of Act I of 1869. I regret I am unable to concur in this view. With all possible respect it seems to me that the provisions of the Crown Grants Act do not affect this question. This latter Act was introduced to explain the provisions of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, in so far as they relate to grants from the Crown and to remove certain doubts as to the power of the Crown in relation to such grants. The preamble declares that the intention of the Act is to remove any doubts which might have arisen as to the power of the Crown to impose limitations and restrictions upon grants and other transfers of land made by it or under its authority. Section 2 of the Act excludes the application of the Transfer of Property Act to Crown Grants and section 3 lays down that all previous restrictions, conditions and limitations over contained in any grant or transfer by the Crown shall be valid and take effect according to their tenor, any rule of law, Statute or enactment of the Legislature to the contrary notwithstanding. I take this third section of the Crown Grants Act to mean that in spite of anything contained in any rule of law, Statute or enactment of the Legislature, it is to be understood that the Crown has full power to make any provisions, restrictions, conditions and limitations over in granting or transferring lands and that all such provisions, restrictions, conditions, and limitations over are to be valid and to take effect according to their tenor; but section 15 of Act I of 1869 does not in any way purport to affect or question the power of the Crown to make such provisions, limitations, etc. To my mind it simply declares that in a given set of circumstances property acquired by a person from one who held it by a Crown grant is to be treated as not having been held by a Crown grant at all. The title is to be treated as one by purchase. The property is to be deemed to have been acquired from a person who did not hold as a Crown grantee. This being so, there can in my opinion arise no question of applying the law as laid down in section 3 of the Crown Grants Act, for the simple reason that when section 15 of Act I of 1869 is reached there is no Crown grant to be construed. The Mahewa case cannot, I think, be appealed to as an authority for the view that the Crown Grants Act in any way controls the operation of section 15 of Act I of 1869. The argument which was taken before their Lordships in that case was that in or after 1861, at the time when the sanad was granted to Girwar Singh, no executive act of the Government could have created an estate descending by any rule of inheritance other than that laid down by the law—the Hindu Law in the case then under consideration. Their Lordships held that such a contention was not maintainable in view of these provisions of the Crown Grants Act. There is in the present case no question of the power of the Crown to create estates descending by a peculiar law of inheritance. The effect of section 15, in my opinion, is to put the sanad out of consideration altogether.

As my learned colleague will probably not agree with the opinion I have expressed regarding the interpretation of section 15 of the Oudh Estates Act (I of 1869), I proceed to consider what the rule of succession would be on the assumption that the terms and conditions of the sanad applied to the case now before us. Fortunately on this point my colleague and myself are of the same opinion. We both think that if the terms of the sanad are to be taken into consideration, the rule of succession by primogeniture does not apply to the estate which was left by Dan Bahadur Pal Singh. The principal words to be considered in this connection are those contained in the penultimate clause of the primogeniture sanad, the form of which is given at page 386, Appendix E, of Sykes' Compendium of the Oudh Talukdari Law. Those words are as follows:—"It is another condition of this grant that in the event of your dying intestate or of any of your successors dying intestate the estate shall descend to the nearest male heir according to the rule of primogeniture, but you and all your successors shall have full power to alienate the estate either in whole or in part by sale, mortgage, gift, bequest or adoption to whomsoever you please." The discussion centres round the meaning of the word "successors" contained in this clause. According to the view taken by the Subordinate Judge, "successor" means a person who takes as an heir on an intestacy or who takes under a Will as a devisee. He came to this opinion on the authority of certain definitions and rulings which were quoted before him and to which he has referred in his judgment. He also relies for his interpretation upon the language which was used in the correspondence between the Chief Commissioner of Oudh and the Government of India, relating to the conditions which should be imposed in the sanads which were granted subsequent to the date of Lord Canning's Proclamation. Referring to the language of the clause we have just mentioned the Subordinate Judge was of opinion that it contemplates two classes of transfers, namely, (1) transfers inter vivos and (2) transfers to take effect after death. For these reasons he held that the term "successors" must include all who take otherwise than as transferees by a deed executed inter vivos. It was contended before him that according to the language of the sanad transfers might be made in favour of all sorts and conditions of men and the case was put to him of a bequest made by a taluqdar in favour of a village menial. It was asked whether in such a case the descent of the property in the hands of the menial would be regulated by the rule of primogeniture.

The learned Judge was of opinion that the menial in these circumstances would not come within the category of "successors;" though why he should be excluded if he took under a Will is difficult to see, regard being had to the opinion expressed by the Subordinate Judge that "successors" included persons who took otherwise than as transferees by a deed inter vivos. The learned Counsel for the plaintiff-respondent has not attempted to support the reasoning given for his opinion by the learned Subordinate Judge. The question of the meaning of this word "successors" has been the subject of discussion in the decision of a Bench of this Court to which a reference has already been made [Ghulam Abbas Khan v. Bibi Ummatul Fatima (2)]. The two learned Judges who constituted the Bench in that case differed in opinion regarding the meaning of this expression. The Court of first instance had held in that case that the word "successors" meant only heirs, that is, persons who succeeded to the estate ab intestato. Mr. Stuart discussed at great length the meaning to be attributed to the word "successors." He went into the history of the events which led up to the grant of the sanads and he also read the sanad in the light of the phraseology of the English Law of Real Property. In his judgment he admits that the word "successor" is capable of being interpreted in many different senses and that its true meaning ought in all cases to be ascertained by reference to the context. He eventually came to the conclusion that there was nothing in the context of the sanad which was repugnant to the sense which he attributed to the word, namely, that of including both an heir and a devisee. He was unable to accept the opinion of the Subordinate Judge that the word "successors" meant only heirs. Mr. Stuart's opinion, therefore, was that the word "successor" means successor on death and excludes only persons who have taken by a transfer inter vivos. According to Mr. Stuart's interpretation, therefore, the word "successors" would include the village menial in whose favour a Will had been made by a taulqdar. The Second Additional Judicial Commissioner, who is my colleague in the present case, was of a different opinion. After pointing out that the word "heirs" occurs at four places in the sanad, he went on to say that in his opinion "successors" means persons successively inheriting the estate under the sanad. He too held that the meaning of the word was to be determined in the sense of the context. He laid great stress on the portion of the clause quoted above which is introduced by the words "but you and all your successors." He pointed out that the powers of transfer conferred upon the taluqdar by the sanad might be exercised by Will, mortgage, gift, bequest or adoption, so that a person who took by devise would be just as much a transferee as a person who has taken by sale. He referred also, as Mr. Stuart had done, to the language of the correspondence between the Chief Commissioner of Oudh and the Government of India for the purpose of interpreting the meaning of this clause, and he was led by this language as well as by the language of the sanad to the conclusion that "successors" must mean only persons who take on an intestacy. So far as the language of this correspondence is concerned, there is perhaps a good deal to be said on both sides but viewing it generally it appears to me that it supports the conclusion arrived at by Pandit Kanhaiya Lal rather than the one which found favour with Mr. Stuart.

It can hardly be doubted, both in view of the language of the correspondence just referred to and of the language of the sanad itself, that it was the intention of the Government to confer upon the taluqdars to whom this sanad was given the fullest power of alienation. In the first place we have this power conferred by the words used in the first clause of the sanad, "I...confer on you the full proprietary right, title and possession of the estate of..." In the penultimate clause of the sanad we have a similar declaration made in the following words—"but you and all your successors shall have full power to alienate the estate either in whole or in part by sale, mortgage, gift, bequest or adoption to whomsoever you please." Particular stress should, I think, be laid upon the word "alienate" in the clause just referred to. In the setting in which it is used the word "alienate" appears to me to point to the disposal of property in favour of an alien or stranger, that is to say, a person outside the family. The preceding words of the clause lay down the rule relating to succession. The estate is to descend to the nearest male heir according to the rule of primogeniture. Then follow the words I have just quoted, conferring the fullest possible powers of alienation. It appears to me, therefore, that the intention to be gathered from the language of the clause is that the rule of succession by primogeniture is to govern the devolution of the property so long as it continues in the family of the taluqdar. But if the taluqdar chooses to exercise the ample powers of alienation conferred upon him by the succeeding words, then the rule of succession by primogeniture is to cease to apply, the reason being that the property has passed to a stranger, that is, a person outside the taluqdar's family. In this connection I might refer to a passage in a judgment of the Judicial Committee in the case of Balraj Kunwar v. Jagatpal Singh (4). In the course of their judgment their Lordships made certain observations regarding the interpretation of sections 14 and 15 of the Act. Finally, in dealing with the meaning which ought to be put upon the terms of section 22 of the Act they observe at the bottom of page 405 of the report as follows—"But if the prescribed line of succession is broken by a transfer or bequest of the entailed estate to a person outside the prescribed line, it seems not unreasonable that the fetter of the entail such as it is should no longer apply to the estate." These words appear to me to entirely support the interpretation we place upon the language of the last clause but one of the sanad. The learned Counsel for the plaintiff-respondent in his argument regarding the meaning of the word "successors," after contending that the expression referred to one who takes after death and not by transfer inter vivos, stated that the rule would apply only where the devisee "takes the place of the taluqdar." After referring to the case of a bequest in favour of a village menial, the learned Counsel admitted that the menial would not be treated as a successor because he does not or was not "intended to take the 'estate.'" I find it difficult to follow this argument, because on the terms of the sanad what the taluqdar is empowered to alienate is his "estate" either in whole or in part. The menial would, I think, under a bequest take the estate or whatever part of it was bequeathed to him by the taluqdar. The learned Counsel referred to the cases in which taluqdars were called upon to declare their successors and probably the meaning of the argument is that only those persons who take by Will can be deemed to be "successors" within the meaning of the sanad in whose cases the taluqdar has expressed some intention that they should in some way or other be invested with the status which he enjoyed himself, namely, the status of a taluqdar. But status in this sense is the creature of the law and it would not be possible for a taluqdar merely by expressing an intention to that effect in a Will to confer upon his devisee a status which the law does not sanction. After a careful consideration of the language of the sanad it seems to me to be impossible to arrive at any other conclusion than that the word "successors" must mean persons who take as heirs on intestacy. The distinction drawn is between such persons and other persons who have taken by any of the various forms of transfers referred to in the clause; any other method of division or classification must lead to difficulty. Even if it could be assumed for the sake of argument that "successors" in this clause includes a person who takes under a Will, I fail to see how Dan Bahadur Pal Singh could be a "successor" according to his interpretation, when section 15 of the Act clearly lays down that Dan Bahadur Pal Singh must be taken to have "bought" the estate; in other words, Dan Bahadur Pal Singh is to be deemed to have taken by a transfer made inter vivos. I am satisfied, therefore, that the rule of primogeniture cannot be applied for the purpose of ascertaining the person who is entitled to the estate left by Dan Bahadur Pal Singh.

The next matter to be considered is the document which was put forward by the first defendant Adya Bakhsh Singh, as a Will alleged to have been written by Dan Bahadur Pal Singh on the 22nd of November 1899. The story of the first defendant with regard to this part of the case may be summarized as follows. It appears that for some years prior to the year 1899, a newspaper used to be published in Lucknow which was called the "Akhbar Anjuman Hind." This paper was edited by a man named Bishun Lal and was under the patronage of the British Indian Association (Anjuman Hind), which is recognised as the official body representing the taluqdars of Oudh. It is proved that the brother of this man Bishun Lal, one Kishun Lal, was employed in the office of the British Indian Association as a clerk (sarishtadar). In the month of November 1899 an advertisement appeared in this paper announcing the intention of Kishun Lal to prepare a compilation showing the family history of the taluqdars of Oudh. There had, it seems, been a previous publication of this kind known by the name of Manual of Oudh Titles. Kishun Lal announced that the book he intended to publish was to be an improved edition of this Manual of Oudh Titles and was to contain fuller and more accurate information. It was also announced that this publication was being made with the approval of His Honour the Lieutenant Governor. A copy of the advertisement has been filed in the case and is marked defendant No. 1's Exhibit No. 4. The editor invited the taluqdars to supply him with particulars of their family history and also to declare in their narrative the names of the persons who were to succeed them in possession of their estates. It is said that this advertisement having attracted the attention of Dan Bahadur Pal Singh, he gave orders for the preparation of the history of his own taluqa. A document containing the relevant particulars was prepared and was sent to Kishun Lal and it is admitted that shortly after this, that is to say about the beginning of the year 1900, the book was prepared and published. A copy of it is on the record and is referred to as Exhibit D3 of defendant No. 1. The story goes that at the time when this narrative was prepared for the purpose of publication a copy of it was made under the direction of Dan Bahadur Pal Singh and was kept along with the other papers in Dan Bahadur Pal Singh's office. It is this copy marked Exhibit D1 which is put forward in proof of the Will relied upon by Adya Bakhsh Singh. The original narrative as supplied to Kishun Lal was called for, but the evidence shows that it was destroyed some time after the book was published in the year 1900. Adya Bakhsh Singh, therefore, relies upon this document, Exhibit D1, as secondary evidence of the document which was supplied for the purpose of publication and we have now to examine the evidence which was put forward on behalf of the first defendant in order to prove that such a document was as a matter of fact prepared at the instance of Dan Bahadur Pal Singh.

[The learned Judicial Commissioner after discussing the evidence held that Exhibit D1 fulfilled the conditions of section 63, clauses 3 and 5 of the Evidence Act—Ed.]

The next matter to be dealt with is whether or not this document, which is found to be a genuine document, can be treated as the Will of Dan Bahadur Pal Singh. On this part of the case the learned Subordinate Judge was of opinion that the document could not be treated as a Will. He was led to this conclusion by finding, as he says, that there was no evidence worth the name that Dan Bahadur Pal Singh intended that the document should take effect as a Will. Before commencing my examination of this question it is necessary to refer to certain other evidence in the case, which has to my mind a double bearing. This evidence, the substance of which I shall presently mention, renders probable in the first place the fact that Dan Bahadur Pal did prepare a narrative corresponding to what is to be found in Exhibit D1 and might have been used in support of the conclusion already arrived at touching the genuineness of Exhibit D1. I have not thought it necessary to refer to it in this connection, for the direct evidence which has already been discussed appears to me to be sufficient to justify the opinion which has been formed. The second bearing of the evidence is a matter of serious importance in considering the interpretation which is to be put upon this document. There is a good deal of oral evidence in the case, which establishes beyond all doubt that Dan Bahadur Pal Singh was much attached to the boy Adya Bakhsh Singh and that he treated him in all respects as his own child. The evidence on this point is not confined to the statements of witnesses who were examined in the interests of the defence. There is abundant evidence in the shape of admissions made by the plaintiff's own witnesses to the effect that Dan Bahadur Pal Singh treated Adya Bakhsh Singh as his own son. It has been conceded by one of the learned Counsel who has argued the case on behalf of the respondents that this evidence relating to treatment must be accepted as correct, although of, course, it is not admitted that the statements of all the witnesses who deposed to this treatment are true. We need not, I think, concern ourselves with the statements of many of the witnesses who deposed to the relations between Dan Bahadur Pal Singh and Adya Bakhsh Singh. It will be sufficient, I think, to mention the evidence of four witnesses, namely, the Hon'ble Mr. Baillie, Mr. R. L. H. Clarke, Mr. E. P. Fawcett and Assistant Surgeon Sarju Kumar Mukerji. From the statements of these witnesses whose testimony cannot be impeached, it is clear that Dan Bahadur Pal Singh used to take Adya Bakhsh Singh about with him, used to introduce him to officials and used to treat him in every way as the person who was marked out as his successor in the possession of the Dandi Kanch taluqa. Mr. Baillie (now Sir Duncan Baillie), Mr. Clarke and Mr. Fawcett were all at one time or another employed in the Partabgarh district and they all had opportunities of meeting Dan Bahadur Pal Singh; each of them has given expression to his opinion based upon observation of the relations between Dan Bahadur Pal Singh and the first defendant and they all say that they understood from the treatment of the boy by Dan Bahadur Pal Singh that Dan Bahadur Pal Singh intended Adya Bakhsh Singh to have the estate after his death. The evidence of Assistant Surgeon Sarju Kumar Mukerji is of special importance in this connection, for it is clear that he was on terms of greater intimacy with Dan Bahadur Pal Singh than any of the other witnesses just mentioned. Sarju Kumar swears that he was medical attendant to Dan Bahadur Pal Singh for many years, that he had frequent opportunities of seeing him and that even after he had left the Partabgarh district he was called in on more than one occasion to give Dan Bahadur Pal Singh medical advice. In the course of his deposition Babu Sarju Kumar made the following statement: "He (that is, Dan Bahadur Pal Singh) had the boy Lallan at his house who used to be always with him. I knew him to be his son at first (that is, I supposed him to be his son at first) but subsequently I came to learn that he was his daughter's son and heir-apparent to his gaddi and that his name was Adya Bakhsh Singh. He used to be very affectionate to him (Adya Bakhsh Singh) and he frequently in the course of conversation used to tell me that he had no one else but Lallan as his janashin (that is successor). On one occasion he also told me that he had sent a communication to the British Indian Association at Lucknow to say that Lallan was his heir and successor to the taluqa." Dr. Mukerji's evidence is the strongest possible evidence there could be regarding the treatment which Dan Bahadur Pal Singh exhibited towards Adya Bakhsh Singh, and we think, that the statements regarding the position which Dan Bahadur Pal Singh intended Adya Bakhsh Singh to occupy after his death are admissible in evidence under the provisions of section 8 of the Indian Evidence Act. These statements are statements accompanying and explaining the acts of Dan Bahadur Pal Singh with reference to Adya Bakhsh Singh and they seem, therefore, to fall within the definition of the word "conduct" as used in Explanation I to section 8 of the Indian Evidence Act. If the statements which are proved by the testimony of Dr. Mukerji are, as we think, admissible in evidence, then it might well be argued that the case of Adya Bakhsh Singh was established independently of the document Exhibit D1, but we prefer to rely upon this gentleman's evidence more for the purpose of showing the disposition of Dan Bahadur Pal Singh towards Adya Bakhsh Singh and for the purpose of interpreting in that light the meaning which should be placed upon the language of the document Exhibit D1. We have it then that the Counsel for the respondent is not in a position to explain away all this evidence regarding treatment. But an ingenious attempt has been made by him to put another complexion upon it. He refers to clause 4 of section 22 of the Oudh Estates Act (I of 1869), a clause which, as is now well known, was introduced into the Act at the express instance of Raja Man Singh, the former taluqdar of the Ajudhia Estate. This clause places the daughter's son of a taluqdar who has been treated in all respects as own son in a very prominent position in the line of inheritance. It is said that all this treatment which was meted out to Adya Bakhsh Singh by Dan Bahadur Pal Singh was adopted with the express purpose of placing Adya Bakhsh Singh in the line of succession. In other words, it is argued that it was Dan Bhadur Pal Singh's intention that in case he died without issue, Adya Bakhsh Singh was to succeed to the estate under the provisions of clause 4 of section 22 of the Act. It is argued again that for this reason Dan Bahadur Pal Singh never entertained any notion of making a Will in favour of Adya Bakhsh Singh, being in the belief that Adya Bakhsh Singh would succeed him under the provisions of the Act. It is pointed out that as Dan Bahadur Pal Singh himself had succeeded under a Will executed in his favour by his father-in-law Sripat Singh he would have been alive to the importance of executing a formal testamentary document in case he desired Adya Bakhsh Singh to take the estate as his devisee. Dan Bahadur Pal Singh, it is said, did not succeed to the taluqa after Sripat Singh's death without a great deal of opposition on the part of Sripat Singh's own relations and so it is argued that he would at least have taken the precaution to execute a formal Will so as to secure the position of Adya Bakhsh Singh.

Of course if Dan Bahadur Pal Singh did entertain the notion that succession to the estate after his death would be governed by the rules laid down in section 22 of Act I of 1869, he was labouring under a mistake of law. Although he had taken as legatee of Babu Sripat Singh, he was not a legatee within the meaning of that expression as defined in section 2 of the Act, for the Will which was executed in his favour had taken effect long before Act I of 1869 came into force. Can it be maintained, therefore, that because Dan Bahadur Pal Singh had this erroneous impression, any declarations of his intention regarding the succession to his estate contained in the document Exhibit D1 are to go for nothing merely because his conception of his own legal status was a wrong one? Is the document Exhibit D1 not to be given effect to merely because it may be said that it was only a step in a course of treatment, the object of which was to secure succession to Adya Bakhsh Singh? We think an argument of this kind cannot be allowed to prevail. We ought to give full legal effect if we can to any expressions of intention to be found in the document. It is well understood that in the case of a testamentary disposition made by a Hindu to which the rules of the ordinary Hindu Law apply, there is no need to establish the execution of any document of a formal nature. It is hardly necessary to refer to the numerous cases which were cited before us in this connection. It has been pointed out to us that a statement made before a revenue official, an unsigned Will, a draft Will, a petition to a Revenue Court, an entry in a wajib-ul-arz, a statement contained in a power-of-attorney and other statements of like character have been treated by the Courts as testamentary documents in the case of a Hindu. There has been more than one case from Oudh in which it has been necessary to consider the legal effect of documents containing expressions of the wishes of taluqdars in the matter of succession to their estates. I would refer here to a well-known case from Oudh [Hurpershad v. Sheo Dyal (5)], which was decided by their Lordships of the Privy Council in the year 1876. Their Lordships there, in referring to certain documents which were written by Raja Gauri Shankar, agreed with what was said by the Judicial Commissioner who delivered the judgment of this Court. The following dictum of the Judicial Commissioner was mentioned with approval by their Lordships of the Privy Council of the Judicial Committee:—"In ordinary cases this could hardly be construed as a Will, for there is no direct allusion to the death of the executor nor can it be said that there is a distinct direction as to the devolution of his property after his death. But in Oudh it is a matter of notoriety that the letters to which these documents are answers were expressly intended to elicit and register the wishes of each taluqdar as to the descent of his landed estate after his death, and the replies are to this day spoken of by taluqdars as their Will when no other has been made. Its form is immaterial as it was made prior to the passing of Act I of 1869, and the power of Hindus to make even nuncupatory Wills has been decided in repeated judgments submitted by the Lords of the Privy Council. I find that this document correctly describes the intention of the Raja in respect to the devolution of his taluqa after his death and that it is correctly described as a Will."

The Judicial Commissioner was, of course, here referring to the instances in which taluqdars, in answer to inquiries which were made by District Officers in Oudh under the direction of the Chief Commissioner, had sent in letters describing the manner in which they desired their estates to descend after their death. There can be no reason founded upon principle for drawing a distinction between such document and the document which we have got to consider in the present instance. Of course it may be justly observed that a letter sent by a taluqdar in reply to an official inquiry would be treated as a more solemn and formal document than one sent in response to an invitation such as was held out to Dan Bahadur Pal Singh in the present case. At the same time, we think, it may fairly be argued that there was a certain amount of analogy between the situation in which Dan Bahadur Pal Singh found himself at the end of 1899 and that of taluqdars who years before had been invited by the Deputy Commissioners of their districts to declare their intentions as to the succession to their estates. The invitation to Dan Bahadur Pal Singh to give the history of his estate and to mention the name of his successor was contained in what may be described as the official organ of the British Indian Association of which Dan Bahadur Pal Singh as a taluqdar was a member. It was also stated in the advertisement containing the invitation that the preparation of this manual of history was being undertaken with the sanction of the Lieutenant Governor of the Provinces. Kishun Lal in his deposition has stated that before the work was undertaken, he had sent a letter to the Lieutenant Governor in the name of his brother Bishun Lal asking for permission to publish a Manual of Titles in Oudh, and that such permission was accorded to him. I have no reason to suppose that this statement of Kishun Lal is in any way contrary to the truth. It may easily be understood then that when Dan Bahadur Pal Singh's attention was drawn to his advertisement, as it undoubtedly was, he was probably under the impression that the declaration which he was being called upon to make was more or less a declaration which was being demanded under official authority and was intended to be given publicity to in a book which was being compiled under the patronage of the official body representing the taluqdars of Oudh. It appears to me, therefore, that we may well treat this document as standing on a similar footing to those other documents which have been referred to and which in numerous instances have been treated as Wills. It may be, as argued, that at the time he ordered the preparation of this narrative Dan Bahadur Pal Singh may not have understood that he was making a Will in the strict sense of the term. The fact, however, remains that we have abundant proof of Dan Bahadur Pal Singh's intention that Adya Bakhsh Singh should succeed him in the taluqa. The way in which he treated Adya Bakhsh Singh is not susceptible of any other interpretation. When we find, therefore, in this document, prepared in the circumstances just mentioned, that Dan Bahadur Pal Singh declared that his successor was Adya Bakhsh Singh, and that no one but Adya Bakhsh Singh was to take the estate, we must, I think, come to the conclusion that this document can properly be relied on as a legal declaration of Dan Bahadur Pal Singh's intention with respect to his property which he desired to be carried into effect after his death. The document contains a reference to the estate and the necessary conclusion is that it was this property which Dan Bahadur Pal Singh desired to pass to Adya Bakhsh Singh after his death. My finding, therefore, on this part of the case is that the document Exhibit D 1 is a genuine document and that it constitutes a valid and sufficient proof of the fact that a Will was made by Dan Bahadur Pal Singh, according to which Adya Bakhsh Singh was entitled at his death to the taluqa of Dandi Kanch.

[The learned Judicial Commissioner after discussing the evidence on the question of custom found that the custom set up by the plaintiff was not established.—Ed.]

The only other matter which it is necessary to deal with is the question of the various items of immoveable property described in Lists B and C attached to the plaint. These items were alleged by the plaintiff to constitute accretions or accessions to the taluqa. The case for the defence was that these properties were non-taluqdari property. No evidence was given by either party as to the manner in which these various items of property came to be acquired. As regards List B it is to be noted that the claim to item No. 8, a house situated in MacAndrewganj, was abandoned. As regards the other items it is admitted that with one exception (item No. 5) they all consist of small shares or portions of land comprised in villages belonging to the taluqa. It may fairly be assumed that the acquisition of these fragments was made with the intention that they should become incorporated in the estate and we think the proper finding is that all the items in List B, except item No. 5, are to be deemed a part of the Dandi Kanch taluqa. Similarly with regard to the houses mentioned in List C; so far as we can ascertain these buildings all appertain to the estate. They are either residential houses or buildings used for purposes of the estate office. We have no doubt that these items also should be deemed to be taluqdari property. As regards item No. 5 in List B in the absence of any evidence to the contrary we must hold that it does not constitute any part of the estate.

To sum up, therefore, my findings are,—(1) that the succession to the Dandi Kanch taluqa is not regulated either by Act I of 1969 or by the terms of the sanad, but is regulated by the ordinary Hindu Law; (2) that no custom affecting the rules of the Hindu Law and excluding the daughter and her sons from inheritance has been proved; (3) that Dan Bahadur Pal Singh did make a Will on the 22nd of November 1899 by virtue of which the estate has come to the defendant Adya Bakhsh Singh as devisee; and (4) that the plaintiff is entitled to no relief declaratory or otherwise. On these findings I am of opinion that the appeals should be allowed, the decree of the Subordinate Judge set aside and the suit of the plaintiffs dismissed with one set of costs to the answering defendants in the Court below. The plaintiffs respondents will pay the appellants' costs of both the appeals in this Court.

KANHAIYA LAL, A. J. C.—I generally agree with the conclusions at which my learned colleague has arrived, except in regard to the effect of section 15 of Act I of 1869 on the rule of succession laid down in the sanad, about which I entertain some doubt.

The dispute in these appeals relates to the Dandi Kanch estate, which belonged to Sripat Singh, a Sombansi Thakur, whose name was entered at No. 260 in List No. I and at No. 120 in List No. II, appended to Act I of 1869. Sripat Singh died, on the 17th November 1861, before Act I of 1869 was passed. On the 11th November 1861 Sripat Singh made an application in response to a circular issued by the Chief Commissioner of Oudh on the 18th January 1860, stating that as he had till then no son, he desired that if no son was born to him, Dan Bahadur Pal Singh, his son-in-law, should succeed to his estate after his death. Dan Bahadur Pal Singh, accordingly succeeded to his estate on his death and was the proprietor of the estate when Act I of 1869 came into force. His name was not, however, entered in the lists appended to that Act, and he was not, therefore, a taluqdar or grantee or the heir or legatee of such a taluqdar or grantee within the meaning of section 15 or 22 of Act I of 1869, as it stood before it was amended by U. P. Act III of 1910. Section 21 of the latter Act gave the amendments made by it in the definitions of the words "heir" and "legatee," contained in Act I of 1869, a retrospective operation, provided such retrospective operation did not have the effect of divesting an estate or part of an estate from a person, in whom it had already vested before the amending Act was passed. As the estate in the present instance had already been vested in Dan Bahadur Pal Singh, and the effect of applying the amended definitions would have been to divest him and his successors, it is common ground that the special rules of succession laid down in Act I of 1869 do not apply to the estate in suit.

Dan Bahadur Pal Singh died on the 14th March 1906, leaving a widow Musammat Sukhpal Kuar, a daughter Musammat Balraj Kuar, and a step-brother by the same father, Mahadeo Pal Singh, who is the plaintiff in the suit from which these appeals have arisen. Musammat Balraj Kuar is married to Sant Bakhsh Singh, by whom she has a son, Adya Bakhsh Singh. Mahadeo Pal Singh claimed the estate to the exclusion of Adya Bakhsh Singh and the widow and daughter of Dan Bahadur Pal Singh. Adya Bakhsh Singh claimed the estate under a bequest said to have been made by Dan Bahadur Pal Singh, his maternal grandfather. Musammat Sukhpal Kuar and Musammat Balraj Kuar claimed their respective interests under the Hindu Law.

It is not here disputed that Sripat Singh got the estate under a primogeniture sanad, which declared that, in the event of his dying intestate or any of his successors dying intestate, the estate shall descend to the nearest male heir according to the rule of primogeniture.

The main questions for consideration in these appeals are whether the devolution of the estate in the hands of Dan Bhahadur Pal Singh was governed by the rule of succession laid down in the sanad or by the personal law applicable to the religion or tribe to which he belonged, whether Dan Bahadur Pal Singh bequeathed the estate in his lifetime to Adya Bakhsh Singh and whether Musammat Balraj Kuar and her son, Adya Bakhsh Singh, were excluded from inheritance by the sanad or by a custom prevailing in the family of Dan Bahadur Pal Singh.

It is conceded that if the devolution is governed by the personal law, Musammat Sukhpal Kuar would be entitled to the estate and would be succeeded on her death by Musammat Balraj Kuar and her son, Adya Bakhsh Singh, in succession, if they survived her, provided they were not excluded by family custom. It is also conceded that if the devolution is governed by the rule of succession laid down in the sanad, Musammat Sukhpal Kuar and Musammat Balraj Kuar would be excluded from succession, but it is disputed whether Adya Bakhsh Singh, as the solitary male heir under the personal law, would be so excluded.

In 1899 Kishun Lal, a clerk in the office of the British Indian Association, Lucknow, issued a notice, which was published in the British Indian Association Gazette, called the Akhbar-i-Anjuman Hind, inviting the taluqdars to supply him with particulars of their family estates and also to declare the names of the persons who were to succeed them in possession of their estates, with a view to the publication of a consolidated history of the Oudh taluqdars. In response to that notice, a document was sent by Dan Bahadur Pal Singh to Kishun Lal, containing the necessary particulars and stating that he had no children except one daughter, who had a son, named Lal Adya Bakhsh Singh, that Adya Bakhsh Singh was his heir and successor, and that no other person than that boy was to be his heir under any law. He kept a copy of this document with himself. Kishun Lal published the document in his book, altering the narrative from the first person to the third person. The evidence, adduced on the point, has been discussed in detail by my learned colleague and need not be recapitulated here. I agree with him that the narrative, as published by Kishun Lal and contained in the copy, found among the papers of Dan Bahadur Pal Singh, accurately represents the wishes communicated by Dan Bahadur Pal Singh, as to the person whom he wanted to succeed him on his death, and that it constitutes a valid testamentary disposition, which the legatee is entitled to enforce. Under the Hindu Law, a Will may be oral, and any statement made by a person expressing or manifesting an intention as to the posthumous disposition of his property can operate as his Will. As pointed out in Maulvie Mohamed Shumsool Hooda v. Shewukram (6), Kalian Singh v. Sanwal Singh (7), Mathura Das v. Bhikhan Mal (8) and Janki v. Kallu Mal (9), petitions addressed to officials, and papers drawn up in accordance with the intentions of a testator, though not signed by him, might constitute a valid testamentary disposition of property under the Hindu Law. Replies to official inquiries have been held by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Hurpershad v. Sheo Dyal (5), Haidar Ali v. Tasadduk Rasul Khan (10) and Balbhaddar Singh v. Sheo Narain Singh (11) to operate as Wills. Testamentary statements made in wajib-ul-arz or powers-of-attorney have similarly been held to operate as Wills.

Assuming, however, that the statement made in the aforesaid document does not operate as a valid testamentary disposition, the question arises whether the devolution of the estate in the hands of Dan Bahadur Pal Singh was governed by the personal law or by the rule of succession laid down in the sanad, as modifying that law. Section 15 of Act I of 1869, as it existed before its amendment by U. P. Act III of 1910, lays down that if any taluqdar or grantee shall heretofore have transferred or bequeathed to any person not being a taluqdar or grantee the whole or any portion of his estate, and such person would not have succeeded according to the provisions of that Act to the estate or to a portion thereof, if the transferor or testator had died without having made the transfer and intestate, the transfer of and succession to the property, so transferred or bequeathed, shall be regulated by the rules which would have governed the transfer of, and succession to, such property, if the transferee or legatee had bought the same from a person, not being a taluqdar or grantee. The bequest in favour of Dan Bahadur Pal Singh in the present case was made and came into operation before the Act was passed, and as Dan Bahadur Pal Singh was not a person who would have succeeded to the estate according to the provisions of the Act but for that bequest, the effect of section 15 is to render the rules as to transfer and succession laid down in the Act inapplicable to the estate in his hands. It is contended that the effect of section 15 is to render not only the rules of transfer and succession laid down in the Act, but also the rule of succession, laid down in the sanad, inapplicable to the estate in the hands of such a legatee. But it seems to me that the intention of this section was to exclude the estate in such a contingency from the disability imposed by the Act on taluqdars and grantees in the matters of transfer and succession and not from any rules which might be applicable independently of the Act. The rules which would have governed the transfer of or succession to such estates before Act I of 1869 was passed might have been either the personal law, as modified by custom, or the rules of succession as laid down in the sanad to which legal effect was given by the Crown Grants Act (XV of 1895). That Act provided that whereas doubts had arisen as to the power of the Crown to impose limitations and restrictions upon grants and other transfers of land made by it and it was expedient to remove those doubts, it was enacted that all provisions, restrictions, and limitations over contained in any such grant or transfer shall be valid, and take effect according to their tenor, any rule of law, Statute or enactment of the Legislature to the contrary notwithstanding. The rule of succession laid down in the sanad, being a condition of the grant, thus superseded or modified the personal law, so far as it went, and, if the rules for transfer and succession, laid down in Act I of 1869, could not apply to the estate by reason of the bequest, made by Sripat Singh in favour of

Dan Bahadur Pal Singh, the transfer of and succession to the estate in the hands of Dan Bahadur Pal Singh would be governed by the rules which would have governed the transfer of or succession to the estate if the transferee or legatee had bought the same from a person not being a taluqdar or grantee, that is, as if the rules relating to transfer and succession in the matter of taluqdars and grantees had not been applicable. Those rules would have been, in the case of an estate granted by means of a primogeniture sanad, the rules laid down in the sanad itself, which was the root of the title, and subject to those rules, the ordinary law of the religion and tribe applicable to the persons to whom the sanad was granted. In other words, to use the language of Lord Shaw in Debi Bakhsh Singh v. Chandrabhan Singh (1), the section prescribes nothing else than the relegation of the transferee or legatee in the matter of transfer and succession to the situation in which he would have been found apart from the Statute. The purchaser of an ordinary estate is governed in the matter of succession by his own personal law and not by that applicable to the transferor, and all that section 15 seems to me to lay down is that in the contingency there contemplated, the law relating to transfer and succession shall be the law applicable to the transferee or legatee, and the estate shall be free from the fetters, imposed by Act I of 1869 on taluqdars and grantees in regard to those matters. It does not seem to me to be probable that it was intended by section 15 to cut fetters not imposed by the Act or fetters which existed independently of it; and the statement that the transferee or legatee in such a case would be deemed to have bought from a person, not being a taluqdar or grantee, merely implies a release for certain purposes from the clutches of the Act and not from those imposed by any other law. The object of the section is not to wipe out the sanad but to wipe out the disabilities imposed in certain matters on the sanad holders by Act I of 1869. Had the intention been to relegate the transferee or legatee in the contingency mentioned to the situation apart from the Statute and apart from the sanad, the section would have said so in clearer and more unambiguous terms, and the reference in section 11 of the Act to taluqdars and grantees being competent to transfer the whole or any portion of the estate, subject to all the conditions under which the estate was conferred by the Government, would have been out of place. Where the special rules of succession laid down in Act I of 1869 apply, such conditions would no doubt be, as observed by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Brij Indar Bahadur Singh v. Ranee Janki Koer (12), only those relating to loyalty, good services and the like, for the rule of succession laid down in the sanad has been superseded thereby. But where the special rules of succession, laid down in section 22, do not apply, as in this case, all the conditions laid down in the sanad continue in force, so long as the estate remains in the hands of the grantee or his "successors". The matter is not free from difficulty, and the language used in section 15 is far from clear. But, on a careful consideration of the provisions of the Act, I am inclined to think that section 15 operates to take an estate for purposes of transfer and succession in the contingency therein mentioned outside the Act and relegates the transferee and legatee to the situation in which he would have been, if those rules had not been enacted or had not been applicable to the estate. In Ghulam Abbas Khan v. Bibi Ummatul-Fatima (2) the rule of succession laid down in the sanad was not deemed to be excluded under similar circumstances. In Sital Singh v. Sitla Bakhsh Singh (13) the circumstances were somewhat different, for the amendment made by U. P. Act III of 1910 was held in that case to be capable of retrospective operation without disturbing any vested rights. The former case was similar to the present in so far as the estate, with which it was concerned, did not come under the Act for the purpose of succession and had, therefore, continued to be governed by the sanad, while in the latter case the estate was governed by the Act for all purposes and the main question was whether in view of the Amending Act III of 1910 the sanad applied when the estate went out of it for purposes of succession under section 15.

The application of the rule of succession laid down in the sanad would not, however, make any difference in this case, because, as my learned colleague has pointed out, the rule of succession laid down therein is confined in its operation to the grantees and their successors, implying thereby their successors by inheritance. The official correspondence, which preceded or accompanied the grant of primogeniture sanads, was summarized by me in my judgment in Ghulam Abbas Khan v. Bibi Ummatul-Fatima (2), where the whole matter was discussed in detail. It seems to me that it was not the intention of the sanad to make the rule of primogeniture applicable to persons, to whom the estate might pass, outside the line of inheritance laid down therein by any of the methods mentioned in the sanad; and as held in Sital Singh v. Sitla Bakhsh Singh (13) that rule would not apply to such legatees or transferees.

On the questions of custom and accretion, I have nothing to add to what my learned colleague has said.

I concur, therefore, in allowing the appeals, setting aside the decree of the learned Subordinate Judge and dismissing the suit, with one set of costs to the answering defendants in the Court below. The plaintiffs-respondents will pay the appellants' costs of both the appeals in this Court.

JUDGMENT.

FLETCHER, J.—This is an appeal against an order of the learned District Judge of Bankura, dated the 19th March 1915, modifying the order of the Munsif of the 3rd Court at Bishenpur. The suit was brought by the plaintiffs as the purchasers of the equity of redemption in a certain property. The defendant was the mortgagee under an usufructuary mortgage. It is found by both the lower Courts, and not denied, that the time for redemption has arrived. The learned Munsif decreed redemption. On appeal to the learned District Judge he remanded the case to the first Court. The first point on which the learned Judge remanded the case was that the plaintiffs, as he held, were entitled to redeem only in respect of an undivided $\frac{2}{3}$rds share in the property subject to the mortgage. The learned Judge, acting on the decision in the case of Girish Chunder Dey v. Juramoni De (1), came to the conclusion that the plaintiffs were entitled to redeem only a portion of the property. The decision on which the learned District Judges acted was, in my opinion, a wrong decision. The case on which the learned Judges who decided the case reported as Girish Chunder Dey v. Juramoni De (1) rested their decision, namely, the case of Nawab Azimut Ali Khan v. Jowahir Sing (2), does not justify that decision. In the case of Nawab Azimut Ali Khan v. Jowahir Sing (2) the mortgagee had become the purchaser of a portion of the equity and, of course, a case of that nature is clearly distinguishable from the case where there has been a severance of the equity of redemption amongst parties other than the mortgagee. The sections of the Transfer of Property Act are quite clear on the point and the law is also quite clear. There are many decisions opposed to the decision reported as Girish Chunder Dey v. Juramoni De (1). It is sufficient to refer only to the cases of Huthasanan Nambudri v. Parameswaran Nambudri (3) and Mora Joshi v. Ram Chandra Dinkar Joshi (4). The observations of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case reported as Norender Narain Singh v. Dwarka Lal Mundur (5) are also clearly opposed to the decision reported as Girish Chunder Dey v. Juramoni De (1). The sections of the Transfer of Property Act are also opposed to such a decision. The law as stated in the text books, so far as I am aware, is to the effect that in an ordinary case, the partial owner of the equity of redemption is entitled to redeem the whole mortgage. Nobody has ever heard that proposition doubted before and I think the decision in Girish Chunder Dey v. Juramoni De (1) was founded on a misreading of the decision reported as Nawab Azimut Ali Khan v. Jowahir Sing (2). I think that, even accepting, although it is not necessary to decide that in this case, the learned Judge's finding that the plaintiffs have acquired only a $\frac{2}{3}$rd share of the equity, the plaintiffs are notwithstanding that entitled to redeem the entire mortgage.

Then it is said that a point arises on the construction of the mortgage whether this case is not premature, because the redemption, according to the terms of the deed, is to take place on payment of the principal sum on the expiration of 1319 B. S., that is, " the Yamasiray in 1320 B. S." Exactly what the meaning of "Yamasiray in 1320 B. S." is, I do not know and, notwithstanding that we are assisted in this case by Bengali gentlemen who appear both for the plaintiffs and the defendant, they do not pretend to know what it means. Whatever Yamasiray in 1320 is, on the most liberal construction it must have long since expired. A discussion as to the meaning of the term will be purely academic and I think there is no use sending the case back for a decision as to what " Yamasiray in 1320 B. S." is.

In the result, the order of remand made by the learned District Judge must be set aside and the decree of the Munsif for redemption restored. The costs of this appeal and the costs of the appeal in the lower Appellate Court will be paid by the defendant to the plaintiffs. The order of the Court of first instance as regards costs will stand. We assess the hearing fee in this Court at two gold mohurs. Two months' time from the date of the arrival of the record in the Court of first instance is allowed to the plaintiffs to pay the money due to the defendant on his mortgage.

GOBINDEY—DEFENDANT—APPELLANT

RAM ADHIN—PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Hindu Law—Joint family - Separation in mess and residence—Separate property—Burden of proof.

In a suit for partition between brothers who were members of a joint Hindu family, it was admitted that the wife of the plaintiff during his absence from home which lasted for a considerable time, was on account of her quarrelsome disposition sent to live in a portion of the family house and to have her meals separately:

Held, that this did not constitute such an admission of separation in estate among the members as would relieve the defendant from proving that the property in dispute was his separate property. [p. 79, col. 1]

Appeal against the decree of the District Judge, Rae Bareli, dated the 2nd May 1917, upholding the decree of the Munsif, Rae Bareli, dated the 27th November 1916.

Mr. Mohammad Anwar Ali, for the Appellant.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal has arisen out of a suit for partition brought by one Ram Adhin against his brother Gobindey, defendant No. 1, who was the contesting defendant. Another brother was impleaded as defendant but he did not contest the claim. The plaintiff's case was that the parties were members of a joint family, that there was joint family property consisting of three small items of property, that this property had never been divided and that the plaintiff was entitled to his share. The first defendant set up a defence that the plaintiff was separate and that the separation had taken place in the joint family 25 years before the suit. In these circumstances and on these pleadings the Courts laid the burden of proving separation on the defendant, and both the Courts are agreed that the separation so alleged was not established and consequently the claim of the plaintiff has been decreed.

The main argument of the learned Counsel who has appeared here to support the appeal is that the Courts below were wrong in their adjustment of the burden of proof. It is said that in view of certain admissions made by the plaintiff the burden rested on him. I can find nothing in the record to support the argument that the plaintiff made any admission of separation in property. What the Courts below have found is that many years before the suit was brought the plaintiff went off to some other part of India and remained away for a considerable time. He left his wife behind him, who seems to have been of a quarrelsome disposition. She could not agree with the other members of the family and so she was sent to live in a portion of the family house and to have her meals separate. That would not constitute any admission of separation in estate upon which the defendant was entitled to rely and I am satisfied, therefore, that the burden of proof was rightly laid on the defendant and that the findings of the Courts below are in all respects correct. The evidence has been carefully examined in both the Courts and the finding is that there never has been any division of the family property. In these circumstances it seems to me that this case cannot go any further. I dismiss this appeal under Order XLI, rule 11, of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Appeal dismissed.

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No 1117 OF 1916.

July 9, 1917.

Present:—Sir Edward Chamier, KT., Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Sharfuddin.

KULDIP SINGH—APPELLANT

KULDIP CHOUDHURI—RESPONDENT.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXIII, r. 1—Withdrawal of suit with permission to bring fresh suit on payment of costs, effect of—Second suit, maintainability of, without payment of costs—Order of withdrawal, form of.

Where a plaintiff is allowed to withdraw a suit with permission to bring a fresh suit, the payment of the costs of the first suit being made a condition precedent to the institution of a fresh suit, and a second suit is instituted without payment of such costs, the suit is maintainable provided the costs are paid before the suit comes on for trial. [p. 80, col. 1.]

In such cases until the costs are paid the permission is not operative and, therefore, there is no withdrawal with liberty to bring a fresh suit, the result being that until there is such a withdrawal the former suit remains pending and is under section 10 of the Civil Procedure Code a bar to the trial of the second suit. [p. 80, col. 1.]

The order allowing withdrawal of the suit in such cases should limit the time within which costs should be paid and should go on to direct that on failure to pay costs within that time, the original suit shall stand dismissed with costs. [p. 80, col. 2.]

Second appeal from a decision of the District Judge, Monghyr, dated the 29th July 1916, reversing that of the Munsif, Begusarai, dated the 27th September 1915.

Mr. Mahomed Fakhruddin, for the Appellants.

Mr. Avadh Behari Chaubey, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

CHAMIER, C. J.—The plaintiff in the present suit, which is for the rent of certain land for the years 1318, 1319 and 1320 F., brought a previous suit for the years 1315, 1316, 1317 and 1318 F. He asked for permission to withdraw that suit and bring another suit and the Court passed the following order:—

"The plaintiff has filed a petition to withdraw the suit with permission to bring a fresh suit on the ground of errors in the plaint. Ordered that the plaintiff may withdraw the suit and bring a fresh suit if not otherwise barred. The defendant is allowed costs against the plaintiff and the payment of costs is made a condition precedent to the institution of a fresh suit."

That order was dated March 25th, 1914. The present suit was instituted on September 8th, 1914, which was exactly three years after the expiry of 1311 F., the first of the years now in suit. The Munsif decreed the claim, but on appeal the District Judge, though holding in favour of the plaintiff, on the merits allowed the appeal and dismissed the suit on the ground that it was barred by the order recited above.

In second appeal it is contended that the District Judge's order is wrong. Similar orders were considered by the Calcutta High Court in the cases of Abdul Aziz Molla v. Ebrahim Molla (1) and Shital Prasad Mondal v. Gaya Prosad Dingal [Sadhu Charan Tewari v. Baikuntha Nath Maduk] (2). In the earlier case the order passed was almost in exactly the same terms as the order which we have to consider in the present case. At the time when the second suit was instituted the costs of the first suit had not been paid, but they were paid before the suit came on for trial. The High Court held that the suit was maintainable. In the latter case also the order passed was practically in the same terms as the order which we have to consider in this case, and the High Court held that as the plaintiff had obtained leave to withdraw with permission to bring a fresh suit on payment of the costs of the first suit, the Court ought merely to have regarded section 10 as a bar to its proceeding with the trial of the second suit and that it should have proceeded with that trial when the costs of the first suit were paid. The result of these rulings is curious, but it is difficult to resist the reasoning on which the decisions are based. The condition of the permission to withdraw the first suit and bring a fresh suit was the payment of costs only. Until the costs were paid the permission was not operative; and therefore there was no withdrawal with liberty to bring a fresh suit, and the result was that until there was such a withdrawal the former suit remained pending and was, under section 10 of the Code, a bar to the trial of the second suit. The difficulty which has arisen in the present case is due to the incompleteness of the order passed in the first suit. The order in such circumstances should limit the time within which costs should be paid and should go on to direct that on failure to pay costs within that time the original suit shall stand dismissed with costs. In my opinion, it is not possible to distinguish the present case from the cases cited, and I would, therefore, hold that the District Judge was wrong in dismissing this suit. I would allow this appeal, set aside the decree of the District Judge, and give the plaintiff a decree for three years' rent at the rate of Rs. 9-8-0 per annum plus 25 per cent. damages. In the circumstances I would make no order as to costs in any Court.

SHARFUDDIN, J.—I agree.

CALCUTTA HIGH COURT.

APPEAL FROM APPELLATE ORDER No. 153 OF 1916.

July 23, 1917.

Present:—Mr. Justice N. R. Chatterjea and Mr. Justice Richardson.

KRISHNA DAS ROY AND OTHERS—DECREE-HOLDERS—APPELLANTS

KALI TARA CHOWDHURANI AND OTHERS—JUDGMENT-DEBTORS—RESPONDENTS.

Landlord and tenant—Suit for rent against some out of several joint tenants, maintainability of—Co-tenants' liability for rent, whether joint and several—Contract Act (IX of 187), s. 43—Joint promisors, liability of—'Joint liability' and 'joint and several liability,' distinction between.

The plaintiff brought a suit for arrears of rent against six persons, three of whom were dead, and obtained a decree. In execution the representatives of the deceased defendants were brought on the record, but they objected to the execution of the decree on the ground that the decree was a nullity having been obtained against persons some of whom were dead:

Held, that the decree was not a nullity and could be executed as a money decree as against those judgment-debtors who were living at the date of the suit and the decree passed therein, although it could not be executed as against the representatives of the judgment-debtors who were dead when the suit was instituted. Appeal against the order of the District Judge, Tipperah, dated the 15th March 1916, affirming that of the Munsif, 2nd Court at Chandpur, dated the 20th November 1915.

FACTS.—The appellants got a decree for rent for Rs. 368 and odd in respect of a kaimi jama. The suit was brought against six persons as tenants. At the time of the institution of the suit three of these persons were dead and the other three were alive. The fact of death of three of the tenants was not brought to the notice of the Court as the proceedings were ex parte, with the result that a decree for the amount claimed was passed against the tenants, three of whom had died long before the institution of the suit. In execution proceedings the landlords-appellants substituted the heirs of the deceased tenants and applied for execution of the whole decree against them as also against those tenants who were alive at the time of the suit. The defence was that the whole decree was a nullity as the decree was obtained against some of the tenants, who had died before the institution of the suit. Both the lower Courts held that the whole decree was a nullity and the question whether the decree was so could be entered into by the execution Court. The result was that the application for execution was dismissed as against all. From the said order an appeal was preferred to the High Court.

Babu Rupendra Kumar Mittra, for the Appellants.—The cases lay down the following propositions:—

(1) If lands are let out to two or more tenants, their liability to pay is joint and several. See Joy Gobind Laha v. Monmotha Nath Banerji (1), Jogendra Nath Roy v. Nagendra Narain Nandi (2), Rameswar Singh v. Jaileb Jha (3), Shaik Sahed v. Krishna Mohan Basak (4) and Abdul Aziz v Basdeo Singh (5).

(2) If lands are let out to one or more tenants, and others become entitled to the tenancy right by purchase, the liability of the purchasers is joint and several. See Kishori Raman Kapuria v. Ananta Ram Laha (6) and Dhunput Sing v. Sham Soonder Mitter (7).

(3) If lands are let out to one tenant or more and their rights devolve upon many by reason of succession, their liability is joint and not joint and several. See Kashi Kinkar Sen v. Satyendra Nath Bhadro (8) as explained in Shaik Sahed v. Krishna Mohan Basak (4).

Even when the right of one devolves upon several heirs, whose liability is joint, any one of the heirs can be sued for the whole rent by the landlord. According to English Law several joint promisees must be sued together. If one of them be sued, he can defeat the action by the plea of non-joinder of the others. See Parke, B., in King v. Hoare (9). Section 43 of the Contract Act does not make the liability of joint promisees joint and several, but takes away from the joint promisees the plea of non-joinder, if some of them only be sued.

See Hemendro Coomar Mullick v. Rajendrolall Moonshee (10). This question could not be considered in Kashi Kinkar Sen v. Satyendra Nath Bhadro (8), because all the joint tenants were made parties. The decree made against one was set aside because inconsistent with the pleadings.

(4) If a joint decree be passed against many, execution can be levied against one for the whole amount, leaving him to adjust his claim against others as he pleases. See Kally Mohun Bal v. Dinonath Chuckerbutty Chowdhry (11).

Hence in any case here the whole decree can be executed as a money decree against any of the three who were alive at the time of the suit.

Babu Bhabataran Brahmachari, for the Respondents.—The liability of tenants depends upon the contract. If the terms of the contract be not proved, their liability is joint and not joint and several. See Kashi Kinkar Sen v. Satyendra Nath Bhadro (3). If the liability were joint and several in the beginning, the appellant cannot execute the decree against the tenants who were alive at the time of the suit, because by suing all the tenants together, he elected to treat their liability to be joint.

The decree which has been passed is a joint decree and it cannot be executed against some. Kally Mohun Bal v. Dinonath Chuckerbutty Chowdhry (11) is no authority for the proposition that a joint decree can be executed against any one of the judgment-debtors. There one of the judgment-debtors was held liable for the whole amount because there was a special direction to that effect in the decree itself.

Babu Rupendra Kumar Mittra, in reply.

JUDGMENT.

CHATTERJEA, J.—This appeal arises out of an application for execution of a decree. The appellant brought a suit for arrears of rent against six persons who were the tenants and obtained a decree. It appears that three of them had died before the institution of the suit, and when the decree-holder brought the representatives of the deceased judgment-debtors on the record in the proceedings in execution of the decree, they objected to the execution on the ground that the decree was a nullity having been obtained against persons who were dead, and the Court of first instance gave effect to the contention, and the order of that Court was confirmed by the Court of Appeal below. The decree-holder has appealed to this Court, and it is contended on his behalf that although the decree was not binding upon the heirs of the judgment-debtors who were not living at the date of the suit, the liability of the judgment-debtors is joint and several and that the decree-holder is competent to proceed against such of the judgment-debtors as were not dead at the time of the institution of the suit and that as against them the decree was binding.

The first question for consideration, therefore, is whether the liability of joint promisors is a joint or a joint and several liability.

Now section 43 of the Contract Act lays down that when two or more persons make a joint promise, the promisee may, in the absence of express agreement to the contrary, compel any one or more of such joint promisors to perform the whole of the promise. As pointed out in Hemendro Coomar Mullick v. Rajendrolall Moonshee (10), the section allows the promisee to sue one or more of several promisors in one suit and so practically prohibits a defendant in such a suit from objecting that his co contractors ought to have been sued with him. It was decided in that case, following the rule laid down in King v. Hoare (9), that a decree obtained against one of several joint promisors is a bar to a subsequent suit against the others. We are not concerned in this case with that question, upon which there is a difference of opinion. But as pointed out by Strachey, C. J., in Muhammad Askari v. Radhe Ram Singh (12), the right of joint debtors to have all the co-contractors joined as defendants in any suit to enforce the joint obligation, which in England before the Judicature Acts could be enforced by means of a plea in abatement and since the Judicature Acts by an application for joinder, has been in India expressly excluded by section 43 of the Contract Act.

The next question is whether the liability of joint tenants for rent is a joint and several liability. That question has been considered in several cases in this Court. In Joy Gobinda Laha v. Monmotha Nath Banerji (1) a preliminary objection was taken to the hearing of the appeal on the ground that one of the defendants-respondents (in a suit for rent), had died and no substitution of his heirs had been made. The learned Judges (Mitra and Geidt, JJ.) overruled the objection on the ground that the "liability of the defendants is, however, joint and several, and the death of one of the defendants without his legal representatives being substituted in his place cannot exonerate the other defendants from liability. The appeal abates only so far as the deceased defendant is concerned." The same principle was followed in Jogendra Nath Roy v. Nagendra Narain Nandi (2), where a suit for rent was brought and an ex parte decree obtained against all the tenants, which was set aside at the instance of some of the defendants, and the other defendants not having been served with notice of the restoration of the suit, the plaintiff did not proceed against them; it was held by Rampini, A. C. J., and Sharfuddin, J., that "joint tenants are jointly and severally liable for the rent. To hold that they are only liable each for his own share of the rent would be directly opposed to the policy of the Act as laid down in section 88 of the Act (Bengal Tenancy Act)." This decision was approved of by D. Chatterjee and Vincent, JJ., in Rameswar Singh v. Jaideb Jha (3). In that case one of the defendants in a suit for rent died before the issue of summons. The fact of the death was brought to the notice of the Court, and there was an application to bring in his heirs. No further steps were taken by the Court and a decree was passed against the deceased defendant as if he were living. In the lower Appellate Court the alleged heirs of the deceased were brought in as defendants, and there it was contended that they had been brought in after the expiry of the period allowed by law, that the application for substitution was, therefore, barred by limitation and that the whole suit ought to fail and the contentions were given effect to. On second appeal this Court held that the deceased being only one of several tenants, it was quite competent to the plaintiff to maintain his suit against any number of several joint tenants and that, therefore, the suit against the other defendants was maintainable.

In another case, however, in the same Volume [Kashi Kinkar Sen v. Satyendra Nath Bhadro (8)] Mookerjee and Sharfuddin, JJ., were of opinion that the proposition that the landlord may maintain a suit for rent against any number of several joint tenants had been too broadly laid down in Rameswar Singh v. Jaideb Jha (3) and that when a landlord creates a tenancy in favour of two persons jointly, whether each is liable for the entire rent depends upon the intention of the parties, and that in order to determine whether the promise is joint and several, it is to be ascertained not only whether several persons have joined in making a promise to the same person, but also whether at the same time each of them has in addition made the same promise separately to the same promisee. In that case, the landlord sued three persons who were the tenants for recovery of rent at the rate of Re. 1-5 annas per year The defendants pleaded that the rent payable was at the rate of 12 annas 16 gandas only, but the plaintiff having produced a road-cess return filed by the first defendant which supported the rate alleged by the landlord, the Court of first instance gave a decree at that rate as against the 1st defendant for the entire rent and dismissed the suit against the other two. That decree was affirmed on appeal and in second appeal the learned Judges, after stating that the rule that the landlord may maintain a suit for rent against any number of several joint tenants was stated in too comprehensive terms, observed as follows :—"We may add that even if it could be laid down that ordinarily a landlord may make one of several joint tenants responsible for the whole rent, the doctrine would be inapplicable to the present case for two special reasons. In the first place, the landlord has brought his suit against all three tenants, as against one he has got an admission in favour of the rate of rent asserted by himself, as against the other two, he has no evidence to prove the rate and cannot possibly obtain a decree at a rate higher than the rate admitted by them. Under such circumstances, he cannot obviously be permitted to obtain a decree for the whole rent against the 1st defendant and ask for a dismissal of the suit as against the others. If this decree were maintained in a suit for contribution by the 1st defendant against his co-sharers, the position of the former would be one of considerable embarrassment. The first defendant would be liable to satisfy the claim of the landlord at one rate, and then possibly find himself unable to recover anything from his co-sharers except at a very much smaller rate: this would be clearly unjust. In the second place, the tenancy is admittedly an ancient one, and the tenants in occupation are the representatives of the original tenant. Now, even if it be assumed that one of several joint tenants is liable for the whole rent, it does not follow by any means that when land is let out by A to B upon the death of B, every one of his heirs is liable for the whole rent. As was pointed out in the case of Ahinsa Bibi v. Abdul Kader Saheb (13), the heirs really constitute one body and cannot be treated necessarily as persons who have made joint and several promises."

I think the principle upon which the actual decision in the above case was partly based, viz., that the heirs of the original tenant constitute one body, and that in such a case there is only a joint liability, cannot be disputed. In such a case there is no promise by two or more persons. The contract is with a single person as tenant, and when he dies the liability of his heirs is a joint liability. The principle was followed in Shaik Sahed v. Krishna Mohan Basak (4).

In the present case the contract was made with six persons, who were the tenants, and the cases cited above go to show that in such a case there is a joint and several liability.

The earlier cases referred to in the judgment in the case of Kashi Kinkar Sen v. Satyendra Nath Bhadro (8) are distinguishable. In Roop Narain Singh v. Juggoo Singh (14), it was no doubt held that a suit for rent due from several ryots on account of a holding which had been let out to them cannot be brought against one of them, but must be brought against all of them. The case, however, was decided before the passing of the Indian Contract Act and section 43 of that Act, therefore, was inapplicable to that case. In Khetter Mohan Pal v. Fran Kristo Kabiraj (15) the suit for rent was brought against one of the heirs of the original tenant and the question was whether he alone could be made liable for the entire rent. The rent claimed was on account of a permanent tenure and the learned Judges held that there is no law which compels a landlord, in order that he might succeed in a suit for rent, to sue all the heirs of a deceased tenure-holder when he had no notice who the heirs are. As stated above, the liability of the heirs of a tenant is a joint liability and in the case of an occupancy right all the heirs must be sued, and it was because the rent claimed in that case was on account of a permanent tenure (in respect of which the law provides for notice of succession to the landlord) that the learned Judges observed that the defendant being admittedly one of the heirs and in possession of the tenure was liable for the rent and he could not defeat the plaintiffs' suit by showing that there are other heirs equally liable, unless possibly he goes further and shows that their names have been notified as successors of the original holders or that they have been paying the rent and getting receipts as successors. In Ram Taran Chatterjee v. Asmatullah Sheikh (16) one of several joint tenants, who had executed a kabuliyat in favour of the landlord for the entire tenure, was held not to be bound in excess of his share and not liable for the whole rent, but it was proved in that case that the other tenants did not acquiesce in the kabuliyat and in a separate suit by the other tenants against the landlord it was found that they were not bound by the kabuliyat. The case of Ananda Kumar Naskar v. Hari Das Haldar (17) related to the heirs of the original tenant (an occupancy ryot) and as the landlord had sold the holding in execution of a decree obtained against some of the heirs ignoring the plaintiffs who were also heirs and from whom he had accepted rent, it was held that the entire jama did not pass by the sale and the plaintiffs' right was not affected thereby. In Abdul Rab Chowdhury v. Eggar (18) it was held that the landlord cannot succeed in a suit for rent in respect of a patni tenure (which had devolved on two mutwallis) against one of the mutwallis because mutwallis stand in the position of trustees.

The actual decision in the case of Kashi Kinkar Sen v. Satyendra Nath Bhadro (8) turned upon the grounds stated at page 645* of the report, which I have quoted above. There are, however, the observations made by the learned Judges that where a landlord creates a tenancy in favour of two persons jointly, whether each is liable for the entire rent depends upon the intention of the parties. In a case where there is a written contract, the question of intention would depend largely upon the terms of the contract. But in the present case it does not appear that there was any written contract and we do not know what were the terms of such contract if there was any. There is, therefore, nothing to show that the parties intended only a joint liability.

No argument can be founded on the ground that the landlord chose to sue all the tenants because the landlord had no knowledge that some of the tenants were dead when he instituted a suit. So far as the decree is concerned, there is nothing in the decree to indicate that the nature of the original liability was changed by it. It is unnecessary to state that if the landlord wished to proceed against the holding itself under the provisions of Chapter XIV of the Bengal Tenancy Act, he could not do so unless he obtained a decree against the heirs of the deceased tenants also, but he wants to execute the decree only as a money decree. The present case is covered by the principle of the decisions in the cases of Joy Gobind Laha v. Monmotha Nath Banerji (1), Jogendro Nath Roy v. Nagendra Narain Nandi (2) and Rameswar Singh v. Jaideb Jha (3).

I accordingly hold that the decree is not a nullity and that the plaintiff is entitled to execute the decree against the judgment-debtors who were living at the date of the rent suit and the decree passed in that suit. The case will go back to the Court of first instance for proceeding with the execution against them. The decree, however, will be executed only as a money-decree. We make no order as to costs.

RICHARDSON, J.—I agree that the appeal should succeed. It is clear that the decree cannot be executed as against the representatives of the judgment-debtors named in it who were dead when the suit was instituted, but why should it not be executed as against the judgment-debtors who were alive at the date of the suit or their representatives?

In the argument before us the question was raised whether under the original contract between the landlords and their tenants, the liability of the latter was joint or joint and several. The question, I suppose, where there is a written contract, must turn largely on its express terms. But as I understand the matter, the principal difference between a joint liability and a joint and several liability is this. A liability is joint if on the death of one of the joint promisors the liability becomes the liability of the surviving promisors and no liability devolves upon the heirs or legal representatives of the deceased promisor. In Kendall v. Hamilton (19), Lord Penzance says at page 526: "If a man deliver goods or lend money to two partners, the promise which the law implies is a joint promise. The effect of such a promise, as distinguished from a joint and several promise, is that in case of death the debt is enforcible only against the survivor." It may be said, therefore, that this survivorship is the distinguishing mark of a joint contract. Where there is no survivorship and the liability extends beyond the surviving debtors to the estate of a deceased debtor, the liability is presumably joint and several with the ordinary incidents of such a liability subject possibly, in exceptional cases, to any modification imposed by express agreement.

No doubt there may be differences in other respects between a liability which is joint and a liability which is both joint and several. For instance, in England, it is "the right of persons jointly liable to pay a debt to insist on being sued together" [Lord Cairns, L. C., in Kendall v. Hamilton (19)]. In India, however, apart from express agreement, this right has been abrogated by section 43 of the Contract Act. Nevertheless even in India the doctrine established in England by King v. Hoare (9) may still hold good [Hemendro Coomar Mullick v. Rajendrolall Moonshee (10)]. But such differences as these, where they exist, are consequences which flow from a liability being joint or which a particular system of law annexes to a joint liability. They are not the essential distinctions between a joint and a joint and several liability.

Now it may be the general rule in England that "where several persons agree to perform a particular act, they are bound jointly and not severally" (Addison on Contracts, 11th Edition, page 319). But is this general rule applicable in India in the case of co-tenants holding under a common landlord? As between the co-tenants themselves, their interest in the tenancy is presumably not a joint interest but an interest in common. The principle of joint ownership "appears to be unknown to Hindu Law except in the case of co-parcenary between the members of an undivided family" [Jogeswar Narain Deo v. Ram Chandra Dutt (20)]. If the rent is in arrears and the landlord desires to obtain a decree good against the land under the Bengal Tenancy Act, he must ordinarily (apart from any question of representation) implead all the co-tenants including the heirs or legal representatives of a deceased co tenant. In the ordinary case neither side contemplates a survivorship of the liability. As to a money-decree for the rent, good only under the Civil Procedure Code, even if the liability be one which would in England be regarded as joint and not as joint and several, the landlord need not under our law (in the absence of express agreement compelling him to do so) bring all the co-tenants on the record (Contract Act, section 43). But if he were bound to sue all the persons liable or if he in fact intends to take that course, he would, I imagine, naturally include the representatives of a deceased co tenant. He would not in the ordinary case suppose that his remedy was against the surviving co-tenants and them alone.

(20) 23 I. A. 37 at p. 44; 23 C. 670; 7 Sar. P. C. J. 13; 6 M. L. J. 75; 12 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 445 (P. C.).

If then there is no survivorship and if under section 43 the co-tenants have not the right to insist on being sued together, I should have thought that prima facie the liability was joint and several. This seems to have been the view adopted in Sourendra Mohan Tagore v. Surnomoyi (21), Joy Gobind Laha v. Monmotha Nath Banerji (1), Jogendra Nath Roy v. Nagendra Narain Nandi (2) and Rameswar Singh v. Jaideb Jha (3). It may be that in Kashi Kinker Sen v. Satyendra Nath Bhadro (8), Sir Asutosh Mookerjee, J., expressed a somewhat different view, but in that case the question was as to the liability to the landlord of the representatives of the original tenants. A similar question was considered in Shaik Sahed v. Krishna Mohan Basak (4). The question was decided in both cases on the footing that different considerations arose where the defendants were the representatives of a single tenant and not the co-tenants who had themselves contracted with the landlord. For the present purpose, therefore, it is not necessary to consider the result which was arrived at in those two cases and as to that I express no opinion.

I have made these observations because it was urged on behalf of the respondents in support of the order made below that as the original liability of the co-tenants was a joint liability and as the appellants chose to sue all the co-tenants, therefore, the decree could only be executed if it was a good and valid decree as against all the co-tenants. The precise terms of the agreement between the parties are not before us. I do not even know whether the agreement was embodied in a written lease.

The answer, in my opinion, to the first part of the argument, is that presumably the liability of the co-tenants was joint and several and it is neither found nor shown to be merely joint.

But even if it was a joint liability, I do not follow the second part of the argument. It was put on the ground of election. But the question raised has to do with the legal rights of the parties and has nothing to do with election. Reference may be made to the head-note of the case already so often cited, Kendall v. Hamilton (19), and to the observations of Lord Blackburn at page 542.

(21) 26 C. 103; 3 C. W. N. 38; 13 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 670.

Even if anything turned on election, there is nothing to show and it is not found—that the appellants knew that some of the persons whom they joined as defendants in their plaint were already dead. It certainly cannot be supposed that they intended or elected to join the dead with the living.

As to the legal rights of the parties, even if the contract was joint, it is not shown that there was any express agreement which obliged the landlord to bring all the tenants on the record. It was open to the landlords, therefore, under section 43 of the Contract Act to bring their suit against one or more of the tenants, and there is nothing in the law which prevents the suit from being a good suit as against the tenants who were alive at its institution.

In my opinion, in the absence of anything to show the contrary, the tenants were jointly and severally liable to the landlords but in any view of the matter the decree is as against those tenants who were alive when the suit was instituted a good and valid decree capable of execution against them or their present representatives.

I concur in the order proposed.

Punjab Courts Act (III of 1914), s. 41 (3)—Appeal, second, on point of custom—Certificate, defective, effect of.

A second appeal on a point of custom cannot be admitted upon a certificate granted by the lower Appellate Court in terms which do not satisfy the requirements of section 41 (3) of the Punjab Courts Act.

Second appeal from the decree of the Additional District Judge, Delhi, dated the 29th October 1915, affirming that of the Munsif, 1st Class, Delhi, dated the 6th April 1915, decreeing the claim.

Pandit Sham Lal, for the Appellants.

Mr. Nihal Chand Mehra, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This second appeal, which involves a question of custom, was admitted to a hearing by me provisionally upon a certificate granted by the Additional District Judge of Delhi in terms which did not satisfy the requirements of section 41 (3) of the new Punjab Courts Act, and the appellants' Counsel was directed to obtain and file a properly worded certificate at an early date. An application was made by the appellants to Additional District Judge, Delhi, for a proper certificate under the aforesaid section of the Punjab Courts Act, but the learned Judge has refused to grant the certificate required, on the ground that he cannot certify that the evidence regarding the existence of the custom involved in the case is "conflicting".

The result is that there is no certificate before me such as would satisfy the requirements of section 41 (3) of the Punjab Courts Act and on the strength of which a second appeal involving a question of custom could be admitted.

The other questions involved in the case are questions of fact and cannot be considered in second appeal.

As a result of the non-production of a proper certificate, this second appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Plaintiff brought a suit for possession and claimed a certain sum for mesne profits. There was a further claim for mesne profits during the pendency of the suit and after decree. The suit resulted in a decree for possession and for a portion of the sum claimed for mesne profits. The Court did not purport to deal with the question of mesne profits during the pendency of the suit and after decree. Plaintiff then brought a suit for mesne profits from the date of the institution of the previous suit up to the date of delivery of possession:

Held, that the suit was maintainable and was not barred either by Explanation V to section 11 or by rule 2 of Order II of the Civil Procedure Code. [p. 90, col. 2.]

Where there have been decided cases before an Act is amended, if the amendment does not expressly show that the law as interpreted by the decisions is altered, the rule laid down by the decisions is to be adhered to. [p. 89, col. 2.]

First appeal from a decree of the Additional Subordinate Judge, Meerut, dated the 30th August 1916.

The Hon'ble Dr. Tej Bahadur Sapru, Messrs. Kailash Nath Katju and Mohammed Abdullah, for the Appellants.

Mr. A. E. Ryves, Sir Sunder Lal and Mr. Oudh Behari Lal, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit for mesne profits. A previous suit had been brought in which possession of the land had been claimed. A certain sum of monies was also claimed as mesne profits for the period prior to the institution of the suit. There was a further claim for mesne profits during the pendency of the suit and after decree. The suit resulted in a decree for the plaintiffs for possession of the land and also a decree for a portion of the amount claimed by the plaintiffs for mesne profits. The rest of the plaintiffs' claim was dismissed. On referring to the judgment, it is quite clear that the Court never dealt or purported to deal with the mesne profits during the pendency of the suit or after decree. In the present suit mesne profits are claimed from the date of the institution of the suit up to the date of delivery of possession. The defence is that the decree in the previous suit operates as res judicata, and reliance is placed upon the provisions of section 11, Explanation V. Section 11 provides that "no Court shall try any suit or issue in which the matter directly and substantially in issue has been directly and substantially in issue in a former suit between the same parties.....in a Court competent to try such subsequent suit." Explanation V provides that "any relief claimed in the plaint, which is not expressly granted by the decree, shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to have been refused." This explanation corresponds exactly with Explanation 3 of section 13 of the old Code.

Reliance is also placed upon the provisions of Order II, rule 2, which provides that "every suit shall include the whole of the claim which the plaintiff is entitled to make in respect of the cause of action."

The contention on behalf of the defendant is that the Court, in the previous suit not having granted mesne profits during the pendency of the suit and from the date of the decree up to the date of delivery of possession, must be deemed to have refused it. Further, the decree ought to be interpreted as having expressly dismissed the suit in respect of mesne profits save to the extent that mesne profits were granted. The very same question had frequently arisen in the High Courts in India before the coming into operation of the present Code of Civil Procedure. All the Courts appear to have held that notwithstanding the provisions of the old Code a suit for mesne profits pendente lite and from the date of decree to delivery of possession could be maintained. This was expressly held in the case of Ram Dayal v. Madan Mohan Lal (1). In that case just like the present there had been in a previous suit a claim for mesne profits prior to the institution of the suit and also future mesne profits. Nevertheless the Court held that the subsequent suit for mesne profits from the date of the institution of the suit up to delivery of possession could be maintained when the Court in the previous suit had not decided the right of the plaintiff to these mesne profits. We think that we are bound to follow this decision, unless it is shown that the Legislature when enacting the present Code of Civil Procedure altered the law. It is a recognised rule that where there have been decided cases before an Act is amended, if the amendment does not expressly show that the law as interpreted by the decisions is altered, the rule laid down by the decisions is to be adhered to.

We now propose to consider whether the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1908 altered the law in respect of the matter with which we are dealing. Section 211 of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1882 provided that "in a suit for the recovery of possession of immoveable property yielding rent or other profits the Court may provide in the decree for the payment of rent or mesne profits in respect of such property from the institution of the suit until the delivery of possession to the party in whose favour the decree is made"....

It is to be noted that in this section there is no reference to the claim in the plaint being made for mesne profits. Section 212 provided that whether the suit was a suit for "possession of immoveable property and for mesne profits which have accrued on the property during the period to the institution of the suit, and the amount of such profits is disputed, the Court may either determine the amount by the decree itself, or may pass a decree for the property and direct an inquiry into the amount of mesne profits, and dispose of the same on further orders."

The provisions of these two sections seem to have been amalgamated in the provisions of Order XX, rule 12 of the new Code. That Order provides that "where there is a suit for the recovery of possession of immoveable property and for rent or mesne profits, the Court may pass a decree (a) for possession of the property, (b) for the rent or mesne profits which have accrued on the property during the period prior to the institution of the suit or directing an enquiry as to such rent or mesne profits, and (c) directing an enquiry as to the rent or mesne profits from the institution of the suit until (i) the delivery of possession to the decree-holder, (ii) the relinquishment of possession by the judgment-debtor with notice to the decree-holder through the Court, or (iii) the expiration of three years from the date of the decree, whichever event first occurs." Clause 2 of this rule provides: "Where an enquiry is directed under clause (b) or clause (c), a final decree in respect of the rent or mesne profits shall be passed in accordance with the result of the enquiry."

Under the old Code the practice was that excepting those cases in which the Court had actually found a certain amount due for mesne profits, the Court executing the decree used to be called upon to make an enquiry and to ascertain in execution the amount of mesne profits, whether they were mesne profits which had accrued prior to the institution of the suit or mesne profits which had accrued between that date and the delivery of possession. The authority to make this enquiry was conferred on the Court executing the decree by section 244 of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1882, to which we shall presently refer. It would seem, therefore, that the only substantial change that has been made in the law is that it is the Court which hears the suit which is to ascertain the mesne profits, whether those mesne profits be mesne profits which accrued before the institution of the suit or afterwards up to the date of delivery of possession, and it is this Court which is to make the final decree for mesne profits which has to be executed by the Court executing the decree. We do not think that any significance is to be attached to the fact that in section 211 of the old Code there is no reference to a claim for mesne profits or to the fact that Order XX, rule 12, purports to deal with suits in which mesne profits are claimed. Section 244 of the old Code dealt with certain matters which were to be determined by the Court executing the decree, and not by a separate suit, and amongst other questions the very first mentioned were questions regarding the amount of any mesne profits as to which the decree, had directed an enquiry. There is a proviso at the end of the section in the following words: "Nothing in this section shall be deemed to bar a separate suit for mesne profits accruing between the institution of the first suit and the execution of the decree therein, where such profits are not dealt with by such decree." The corresponding section of the Code of 1908 is section 47. In this section reference to all questions of mesne profits is omitted and the proviso which we have quoted from section 244 is also omitted. The argument is that this last mentioned omission is most significant and that it demonstrates the intention of the Legislature that suits for the recovery of mesne profits after a previous suit for possession cannot be maintained. A little consideration shows that this argument is not so forcible as might appear at first sight. The proviso to section 244 of the old Code seems to have presumed that there was nothing in the Code itself which would prevent a second suit for mesne profits but that it might be contended that the provisions of section 244 would preclude a second suit, and accordingly the words of the proviso are, not that nothing "in the Code" shall be deemed to bar a separate suit for mesne profits, but that nothing "in the section" shall be deemed to bar such a suit. It becomes apparent that the retention of this proviso in the new Code would have been altogether meaningless and out of place, because in section 47 of the new Code there is no reference to enquiries as to mesne profits at all and Order XX, rule 12, to which we have already referred, expressly takes away the jurisdiction of the Court executing the decree to make any enquiry in respect of mesne profits. The learned Judge in the Court below has referred to the report of the Select Committee on the provisions of the contemplated amendment of the Code of Civil Procedure. If it were permissible to consider the report at all, the inference would seem to be rather against the respondents than in their favour. The question had reference to a Bill which was subsequently withdrawn. In this Bill there was a provision which would have made it quite clear that a second suit for mesne profits could not be maintained. This provision does not find a place in the measure which was actually enacted. If any legitimate inference could be drawn at all, it would seem as if the Legislature knowing well the course of decisions in the Courts in India had come to the conclusion that it was best to maintain the rule of law as established by the cases. In this connection it may not be altogether out of place to suggest that there are some practical difficulties in the way of ascertaining mesne profits pendente lite and particularly future mesne profits in the original suit. Where there are more defendants than one, their liability may not altogether be the same and the final ascertainment of the amount due for mesne profits from the date of the decree to the time of delivery of possession can never be made until possession is actually taken by relinquishment on the part of the defendants or through the Court. We may mention here that the question recently arose in the Madras High Court in the case of Doraisami Aiyar v. Subramania Aiyar (2), in which the majority of a Full Bench of that Court were of opinion that nothwithstanding the provisions of the new Code a suit for mesne profits like the present could be maintained.

We allow the appeal, set aside the decree of the Court below and remand the case to that Court with direction to re-admit the suit in its original number and to proceed to hear and determine the same according to law. The appellants will have their costs of this appeal, including fees on the higher scale. Other costs will follow the event.

Registration Act (XVI of 1908), ss. 17, 49—Secondary evidence of unregistered lost document, admissibility of, to prove oral agreement not affecting land.

Secondary evidence of a lost unregistered document affecting an interest in immoveable property and therefore required to be registered is not admissible as evidence of any transaction affecting such property but such evidence is admissible to prove the document so far as it evidences an oral agreement not affecting the land or any interest in land.

Mr. Lambert, for the Applicant.

Mr. Maung Thin, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—In 1910 the plaintiff-appellant advanced Rs. 450 to the parents of the respondent in consideration of being put into possession of certain land, and it was agreed that the plaintiff should take the profits in lieu of interest. The transaction was reduced to writing but not registered. In 1915 the plaintiff had to give up possession to the respondent because the document not having been registered, the plaintiff had no right or interest in the land and therefore had no legal right to possession. The plaintiff then instituted this suit in September 1915 asking for a money-decree for the Rs. 450. In the Township Court the plaintiff obtained a decree: in the District Court plaintiff's suit was dismissed on the ground that the plaintiff was prevented from proving the agreement under which he obtained possession by sections 49 and 17 of the Registration Act. The plaintiff applies in revision on the ground that the District Court wrongly rejected that evidence.

Section 17 requires this document to be registered. Section 49 says: "No document requiring under section 17 to be registered shall affect any immoveable property comprised therein, or be received as evidence of any transaction affecting such property." The document in the present suit has been lost but if the plaintiff could not prove that document if available, he would be debarred from proving it by secondary evidence. But the plaintiff does not rely upon that document to prove any transaction affecting the land. He does not claim that he ever had any legal right to the possession of the land under that document. That he is entitled to use that document as evidence of an oral agreement which does not affect the land or any interest in the land, has been held by all the High Courts of India, vide, Ulfatunnissa v. Hosain Khan (1) and in this Court Myat Thin v. P. C. V. E. Kasu Visvanathan Chetty (2). The District Judge, therefore, wrongly held that that evidence was inadmissible. From his judgment it appears that he concurs with the Township Judge in the findings of fact, if this evidence was admissible, i. e., that the plaintiff advanced Rs. 450 to the defendant's parents in 1910 and obtained possession and received the profits in lieu of interest and was dispossessed in 1915. That being so, plaintiff is entitled to a decree for Rs. 450 against the respondent in her representative capacity with costs in both Courts, and three gold mohurs for the costs of this application.

Appeal against the decree of Mr. Justice Chapman, dated the 28th May 1915, in

BHOLI BAI v. CHIMNI BAI.

Appeal from Appellate Decree No. 2231 of 1913.

FACTS appear from the following judgment of

CHAPMAN, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit for rent. It appears that the land was settled with the tenant for the first time under a lease for a term of three years. The lease recited that rent had been fixed at Rs. 48 but that the landlord seeing the tenant unable to pay took pity on him and kept in abeyance the sum of Rs. 15. At the end of the lease there is a provision to the effect that after the expiry of the term of three years if the tenant does not take a fresh settlement at an enhanced rent, the landlord shall be entitled to claim rent at the full amount of Rs. 48. The period of the lease expired in the year 1311. Rent was claimed at the rate of Rs. 48 for the years 1314 to 1317. The learned District Judge gave a decree to the plaintiffs at the rate of Rs. 33. The grounds of his judgment are (i) that since the expiry of the term of the lease the plaintiff had been realising rent at the rate of Rs. 33 and not at the enhanced rate and, therefore, the plaintiff must be held to have waived the right to realise rent at the rate of Rs. 48 and (ii) that the lease was not read over to the defendant who was an illiterate man. It appears to me that the judgment of the learned District Judge cannot be supported upon either of these grounds. There was no evidence that the plaintiff had realised rent at the rate of Rs. 33. The plaintiff's case was that he had realised nothing since the expiry of the term. The defendant's case was that he had paid Rs. 29. It is clear, therefore, that no case of waiver against the plaintiff was made out and so far as the ground that the lease was not read over to him is concerned, it is not sufficient in my opinion for an illiterate man merely to say that the lease was not read over to him. He must make out more than that in order to evade the document which he has signed. If he is foolish enough to sign a document without having it read over to him, he must suffer the consequence.

It is argued on behalf of the respondent that this lease was a mere device to evade the provisions of section 29 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. Having regard to the judgment of Coxe, J., in the case of Mahamaya Kar v. Kishore Chang (1), I feel constrained to say that the lease was a device in order to evade the provisions of section 29 of the Bengal Tenancy Act and, therefore, cannot be given effect to. It is true that this plea was not expressly raised in either of the Courts below, but it was alleged in the written statement that the condition was unlawfully written in the invalid kabuliyat. The defendant succeeded in the Court of Appeal below on other grounds and I feel it difficult to say, where there is a clear authority for holding that the document was executed for the purpose of evading the law, that it is not within my duty to allow the plea to be taken for the first time in second appeal.

The appeal is dismissed without costs.

Babu Mohini Mohan Chakraburty, for the Appellant.

Babu Panchanan Ghose, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—In our opinion this judgment of Mr. Justice Chapman must be reversed. The learned Judge has allowed a point to be taken before him which was not taken in either of the lower Courts and which involves two questions of fact. In the first place, it had to be shown before section 29 of the Bengal Tenancy Act came into operation that the defendent was an occupancy ryot, and, even if that were shown, it would further have to be proved that the contract was a mere device to evade the provisions of the Statute.

The appeal, therefore, is decreed with costs and the decree of the first Court restored.

BHOLI BAI v. CHIMNI BAI.

judicata - Suit by widow against daughter-in-law for share of estate—Previous suit by collaterals compromised by widow, effect of.

In a suit by a Hindu widow against her daughter-in-law for possession of a moiety of the estate alleged to have been left by the former's husband or in the alternative for maintenance, it appeared that the collaterals of the plaintiff's deceased son (the husband of the defendant) had sometime previously sued for possession of the entire estate on the allegation that the defendant having become unchaste had forfeited her widow's estate. The present plaintiff, who was impleaded as a defendant in that suit, resisted the claim and eventually effected a compromise with the plaintiffs, according to which she agreed to relinquish her rights in their favour in lieu of certain property to be given to her as absolute owner in the event of the collaterals' suit succeeding. In the event of their defeat, she was to receive the property on the death of the defendant:

Held, that this compromise could not and did not affect the rights of the two widows inter se, and that so far as the plaintiff's claim against her daughter-in-law was concerned, there had been neither an adjudication nor any agreement which could be set up as a bar to the suit, and that therefore the rule of res judicata had no applicability to the case. [p. 93, col. 2; p. 94, col. 1.]

First appeal from the decree of the Subordinate Judge, 1st Class, Multan, dated the 23rd June 1916, dismissing the claim.

The Hon'ble Mr. Muhammad Shafi, for the Appellant.

The Hon'ble Pandit Sheo Narain, R. B, and Lala Shiv Ram Das, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of an action brought by the appellant Musammat Bholi Bai, against her daughter-in-law Musammat Chimni Bai, for possession of a moiety of the estate alleged to have been left by the former's husband, or in the alternative for maintenance. The suit has been dismissed by the Subordinate Judge on the ground that it was barred by the rule of res judicata and the sole question which we are called upon to determine is whether the plea of res judicata has been established.

The following brief pedigree-table explains the relationship of the parties:—

Jhangi Ram=Musammat Bholi Bai.

Hoa Ram=Musammat Chimni Bai.	Musammat Mungi Bai.

The previous suit, which has been relied upon in support of the defence of res judicata, was instituted in August 1910 by the collaterals of Hoa Ram for possession of the entire estate on the allegation that Musammat Chimni Bai having become unchaste had forfeited her widow's estate, and that the collaterals were consequently entitled to the possession of the property. Musammat Bholi Bai, who was impleaded as a co-defendent, resisted the claim; but the collaterals subsequently came to terms with her, which were embodied in a deed of compromise executed on 25th May 1911. According to this compromise Musammat Bholi Bai agreed to relinquish her rights in favour of the collaterals in lieu of two houses and a plot of land, which were to be given to her as an absolute owner in the event of the collaterals' suit succeeding against Musammat Chimni Bai. In the event of their defeat, she was to receive the above property on the death of Musammat Chimini Bai.

This compromise could not, and did not, affect the rights inter se of the two widows, and indeed the matter is placed beyond all possible doubt by the following clause in the deed :—

"If the plaintiffs' suit be dismissed the rights of defendant No. 2 (Musammat Bholi Bai) as against Musammat Chimni Bai shall stand as before."

After the said compromise the collaterals' suit proceeded against Musammat Chimni Bai and ultimately the dispute between them was settled by a compromise entered into on 11th May 1912; in consequence of which the collaterals gave up their claim against Musammat Chimni Bai (who was to remain in possession of the property until her death) and accepted certain mortgagee's rights in a plot of land in lieu of the costs incurred by them. The District Judge, before whom the deed was placed for verification, passed a decree accordingly.

The aforesaid decree refers not only to the compromise of 11th May 1912, but also to the earlier one which need not have been embodied in the decree. Now, we fail to understand how the principle of res judicata has any applicability to the claim of Musammat Bholi Bai against her daughter-in-law. No judicial pronouncement was ever made upon that claim, and indeed it is conceded on behalf of the respondent that the rule of res judicata does not apply to the case. It is, however, contended that as the suit resulted in a decree, that decree must be treated as the final determination of the rights of the parties interested in the estate. And the decree, it is argued, states that Musam-

mat Chimni Bai " shall remain in possession of the rest of the property (namely, the entire estate with the exception of the mortgagee's rights assigned to the collaterals) on life tenure." But a perusal of the decree itself makes it absolutely clear that this provision is taken from the compromise entered into between Musammat Chimni Bai and the collaterals, and that it has no bearing upon the rights of Musammat Bholi Bai. So far as this lady's claim against her daughter-in-law is concerned, there has been neither an adjudication nor any agreement which can be set up as an answer to the suit. The absurdity of the defendent's plea is demonstrated by the fact that Musammat Bholi Bai has not even got the property which she was to receive from the collaterals ; and her Counsel Mr. Muhammad Shafi states that she is prepared to abandon her suit, if she gets as an absolute owner the aforesaid property from Musammat Chimni Bai who is said to be in possession thereof.

The only matter relied upon in support of the decision of the lower Court is the clause in the decree allowing Musammat Chimni Bai to hold the estate for her life; but that clause, as pointed out above, is the outcome of the compromise between her and the collaterals, and does not in the least prejudice the rights of the plaintiff. No other argument has been advanced before us in justification of the dismissal of the suit ; and we have no hesitation in holding that the Subordinate Judge's decision is entirely wrong. Indeed, the decision seeks to make Musammat Chimni Bai's compromise with the collaterals binding upon Musammat Bholi Bai, to which she was no party, but leaves out of account the earlier settlement which gave her something. There is absolutely no justification for it either in law or in equity.

For the aforesaid reasons we accept the appeal, and setting aside the judgment and the decree of the lower Court remand the case under Order XLI, rule 23, for decision on the remaining issues. The Court-fee on the memorandum of appeal shall be refunded and other costs shall abide the event.

Appeal accepted;

(Case-law discussed.)

Per Chamier, C. J.—The operation of Article 1 (a) of Schedule III of the Bengal Tenancy Act is not excluded by section 116 of the Act in the case of zirat land. [p. 96, col. 2.]

Section 116 of the Bengal Tenancy Act prevents the application of Chapter VI to raiyats of a proprietor's private land in two cases only, namely, where such land is held under a lease for a term of years and where it is held under a lease from year to year. Except in these two cases Chapter VI of the Act was intended to apply to raiyats of a proprietor's private land, and such raiyats may be non-occupancy raiyats within the meaning of the Act. [p. 96, cols. 1 & 2.]

Per Mullick, J.—There is nothing in the Bengal Tenancy Act to support the view that it is not open to a zemindar to create raiyati interests in his private lands. On the contrary section 116 of the Act clearly contemplates the acquisition of occupancy rights in such land under certain circumstances and if of occupancy rights, then why not of non-occupancy rights also? [p. 99, col. 2.]

Per Chapman, J.—The classification of tenants in sections 4 and 5 of the Bengal Tenancy Act was not intended to be scientific or precise, and in order to render the Act intelligible these sections must be applied with a reasonable amount of elasticity. [p. 98, col. 1.]

Zirat land is not raiyati land although the zemindar may lose his rights in it by treating it as if it was raiyati. But if he lets it for a term or from year to year, it remains his own and the tenant of it is not a raiyat. [p. 98, col. 2.]

Article 1 (a) of Schedule III of the Bengal Tenancy Act does not apply to tenants in zirat land. [p. 99, col. 1.]

Per Jwala Prasad, J.—The Bengal Tenancy Act does not purport to be a complete and exhaustive Code even in respect of the law of landlord and tenant. A person holding zirat land under a lease for a term of years is not a raiyat and will not be governed by the Bengal Tenancy Act but by the general law. He does not become a non-occupancy raiyat after the expiry of the lease and is a trespasser only. Therefore, Article 1 (a) of Schedule III of the Bengal Tenancy Act does not apply to persons holding under a lease the proprietor's private lands. [p. 108, col. 2.]

A Court is required to have regard to custom in determining whether a person is a raiyat or not. No custom is more certain than that a tenant in zirat is not a raiyat. [p. 108, col. 2]

The headings prefixed to sections or sets of sections may be used for the purpose of interpreting the meaning, scope and intention of Statutes. [p. 105, col. 2.]

JUDGMENT.

CHAMIER, C. J.—This appeal arises out of a suit brought by the respondent Jagannath Das for possession of 6 bighas 8 cottahs 18 dhurs of land, which were held by the appellant and another under a lease for a term of nine years which expired on May 31st, 1912. It was found by the Court of first appeal and it is now admitted that the land in question is zirat, that is, the proprietor's private land within the meaning of Chapter XI of the Bengal Tenancy Act. The suit was brought on December 5th, 1912, a little more than six months after the expiration of the term of the lease. The only question which we have to decide in this appeal is whether the suit is barred by limitation. The Munsif and Subordinate Judge held that the suit had been brought within time and their view was accepted by a learned Judge of this Court. Article 1 (a) of Schedule III to the Bengal Tenancy Act provides that a suit to eject a non-occupancy raiyat on the ground of the expiration of the term of his lease shall be brought within six months from the expiration of the term. The appellant contends that the suit is governed by this provision and is, therefore, barred by limitation. The plaintiff-respondent contends that the appellant was not a non-occupancy raiyat at all within the meaning of the Bengal Tenancy Act and secondly, that even if he was a non-occupancy raiyat, Article 1 (a) of Schedule III does not apply to the present case.

I am unable to hold that the appellant was not a non-occupancy raiyat of the land in question. He was admittedly a tenant within the meaning of section 3, sub-section (3), of the Bengal Tenancy Act. Section 4 of the Act provides that there shall be for the purposes of the Act certain classes of tenants, namely, tenure-holders, raiyats and under-raiyats and the following classes of raiyats, namely, raiyats holding at fixed rates, occupancy raiyats and non-occupancy raiyats. The appellant was certainly not a raiyat holding at a fixed rate or an occupancy raiyat. Prima facie he was a non-occupancy raiyat. I am aware that it has been held in some cases that section 4 of the Bengal Tenancy Act is not exhaustive, but it appears to me that there can be no doubt that the appellant was a non-occupancy raiyat. There are provisions in the Bengal Tenancy Act outside Chapter VI which refer to "non-occupancy raiyats" and which appear to apply to raiyats of zirat land. Chapter VI deals exclusively with non-occupancy raiyats The framers of the Act evidently intended that Chapter VI should be applied to raiyats holding zirat land, but as it was part of the policy of the Act to enable a landlord to prevent raiyats from acquiring rights against him in his zirat land, they provided by section 116 of the Act that nothing in Chapter VI shall apply to a proprietor's private land known in Bengal as khamar, nij, and nijjot and in Bihar as zirat, nij, sir, or kamat, where any such land is held under a lease for a term of years or under a lease from year to year. Previous to 1907 there was in Chapter VI of the Act a section, 45, which provided that notice should be served upon a non-occupancy raiyat whom the landlord wished to eject and that a suit for ejectment should be instituted within six months after the expiry of the term for which the non-occupancy tenant held the land. Section 116 of the Act excluded the operation of section 45 in the case of a proprietor's private land, with the result that the period of limitation prescribed by section 45 did not apply to a suit like the one now before us. By Bengal Act I of 1907 section 45 was repealed and the second part of it, that is to say, the part relating to limitation, was replaced by Article 1 (a) of Schedule III. The result of the amendment appears to be that the operation of Article 1 (a) of Schedule III is not excluded by section 116 in the case of zirat land. This view was taken by Mookerjee and Beachcroft, JJ., in Ganpat Mahton v. Rishal Singh. (1) and by Newbould, J., in Dwarkanath Chowdhury v. Tufazir Rahman Sarkar (2). In the last mentioned case Newbould, J., said: "By taking the provisions of section 45 out of Chapter VI and putting them into the Schedule, the Legislature, whether intentionally or not, has compelled the landlord to bring a suit for ejectment of a tenant of khas khamar land on the termination of his lease within six months." The decision of Newbould, J., was reversed on appeal under the Letters Patent by Woodroffe and Chaudhuri, JJ. The judgment of the Court was delivered by Woodroffe, J., who said: "Reliance also is placed on the amendment of the heading under Chapter XI of the Bengal Tenancy Act. In that heading there has been inserted 'non-accrual of occupancy and non-occupancy rights.' I think we may look at this heading for the purpose of interpreting the sections mentioned above, and on this it is contended on behalf of the appellants that the defendants holding khamar lands are not included in the term 'non-occupancy raiyat' within the Schedule. I think that this argument has force and I hold that the suit is accordingly not barred."

I take it that the learned Judge intended to hold that a raiyat of a proprietor's private land could not be a non-occupancy raiyat within the meaning of Chapter VI or Schedule III of the Act. I am unable to accept this view, for section 116 of the Act prevents the application of Chapter VI to raiyats of a proprietor's private land in two cases only, namely, where such land is held under a lease for a term of years and where it is held under a lease from year to year. In my opinion it is reasonably clear that except in those two cases Chapter VI of the Act was intended to apply to raiyats of a proprietor's private land, and that such raiyats may be non-occupancy raiyats within the meaning of the Act.

It was contended, however, that even if a raiyat of a proprietor's private land is a non-occupancy raiyat, Article 1 (a) does not apply to such a suit as the one now before us. It was urged that the only provision in the Act entitling a landlord to eject a non-occupancy raiyat on the ground of the expiration of the term of his lease is contained in section 44 of the Act, that Article 1 (a) applies only to a suit brought under section 44 (c) and that as the present suit cannot have been brought under section 44 (c), Article 1 (a) does not apply at all. It must be conceded that the present suit was not brought under section 44 (c) of the Act, but no provision of this kind was required to enable a landlord to bring a suit to eject his tenant on the expiration of the term for which the tenant held his land. Those provisions of the Act which apply to non-occupancy tenants appear to apply to raiyats holding a proprietor's private land, except where the application of those provisions is excluded by the Act, as for instance by section 116. The Bengal Tenancy Act applies to a proprietor's private land, and it appears to me that a suit by a landlord to eject a non-occupancy raiyat of a proprietor's private land on the ground of the expiration of the term of his lease is governed by Article 1 (a) of Schedule III of the Bengal Tenancy Act. In this connection I would refer to Article 3 of Schedule III, which provides a special period of limitation for a suit to recover possession of land claimed by the plaintiff as a raiyat or under-raiyat. There is no special provisions in the Act expressly authorising a raiyat, who has been wrongly ejected by his landlord, to bring a suit to recover possession of the land. But no such provision was required to enable a tenant to bring a suit to recover possession. It has never been suggested that Article 3 of Schedule III is a dead letter merely because there is no express provision in the Act authorising a tenant to sue for recovery of possession of land from which he has been wrongly ejected by his landlord.

(1) 33 Ind. Cas. 978; 20 C. W. N. 14.
(2) 39 Ind. Cas. 64; 20 C. W. N. 1097; 44 C. 267.

Similarly I am unable to hold that Article 1 (a) does not apply to the present suit merely because there is no express provision in the Act authorising a landlord to sue to eject a non-occupancy raiyat of his private land on the expiration of the term of a lease. I think it is doubtful whether the Legislature intended by the amendments made in 1907 to compel a landlord to sue for ejectment of a tenant of his private land within six months of the termination of the lease held by the tenant, and it may be that the result of holding that a raiyat of zirat land is or may be a non occupancy raiyat will be that landlords will be placed in a less favourable position than the framers of the Act intended, but we must take the Act as we find it; and on a consideration of the Act as it now stands, it appears to me that the only possible conclusion is that Article 1 (a) of Schedule III applies to such a suit as the one now before us. I would, therefore, allow this appeal, set aside the decisions of the Courts below, and dismiss the suit with costs in all Courts.

CHAPMAN, J.– Prior to the Rent Act of 1859 raiyats were divided into two classes, khudkasht and paikasht, corresponding roughly to the present classes of occupancy and non-occupancy raiyats. Neither class included tenants of the zemindar's zirat or demesne [Phillips' Land Tenures, page 239, and Thakooranee Dossee v. Bisheshur Mookerjee (3)]. The Act of 1859 did not abolish the names khudkasht and paikasht [see Bengal Act VIII of 1865]. The Act of 1859, defined for the first time the manner in which a right of occupancy could be acquired and the vernacular terms gradually fell into disuse. The Bengal Tenancy Act of 1885 with which we are now concerned provided the new term "non-occupancy raiyat" as a convenient symbol for the remainder of the raiyats for whom it was desired for the first time then to create rights.

In my opinion a tenant in zirat is prima facie not a raiyat, (1) because he has never been so regarded; and (2) because he neither has rights of occupancy nor has been vested with the new non-occupancy rights.

The classification of tenants in section 4 of the Bengal Tenancy Act is "for the purpose of the Act." The purpose referred to is apparent from the headings of Chapters III to VII which immediately follow. The purpose for which the classification is made is to introduce the definition of the rights of the various classes of tenants, and that purpose is exhausted when the definition of these rights is completed in Chapters III to VII. Chapter XI is headed "Non-accrual of occupancy and non-occupancy rights", and deals therefore with the circumstances in which such rights shall not accrue A consideration of the provisions of the Act would make it clear that no purpose of the Act is served by placing a temporary cultivator who is not to have the rights of a non-occupancy raiyat under any of the classes mentioned in section 4. If, however, it is thought desirable to classify tenants in zirat, they may be called tenure-holders as was done by the Calcutta High Court in Second Appeal No 2626 of 1904 in the case of a cultivator holding fakirana land and in Bandhu Acharja v. Nathni Bahar Singh (4) in the case of a cultivating tankidar.

For "the purpose" of saying that non-occupancy rights shall not accrue in the case of a tenancy in zirat, section 116 merely says that Chapter VI shall not apply and some difficulty no doubt arises from the fact that there are one or two scattered provisions on the subject of non-occupancy raiyats which are not in Chapter VI. I do now, however, attach importance to this in the present connection, having regard to the heading of Chapter XI, "non-accrual of non-occupancy rights", which indicates "the purpose" of the Chapter. The heading of Chapter VI and the first section, section 41, indicates that Chapter VI was designed to be exhaustive on the subject of non-occupancy raiyats. I hold by reference to the heading of Chapter XI that, by saying in section 116 that Chapter VI does not apply, it was meant that the tenant should not be regarded as a non-occupancy raiyat. A heading may be used with considerable freedom to extend the meaning of a section which follows it.

The significance of the words "non-accrual of non occupancy rights" is enhanced when it is remembered that these words were added to the heading in Chapter XI at the time that Article 1 (a) was added to the Schedule. The object of the simultaneous change in the heading must have been to make it clear that the reference to non-occupancy raiyats in Article 1 (a) was not meant to include the tenants dealt with in Chapter XI.

(3) B. L. R. Sup. Vol. 202 at p. 260; 3 W. R. Act X Rulings 29.

(4) 7 C. L. J. 460.

It should be noted in this connection that the classification in sections 4 and 5 was not intended to be scientific or precise.

For instance, the classification does not include the case of a co-sharer holding land subject to payment to his co-proprietor under section 22. There are several other kinds of tenants not easily placed under any of the classes. If the classification be treated as a series of precise definitions, the Act will be misinterpreted. As an example I may refer to the case of Bhut Nath Naskar v. Surendra Nath Dutt [Bhutnath Naskar v. Monmotho Nath Mitra] (5), in which by the application of precision the result was obtained by one of the Judges that a raiyati at fixed rates is not a protected interest, a conclusion which I am entirely unable to accept. It is obvious that in order to render the Act intelligible sections 4 and 5 must be applied with a reasonable amount of elasticity and this is apparent from the use of the word "primarily" and the reference to custom in section 5.

To apply Article 1 (a) to the tenants referred to in section 116 would clearly tend to defeat the obvious purpose of Chapter XI, which is to afford some substantial protection to the proprietors of zirat.

That this purpose will be defeated will be evident if the result of applying Article 1 (a) to section 116 is considered. Under the law as it stood before the amendment of 1907 which introduced Article 1 (a), the main protection conferred by section 115 in respect of zirat was that on the expiry of an oral or written lease the tenant in zirat could ipso facto be ejected at any time up to twelve years after the expiry of the lease. If the effect of Article 1 (a) is to reduce the limitation from twelve years to six months, there remains little, if any, special protection for the proprietor of zirat. The only distinctions remaining between a tenant in zirat and a tenant in land not zirat will be the following:—(1) To enable the proprietor of zirat to eject on the expiry of a lease—the lease need not be written or registered; (2) an agreement to enhance will not require registration; but, on the other hand, (3) a tenant in zirat will not be liable to ejectment for failure to pay rent, unless this remedy is provided for in his lease; and (4) will not be liable to ejectment for refusal to agree to enhancement. I cannot believe that the elaborate provisions of Chapter XI would have been framed if the only privilege it was intended to confer on the proprietor of zirat was the use of unregistered documents.

The view I have taken is also consonant with what has always been held in regard to zirat [Regulation VIII of 1793]. True zirat belongs to the zemindar [section 6, Act X of 1859] as distinguished from the rest of his estate, his rights in which are subject to the rights of his raiyats [see Regulation VII of 1799, section 15, and Thakooranae Dossee v. Bisheshur Mookherjee (3)]. Zirat land is not raiyati land although the zemindar may lose his rights in it by treating it as if it was raiyati. But if he lets it for a term or from year to year, it remains his own and the tenant of it is not a raiyat. The custom under which a tenant of zirat is not a raiyat is a custom recognised in the Act of 1859. It was again recognised in the Act of 1885 by the expedient of placing all raiyati rights in two Chapters and then saying that those Chapters shall not apply to zirat. It was recognised in the statement of the objects and reasons of the Act of 1885 and in the account of that Act given in the Bengal Administration Report, 1892-93 [see page 93]. It is recognised in Mr. Finucane's Tenancy Act published in 1904. The custom is recognised also by a series of decisions both of the Sadar Diwani Adalat and of the High Court, a series which includes The Great Rent Case of 1865 [Thakooranae Dossee v. Bisheshur Mookerjee (3)] and continues till the decision of the present question by Woodroffe and Chaudhuri, JJ., in 1916 [Dwarka- nath Chowdhury v. Tafazar Rahaman Sarkar (2).] The series of precedents is unbroken save for the obiter dictum of Mookerjee, J., in 1914 [Ganpat Mahton v. Rishal Singh (1)], a dictum which it is impossible to reconcile with his considered judgment in Jonab Ali v. Rakibuddin Mallik (6) in 1905, where he held that a tenant in zirat is neither an occupancy nor a non-occupancy raiyat.

(5) 2 Ind. Cas. 675; 13 C. W. N. 1025; 11 C. L. J 98.

Again, it is impossible to apply Article 1 (a) as it stands to tenants in zirat in a satisfactory manner. There is no difficulty in applying the Article to a non occupancy raiyat who enjoys the rights provided for in Chapter VI. Six months after the expiry of his registered lease, though he cannot be ejected upon the ground of the expiry of the lease, he can be ejected upon other grounds provided for in section 44, for instance, upon the ground that he has failed to pay arrears of rent. The application of Article 1 (a) in the case of a tenant of zirat would be by no means so simple. The following views are possible as to his status after the expiry of six months from the end of his lease if Article 1 (a) applies to him:—

First, there is the view that Chapter VI then becomes applicable to him. I am unable to concur with this view [Bhugwan Bhagut v. Jug Mohun Roy (7)]. There is in the alternative the view that he then becomes entirely immune from ejectment, a view which would defeat the express provision in section 116 that he shall not have a right of occupancy. There is another possible view that he is liable to ejectment upon any grounds provided for in his lease, and there is a fourth possible view that he is a tenant from year to year upon the terms of his lease and that the right to eject continues to recur at the end of every year, and to expire at the end of six months from the end of every year. I am confident that if the Legislature had intended Article 1 (a) to apply to a tenant in zirat they would not have left the matter in this nebulous condition.

I would, therefore, hold that Article 1 (a) does not apply to the present case and dismiss the appeal.

(6) 1 C. L. J. 303; 9 C. W. N. 571.
(7) 20 W. R. 308.

This judgment is merely an amplification of the judgment of Woodroffe, J., in Dwarkanath Chowdhury v. Tafazar Rahaman Sarkar (2) with which Chaudhuri, J., concurred.

MULLICK, J.—I agree with the view taken by the learned Chief Justice.

I think the first point for consideration is whether the Bengal Tenancy Act applies at all to the proprietor's private lands. I am quite satisfied that the answer to this is in the affirmative. Under the Permanent Settlement Regulation [Regulation VIII, 1793, sections 37 and 39] no land was recognized as a proprietor's private land which was not such on the 12th August 1765, the date of the assumption of the diwani, and there is no law recognising the creation of such lands since that date. Although the distinction between these lands and the raiyati lands of the country was at the time of the settlement a well-established one and, although there may be some doubt whether these lands as well as chakran lands [section 41 of the Regulation] were taken into account for assessing the revenue of the zemindari, yet it is quite clear that both these classes of land were annexed to the malguzari lands and were made responsible for the revenue [see sections 37 to 41]. What reason is there for holding that it is not open to a zemindar to create raiyati interest in his private lands? There is nothing in Act VIII of 1885 to support such a view, on the contrary section 116 of the Act clearly contemplates the acquisition of occupancy rights under certain circumstances and, if of occupancy rights, then why not of non-occupancy rights also?

It is urged that section 4 of the Bengal Tenancy Act is not exhaustive and that a raiyat of zirat lands belongs to a class by himself, who is not covered by the classification into raiyats at fixed rates, occupancy-raiyats and non-occupancy-raiyats. Now, although there are authorities which say that the definition of a raiyat is not exhaustive, there is to my knowledge no authority which says that the classification is not exhaustive. All that the authorities say is that section 4 rather describes than defines a raiyat and that it is not exhaustive only to the extent that a cultivator who may prima facie answer the qualifications of a raiyat may really turn out to be a tenure-holder. The scheme of the Act is to determine the relations between cultivator and landlord in every inch of agricultural land, and for that purpose it divides the former into classes set out in section 4 and declines to recognise any rights or liabilities in relation to the landlord except those enjoyed by or imposed upon those classes. For this reason the Act omits settled raiyats from the classification although by section 20 it defines such a raiyat. The Act intends that as a settled raiyat must be either an occupancy or non-occupancy-raiyat, or a raiyat at fixed rates, it is unnecessary to make a separate class for him. A cultivator may be a settled raiyat on zirat lands, but as such he has no rights.

Reliance has been placed upon Sheo Nandon Roy v. Ajodh Roy (8) and on Jonab Ali v. Rakibuddin Mallik (6) for the purpose of showing that there can be no occupancy or non-occupancy-raiyats in zirat or chakran lands. Now although at page 542 of the first of these cases there is an observation to the effect that occupancy or non-occupancy rights cannot be acquired in zirat lands, that expression of opinion was clearly obiter and not necessary to the decision of the case. Indeed as an absolute proposition of law it is incorrect. The point which their Lordships were concerned to decide was that no tenant brought upon the land by a thikadar holding under the proprietor under a lease for a term of years can acquire rights of occupancy, for the reason that the thikadar could not create any interest greater than his own; and in coming to this conclusion their Lordships declined to extend the doctrine of Binad Lal Pakrashi v. Kalu Pramanik (9) to zirat lands and held that a tenant inducted by such a thikadar could not claim raiyati rights in zirat lands, the primary character of which was that the proprietor should be in khas possession. In the other case too a like view was expressed by Harington, Bodilly and Mookerjee, J.J., in regard to chowkidari chakran lands. It is obvious that the learned Judges never intended to lay down the rule that non-occupancy rights cannot be acquired in zirat lands; for in Ganpat Mahton v. Rishal Singh (1) one of these same learned Judges, namely, Mookerjee, J., expressed the clear opinion that a non-occupancy raiyati interest could be acquired in zirat lands and was subject to the operation of Article 1 (a) of Schedule III of the Bengal Tenancy Act.

There is, therefore, in my opinion no ground for the contention that the nature of the land will bar the operation of section 4 of the Bengal Tenancy Act.

This view is also supported by the history of the legislation on the subject. The classification of raiyats into raiyats at fixed rates, occupancy raiyats and non-occupancy-raiyats was made for the first time by Act X of 1859, but section 6 of that Act provided that the rule that a raiyat who has cultivated land for a period of twelve years has a right of occupancy in the land so long as he pays the rent payable on account of the same does not apply to khamar, nij-jot or sir lands belonging to the proprietor when let by him on a lease for a term of years or from year to year. The Act nowhere stated that a raiyat cultivating a proprietor's private land was not a non occupancy-raiyat, and in this respect the Amending Act of 1869 [Act VIII (B. C.) of 1869] does not appear to have made any substantial alteration. Such a raiyat was apparently liable to ejectment any time within twelve years on expiry of his lease. He was also liable to have his rent enhanced upon service of notice. So in Janoo Mundur v. Brijo Singh (10) it was held that a landlord, seeking to obtain an enhanced rate of rent on account of nij-jot land held by a tenant without a right of occupancy had no right to obtain a judicial enhancement upon the footing of a notice under Act VIII (B. C.) of 1869. His right according to section 8 was to make his own terms with his tenant, or to turn him out of occupation.

Considerable diversity of opinion, however, began to arise on the point whether the raiyat was entitled to ask for an adjudication of fair and equitable rent, and one of the purposes of enacting Act VIII of 1885 was to put the status of non-occupancy-raiyats on a more satisfactory basis in this and other matters. To this end the two principal changes introduced were (1) that a non-occupancy raiyat could be ejected at the will of his landlord only if he was admitted into occupation under a registered lease and then only after service of six months' notice to quit, and upon suit being brought within six months after the expiration of the lease and (2) that a non-occupancy raiyat who objected to pay an enhanced rent could have his rent fixed by the Court; if he refused to pay he could be ejected.

(8) 26 C. 546; 3 C. W. N. 336; 13 Ind. Dec. (N.S.) 950.

(9) 20 C. 708 (F. B.); 10 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 477.

(10) 22 W. R. 548.

The position of raiyats in zirat lands was not materially altered, for we find that the provisions of the old Act were practically reproduced in section 116, which was enacted in the following terms:—

"Nothing in Chapter V shall confer a right of occupancy in, and nothing in Chapter VI shall apply to, a proprietor's private lands known in Bengal as khamar, nij or nij-jot and in Bihar as zirat, nij-sir, or kamat where any such land is held under a lease for a term of years or under a lease from year to year."

And it is to be observed that the beneficial provisions of Chapter VI, which ameliorated the position of non-occupancy raiyats, were excluded from operating in zirat lands held under a lease for a term of years or from year to year.

In 1907 the section was amended and the heading "record of proprietor's private lands" was changed into "non-accrual of occupancy and non-occupancy rights and record of proprietor's private lands." In the body of the section the area saved from the operation of Chapters V and VI was widened by the inclusion of lands acquired under the Land Acquisition Act, and lands belonging to the Government within a Cantonment. At the same time section 45, which was one of the sections in Chapter VI, was wholly repealed. That section provided for the service of notice and six months' limitation. The result of its repeal was that in suits for ejectment of non-occupancy raiyats on expiry of their leases service of notice was done away with on the ground that it was unnecessary and difficult to prove and the provision as to limitation was put into Schedule III of Article 1 (a).

The question is, what is the effect of the repeal on the words "nothing in Chapter VI shall apply to a proprietor's private lands"?

In order to construe the words it is certainly not necessary to read them as meaning no raiyats shall acquire non-occupancy rights in proprietors' private lands held for a term of years. The amendment of the heading does to some extent assist the contention of the respondent before us, but in the absence of any authority I do not think the words of the heading should be allowed to affect the construction of the section.

In my opinion the body of the section means that the rights and liabilities of non-occupancy-raiyats in the matter of paying the rent agreed between them and their landlord (section 42), enhancement by registered agreement (section 43), ejectment (section 44), conditions of ejectment on the ground of refusal to agree to enhancement (section 46) shall not be enforced in the case of raiyats of private lands. But there are other rights and liabilities enjoyed by and imposed upon non-occupancy raiyats by other parts of the Act and there is nothing in section 116 which exclud-s the operation of those parts of the Act from the holdings of non-occupancy raiyats in zirat lands held on a lease for a term of years or from year to year. It is quite clear that section 116 itself contemplates that in zirat lands both occupancy and non-occupancy rights can be acquired under certain circumstances, and if it was the intention of the framers of the Act that in zirat lands held for a term of years or from year to year the cultivator should not acquire the status of non-occupancy raiyats they have signally failed to carry out that intention. If again their intention was to recognize the non-occupancy status of such a cultivator and to leave him in the same position as that in which he was before 1885 then, too, has the intention failed. Regarded from whatever point of view the result can scarcely be called satisfactory, and this class of cultivator, while excluded from the operation of Chapter VI, remains within the purview of the remainder of the Act and therefore also of Article 1 (a) of Schedule III. The position appears to be this. Now, as before 1885, the landlord can make successive enhancements but the tenant can no longer take advantage of the protection offered by section 13 of Act X of 1859 or section 14 of Act VIII (B. C.) of 1869: on the tenant's failure to pay an arrear of rent he can only be ejected after decree now, though it was otherwise before 1885, and a suit for the ejectment of the tenant on expiry of his lease must now be brought within six months and not twelve years as before.

The learned Counsel for the respondent has somewhat ingeniously contended that Article 1 (a) is a necessary and inseparable part of section 44, and if that section is excluded the Article must be also excluded. In my opinion this contention is not well-founded. Article 1 (a) is applicable to every suit in which it is sought to eject a non-occupancy raiyat. It is not limited to suits under section 44 which are suits brought under the provisions of the Bengal Tenancy Act. A non-occupancy raiyat whose lease has expired is liable to ejectment on the general law as one who has become a trespasser.

Finally a reference to section 180 of the Act which deals with utbandi raiyats and raiyats of biara lands does, I think, assist us in elucidating the effect in section 116 of the words "nothing in Chapter VI shall apply to a proprietor's private lands." Section 180, clause (2), runs thus:—

"Chapter VI shall not apply to raiyats holding land under the custom of utbandi in respect of land held by them under the custom."

Although the section does not in terms say that the raiyat in this case is a non-occupancy raiyat the reference to Chapter VI implies that he is such a raiyat and the framers of the section therefore considered it necessary to provide that his rent is liable to be fixed by agreement with his landlord without the protections of Chapter VI. If in respect of such a raiyat Article 1 (a) applies, and I see no reason why it should not, the Article must also apply to the case of the appellant before us. Whether the Legislature in repealing section 45 and removing the provision as to limitation to the Schedule intended to cut down the period of limitation and to apply it to a larger class of tenants it is not our province to speculate. The Schedule was introduced for the first time in 1885, before which the special provisions as to limitation were few and for the most part contained in section 30 of Act X of 1859 and section 27 of Act VIII (B. C.) of 1869. We must interpret the law as we find it, and if the result of the amendment to Act VIII of 1885 is to place the landlord in a worse position than was intended, then the only remedy is to amend the law. I am of opinion, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed.

ROE, J.—Any one having no previous knowledge of the subject would say upon reading section 4 that for the purposes of the Bengal Tenancy Act there are three classes of raiyats: (a) raiyats holding either at a rent fixed in perpetuity or at a rate of rent fixed in perpetuity; (b) raiyats having a right of occupancy in the land held by them; (c) raiyats not having such a right of occupancy, and would note that these three classes are for the saving of ink and paper called thereafter raiyats holding at fixed rates, occupancy raiyats, and non-occupancy raiyats. On reading section 5 he would note that any one who (i) cultivates with his own ploughs, etc., and (ii) holds directly under a proprietor is a raiyat. He would further note on reading Chapter VI that non-occupancy raiyats have certain privileges, and on coming to Chapter XI would note that those privileges do not prevail over a definite contract made for the cultivation of proprietors' private lands for a term of years, or a definite contract renewed from year to year. If asked what might be the position of a raiyat holding under such a definite contract, he would reply that he was a non-occupancy raiyat not protected by Chapter VI. On reading Schedule III it would be clear to him that for a suit to evict a non-occupancy raiyat who had, by holding over without permission, become a trespasser the limitation was six months from the date of the trespass. O his attention being drawn to the fact that section 45 had been repealed and Schedule III, clause 1 (a), substituted for it, he would say that this had been deliberately done with the purpose of removing the limitation clause from Chapter VI.

But for the high reputation of those learned Judges who have taken an opposite view I should have felt that there was no more to be said. Their view is, I venture to think, born of a misconception of the Legislature's jealousy of encroachment upon private lands. More than twenty-five years' experience of the working of section 120 in the Settlement, Sub-Divisional and Civil Courts has taught me that when once a proprietor has let out what he claims to be private lands it is almost impossible for him to prove that they are private lands.

The old law (section 6, Act X of 1859) gave a loophole to the proprietor to deny occupancy rights to raiyats holding over after the expiry of a lease for a term of years. It ran :—

"But this rule does not apply to sir land let on lease for a term or year by year."

To prevent the argument that a hold-over was equivalent to a letting year by year the Act of 1885 deliberately re-cast the phrase and section 116 runs :—

"When any such land is held under a lease for a term of years or under a lease from year to year."

Section 8 of Act X of 1859 ran :—

"Raiyats not having rights of occupancy are entitled to pattahs only at such rates as may be agreed on between them and the persons to whom the rent is payable."

That was the position of non-occupancy raiyats until the Act of 1885 gave to all, save those inducted under a definite contract to cultivation of private lands, the protection of Chapter VI. Even for those cultivating private lands section 8 was further cut down and a proviso added that not only the rates but also the term must be a matter of agreement.

It cannot be suggested that in these amendments of the law there was any desire to keep sacred lands claimed as zirat, nij, sir, or kamat. On the contrary, it was deliberatly made as difficult as possible to prove that the lands were zirat, and deliberately enacted that a tenant taking lands proved to be zirat should have a clear understanding with the proprietor of the term for which he would be permitted to cultivate them. Believing this to have been the temper of the Legislative Council in 1885 I can see no reason for holding that the Council in 1907 would, if it had intended to nullify in favour of the proprietor the taking of the limitation clause out of Chapter VI into a Schedule, have been content to make this intention apparent by such a clumsy expedient as the changing of the heading of Chapter VI. Anyone not on the look-out for veiled intentions would imagine that the change was merely an amplification made because the old heading referred only to sections 117—120. The new heading refers also to section 116, and is now complete.

It is only when words are of doubtful meaning that the Courts should look to probable intention. Granting that the arguments of Woodroffe, J., give reason to believe that the Act is open to an interpretation different to that apparent on its surface, I am of opinion that the most probable intention in placing the limitation clause in the Schedule was to limit the exercise of the proprietor's right to evict a raiyat cultivating private lands to six months. It is a fallacy to suppose that there is a hardship in reducing the proprietor's limitation from twelve years to six months. The moment the proprietor accepts rent without taking a new agreement, the raiyat is holding over without a lease and is protected by Chapter VI. No proprietor could be so foolish as to leave his private lands in the possession of a stranger for twelve years without accepting rent. Even the most exorbitant decree for mesne profits for three years would not balance the loss of twelve years' rent. No sane proprietor would fail to sue within three years In the interest of the raiyat the proprietor should not be allowed to tempt him to continue cultivation without a title and then not only take from him by a claim for mesne profits the whole produce of his labour, but also ruin him by the costs of the inevitable litigation. If a proprietor has any love for his private lands he should be able to make up his mind in six months as to what he will do with them. If he is uncertain of his love for them it is open to him to enter into a new agreement with regard to them. If he cares so little about them that he cannot be troubled to make definite arrangements for their cultivation he deserves that they cease to be his private lands.

In considering the intention of the Legislature we have to consider not the intention of the Select Committee but those of the Council. In the Bill of 1907, as laid before the Council, there was a clause taking the procedure for commutation of rent out of Chapter V into Chapter VIII. The intention was clearly said in the statement of objects and reasons to be:—"Under section 40 only occupancy-raiyats are allowed to apply for commutation. It seems reasonable that the same privilege should be conferred on all classes of raiyats."

This proposal was vetoed by the Council. Surely the Council's attention having been drawn to the effect of the proposal to repeal section 40, we must presume that it was also drawn to the effect of repealing section 45.

I am of opinion that the amendment made by the Act of 1907 indicates a general intention to prevent suits for mesne profits against raiyats not having a right of occupancy holding over after the expiry of the term of their agreement; and, having regard to the conditions of agriculture in this Province, feel strongly that this intention has been well expressed by the limitation of a suit in ejectment to a period of six months from the expiry of the agreement. I can find nothing in the Act to indicate that proprietors' private lands are to be protected from this general intention.

I would decree this appeal, and dismiss the plaintiff's suit with costs in all Courts.

JWALA PRASAD, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit in ejectment. The Courts below have decreed the plaintiff's suit, holding that the lands were the kamat or zirat lands of the plaintiff-landlord and were settled with the defendants for a term of nine years under a registered kabuliyat dated 6th May 1903, and that the defendants have no right to remain in possession of the lands after the expiry of the term of the lease.

The term of the lease expired on 31st May 1912. The suit was instituted on the 5th December 1912, that is, more than six months by four days after the expiry of the term of the lease.

The Courts below have held that six month's limitation prescribed by Article 1 (a) of Schedule III of the Bengal Tenancy Act does not apply to the case, as the lands held by the defendants are the proprietors' private lands described as kamat or zirat in section 120 of the Act.

On appeal to this Court by defendant No. 1 Mr. Justice Atkinson* has confirmed the view of the Courts below, holding that the "defendant No. 1 in point of law could not acquire in the zirat lands of the plaintiff the non occupancy right."

The defendants have preferred a further appeal to this Court under the Letters Patent and repeat their contention that the suit is barred by Article 1 (a) of Schedule III.

The question raised is of the utmost importance and is by no means free from doubt or difficulty.

Article 1 (a) of Schedule III requires that a suit "to eject a non-occupancy raiyat on the ground of the expiration of the term of his lease" should be brought within six months from the expiration of the term. This Article was for the first time introduced in the Schedule by the Bengal Tenancy Amendment Act [I (B. C.) of 1907] and has taken the place of section 45 of the Act, repealed by the Amending Act. Section 45 of the Act ran as follows:—

"A suit for ejectment on the ground of the expiration of the term of a lease shall not be instituted against a non-occupancy raiyat unless notice to quit has been served on the raiyat not less than six months before the expiration of the term and shall not be instituted after six months from the expiration of the term."

The provisions in section 45 were two-fold—(1) that a notice shall have been served not less than six months before the expiration of the term, and (2) that the suit for ejectment should be brought within six months from the expiration of the term.

The Amending Act repealed the provision regarding the notice to quit but retained the provision regarding the limitation for a suit for ejectment of non-occupancy raiyats on the ground of the expiration of the term of the lease. By the amendment in 1907 section 45 was reduced to a simple clause providing limitation for a suit for ejectment and was, therefore, rightly transferred to and included in Schedule III as Article 1 (a) of the Act, read with section 184 of the Act, which deals specially with limitation for suits.

Section 45 occurred prior to its repeal in 1907 in Chapter VI headed "Non-occupancy raiyats." Section 116 excludes the application of Chapter VI to the proprietor's private lands if any such land is held under a lease for a term of years or under a lease from year to year. So there was no question before 1907 that the limitation of six months then provided by section 45 did not apply to a suit for recovery of possession of zirat lands held under a lease for a term of years.

The question is whether the aforesaid clause 1 (a) in Schedule III would apply to kamat or zirat lands held under a lease and the period of twelve years' limitation, which prior to 1907 applied to a suit for recovery of possession of zirat land, would now be curtailed to six months applicable to suits for ejectment of non occupancy raiyats.

There is a conflict in the decisions of the Calcutta High Court passed since the aforesaid Amendment of 1907 [vide Ganpat Mahton v. Rishal Singh (1), Mookerjee and Beachcroft, JJ., Dwarkanath Chowdhury v. Tafazar Rahaman Sarkar (2), Woodroffe and Choudhuri, JJ.]

Woodroffe, J., who delivered the judgment in the last case referred to the insertion in 1907 of the words "Non-accrual of occupancy and non occupancy rights" in the heading of Chapter XI as one of the grounds for the purpose of holding that no rights of occupancy or non-occupancy can accrue in kamat or zirat lands when let out for a term of years.

Formerly the heading of Chapter XI was "Record of proprietors' private lands"—The words "non-accrual of occupancy and non-occupancy rights" were added in the heading at the same time that the limitation clause in section 45 was transferred to Schedule III.

It has been said that the heading of a Chapter cannot control an enactment in a Statute. The authorities quoted in Maxwell's Interpretation of Statutes [82 (1912)] will show that the headings prefixed to sections or sets of sections have been frequently used for the purpose of interpreting the meaning, scope and intention of Statutes.

Lord Coke (1 Inst. 79) laid down the well-known canon that the recital or preamble of an Act of Parliament is a key for opening the meaning and intent of the Act. This canon has been applied in Rex v. Bigg (11), Hughes v. Chester and Holyhead Ry. Co. (12), Rayson v. South London Tramways Company (13), West v. Gwynne (14) and Union Steamship of New Zealand v. Melbourne Harbour Commissioners (15).

Baron Channell in Eastern Counties etc., Companies v. Marriage (16) observed as follows:—

"As might have been expected, the enactments contained in the Statute embrace various objects or purposes. In different parts of the Act there are to be found classes of enactments applicable to some special object.

"Such enactments are in many instances preceded by a heading, special no doubt in one sense, as addressed to the object or purpose, but, where not otherwise provided for, general in its application to enactments passed to accomplish the object.

"These...headings are not to be treated as if they were marginal notes, or were introduced into the Act merely for the purpose of classifying the enactments. They constitute an important part of the Act itself.

"They may be read, I think, not only as explaining the sections which immediately follow them, as a preamble to a Statute may be looked to, to explain these enactments, but as affording, as it appears to me, a better key to the constructions of the sections which follow than might be afforded by a mere preamble."

In the present case where there is an intentional alteration of the heading it is impossible to ignore it for the purpose of interpreting the meaning, intention and scope of the Legislature in inserting Article 1 (a) to Schedule III and in adding at the same time the heading to Chapter XI of the Act. If there was any purpose in the alteration in the heading, it was absolutely to bar the accrual of occupancy or non-occupancy rights in the zirat or khudkasht lands, provided such lands are let out by the proprietor under a lease for a term of years or under a lease from year to year.

The alteration in the heading does not appear to have been considered in the case of Ganpat Mahton v. Rishal Singh (1) referred to above. To my mind the heading was intended to safeguard against possible misapprehension in the application of Article 1 (a) of the Schedule, which did not apply prior to the amendment, by expressly adding the words to the heading of Chapter XI, "Non-accrual of occupancy and non-occupancy rights." The intention of the Legislature can well be gathered by the express words in the heading of Chapter XI as being to exclude kamat or zirat lands from the operation of Article 1 (a) of the Schedule. I am, therefore, of opinion that the limitation of 12 years is not curtailed by Article 1 (a) prescribing six months' limitation and that the Article has no application to the present case.

The condition prescribed by section 116 of the Act, namely, the letting out of the zirat lands for a term of years is fulfilled in this case according to the findings of the Court below, so that the defendants were not non-occupancy raiyats under Article 1 (a) of the Schedule but were mere trespassers upon the land after the expiry of the term of the lease.

Even irrespective of the heading the result to my mind is the same, namely, that a person holding the proprietors' private land such as kamat or zirat would not be a non-occupancy raiyat within the meaning of Article 1 (a) of the Schedule provided the land is let under a lease for a term of years, or under a lease from year to year. In order to arrive at this result one has to look at the history of the legislation on the subject.

As pointed out by my learned brother Mr. Justice Chapman, prior to the Rent Act of 1859 there was no such classification of raiyats as occupancy and non-occupancy and the raiyats were divided into two classes, namely, "resident cultivators" and "non-resident cultivators." The Regulations relating to the Decennial and Permanent Settlements scrupulously protected the right of landlords or zemindars with regard to the lands in their khas possession. In Act X of 1859 and in Act VIII of 1869 the manner in which a right of occupancy could be acquired was for the first time defined. Section 6 of the Act ran as follows:—

"Every raiyat who shall have cultivated or held land for a period of 12 years shall have a right of occupancy in land so cultivated or held by him whether it be held under a patta or not, so long as he pays the rent payable on account of the same: but this ruling does not apply to kamat, nij-jote, or sir land belonging to the proprietor of the estate or tenure and let by him on a lease for a term or year by year."

It was pointed out in Bhugwan Bhagut v. Jug Mohun Roy (7) "that the express purpose of the Legislature in the section was to prevent the zemindar's rights in this particular class of land from being invaded or restricted by the growth of the occupancy rights on the part of a raiyat to whom he had let it for periods equal to or exceeding twelve years." (Phear and Morris, JJ.) The same Judges in Janoo Mundur v. Brijo Singh (10) held that a landlord has a right to make his own terms with the tenants of nij-jote lands as to enhancement of the rent and that he has no right to have a judicial assessment at an enhanced rate and that he can turn out the tenant of the occupation if the tenant does not agree to the rent proposed by him. They further held that a tenant who holds over after the expiry of the lease does so on the terms on which the land was let to him.

Similar was the view taken recently by Stephen and Doss, JJ., in Syed Khalil-ur Rahman v. Rupan Mahton (17), where they held that the tenant-defendant had no defence to the landlords' action for recovery of lands after the expiration of the lease in 1896, as he was a mere trespasser on the lands which were kamat. In short, the view taken in that case appears to be that a tenant of kamat land does not acquire a right of occupancy by holding it over after the expiry of the lease.

From the above it is clear that the kamat or zirat lands of the landlord were protected under the Acts of 1859 and 1869 from the accrual of occupancy rights by tenants holding for a term. Non-occupancy rights were not dealt with or defined in those Acts. In 1885 for the first time non-occupancy rights were introduced.

Tenants under the Act of 1885 are classified under the following heads "for the purposes of the Act," namely:—(1) Tenure-holders, (2) raiyats, (3) under-raiyats; and raiyats again have been divided into three classes:—

(a) raiyats holding at fixed rates, (b) occupancy raiyats, that is to say, raiyats having a right of occupancy in the land held by them, and (c) non-occupancy raiyats, that is to say, raiyats not having such a right of occupancy.

The classification of tenants in section 4 is not exhaustive. As an instance may be mentioned the class of tenants known as 'settled raiyats' under section 20.

It was pointed out in Kuldip Singh v. Chhatur Singh Roy (18) that every occupancy raiyat is not necessarily a settled raiyat, though every settled raiyat is a raiyat of occupancy as the status of a settled raiyat cannot be transferred and can only be acquired by holding some land as a raiyat in the village for twelve years, whereas an occupancy right may be acquired by purchasing a transferable occupancy holding.

(17) 12 C. W. N. 436.
(18) 3 C. L. J. 355

Chapter III deals with tenure-holders; Chapter IV deals with raiyats at fixed rates; Chapter V with occupancy raiyats, and Chapter VI with non-occupancy raiyats. Thus the rights and incidents of each class of raiyats have been dealt with in a separate Chapter, those of non-occupancy in Chapter VI.

Section 116 of the Act is intended to exclude the proprietor's private lands from the operations of Chapters V and VI provided the proprietor has taken the precaution indicated by the concluding words of the section, i.e., when any such land is held under a lease for a term of years, or under a lease from year to year.

The words in section 116, namely, "nothing in Chapter VI shall apply to the proprietor's land" can bear one and only one interpretation, that no right of non-occupancy can arise in lands known as zirat or kamat where such land is let out by the proprietor for a term of years; for in excluding such lands from the operation of Chapter VI it was intended that the rights and incidents of non-occupancy raiyats as defined or described in Chapter VI shall not apply to such lands. There does not appear to be any other interpretation.

While introducing the 'occupancy rights' in the Act of 1885 the Legislature intended that these rights shall not accrue with respect to the proprietor's private lands in the same way as the occupancy rights did not accrue in respect of these lands prior to 1885 This protection is expressed in section 116 of the Act.

The history of land tenures in the Province clearly shows that the lands in the khas possession of the zemindars or proprietors were protected by the Legislature from any rights of occupancy and non-occupancy accruing thereon under certain conditions as set forth in section 116. The Decennial and the Permanent Settlement recognized the distinction between the proprietor's khas lands and the lands which may be said to be the raiyati stock.

Khamar lands denote proprietors' private lands as distinguished from those let out to tenants. The khamar lands have always been recognized as being in a special and exclusive sense a private property of the zemindar as distinguished from all the rest, cultivated or cultivable, which may be called raiyati land, and in respect of which the zemindor's rights were merely to receive a share of the produce or equivalent in money [Finucane and Ameer Ali, Bengal Tenancy Act, 2nd Edition, pages 533-534]. It was to protect the latter class of lands that in section 8 of Regulation I of 1793 (Permanent Settlement) it was declared as follows:—

"The Governor-General in Council will, whenever he may deem it proper, enact such regulations as he may think necessary for the protection and welfare of the dependent talukdars, raiyats, and other cultivators of the soil."

In section 39 of the Decennial Settlement Regulation [VIII of 1793] the khamar lands were understood to signify lands appropriated to the subsistence of zemindars and their families. The distinction between such lands and the malguzari or raiyati lands was recognized and the former was annexed to and assimilated with the latter for the purposes of the security of the revenue and for such security only [Jonab Ali v. Rakibuddin (6)].

The raiyati lands in the Regulation were the lands cultivated by residents of village known as khudkasht raiyats and those cultivated by the non-residents known as paikasht tenants. The enactments passed since the Permanent Settlement are all in accordance with the declaration in section 8 of Regulation I of 1793, referred to above, and were directed to the protection of the raiyats with regard to the raiyati lands as distinguished from the khamar lands [Rampini, Bengal Tenancy Act, page xii, Introduction].

The expression in section 116 has also been held to mean as barring the acquisition of non occupancy rights in proprietors' private lands. [Vide, Sheo Nandan Roy v. Ajodh Roy (8), where it was held that a person brought on the malik's zirat lands by a lease for a term of years cannot acquire any right of occupancy or non-occupancy on the said lands and that he is a trespasser only on the expiry of the lease and is liable to ejectment.

In Damodar Narayan v. Dalgliesh (19) their Lordships of the Privy Council, disagreeing with the Calcutta High Court, upheld the decree of the Court below for possession claimed by the landlord in respect of zirat lands which were leased to the defendants for a term. The Subordinate Judge had expressly held that "under section 116 the defendant is neither an occupancy or non-occupancy-raiyat in respect of the lands." This statement of the law has not been taken exception to by their Lordships of the Privy Council while dealing with and affirming his judgment. The effect of all the decisions is that the clause in section 116, "nothing in Chapter VI shall apply to the proprietor's private lands" is to bar the acquisition of non-occupancy rights in respect of zirat lands.

A Court is required to have regard to custom in determining whether a person is a raiyat or not (section 5 of the Act). No custom is more certain than that a tenant in zirat is not a raiyat. This custom has been recognized in every text book and in a multitude of enactments and decisions [vide also Sir Courtenay Ilbert's speech on the Tenancy Act].

The Bengal Tenancy Act does not purport to be a complete and exhaustive Code even in respect of the law of landlord and tenant [Kripa Sindhu Mukerjee v. Annada Sundari Debi (20).] A person holding under a lease for a term of years the zirat land is not a raiyat and will not be governed by the Bengal Tenancy Act but by general law. He does not become a non-occupancy raiyat after the expiry of the lease and is a trespasser only. Article 1 (a) of the Schedule, which applies expressly to non-occupancy raiyats, does not apply to persons holding under a lease the proprietor's private lands. Thus apart from the heading added to the section the history of the Legislation, the object and scope of the Act and the meaning and true interpretation of the actual words used in the Act lead to the conclusion that the general limitation of twelve years applicable to trespassers under the general Limitation Act will apply and that the new Article 1 (a) does not apply to the case.

It cannot be contended that the provisions barring the acquisition of non-occupancy rights cease to apply when the tenant holds over after the expiry of the term of the lease. Section 51 of the Bengal Tenancy Act clearly lays down that when a tenant holds over, the conditions under which he held the land in the last preceding agricultural year shall be presumed to continue. This is also the general principle of holding over.

The authorities on the point noticed above both under the old and the new Act clearly support the view that when the tenant has been brought on the land for a term of years under the lease, he is a trespasser on the land after the expiry of the lease and can be ejected if the suit is brought under the ordinary law applicable to the eviction of trespassers, i. e., twelve years from the expiry of the lease.

For the above reasons I hold that the suit is not barred by Article 1 (a) of Schedule III of the Act and that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal allowed.

Stamp Act (II of 1899), Sch, I, Arts. 13, 35 —Lease, agricultural—Document hypothecating moveable property—Stamp duty chargeable—Landlord and tenant—Charge on crops—Liability of person removing crops.

An agricultural lease is exempt from stamp duty under exemption (a) to Article 35, Schedule I of the Stamp Act. [p. 110, col. 1.]

A document which gives the landlord the sole right over the whole crop until the rent is paid and in which the tenants agree not to alienate or otherwise do away with the crops without his consent until such pgyment, is an instrument evidencing an agreement relating to the hypothecation of moveable property by way of security for the repayment of a future debt and as such is liable to stamp duty chargeable on a bill of exchange under Article 13 (b) of Schedule I of the Stamp Act. [p 110, col. 1.]

Where the landlord has a charge for rent on the crops, a person removing the crops with notice of the charge is liable for the difference between the amount of the rent due and the quantity of the crops not removed, and not for the whole of the crops removed, [p. 110, col 1.]

Mr. Maung Gyi, for the Appellants.

Mr. R. N. Burjorji, for Respondents Nos. 2, 3 and 4.

JUDGMENT.—The appellants sued to recover 700 baskets of paddy or its value, Rs. 875, due as rent from their tenants Maung Lu Gale and Ma Hnin Zi, and obtained a decree against them against which there was no appeal.

They joined the present respondents as defendants, because they alleged that they had removed respectively 100, 500, 50 and 50 baskets of paddy from the tenants' land knowing that appellants had a charge upon the whole crop until their rent of 700 baskets had been paid. The Court of first instance found on the evidence that the respondents had removed these quantities of paddy with notice that appellants claim a charge upon it, and granted decrees against them for these quantities of paddy or their values Rs. 125, Rs. 625, Rs. 62-8 and Rs. 62-8 respectively. These decrees were reversed upon appeal and the appellants now ask for their restoration.

The respondents have contended that they had no notice of appellants' charge on the paddy, and further that as far as 2nd respondent Po Lun is concerned, the proceeds of the paddy he took have been paid to the 1st and 3rd appellants in satisfaction of a decree of theirs against their tenants, the 1st and 2nd defendants in this suit.

As regards the first point there is no room for doubt that the 3rd appellant took his lease to the land and warned the respondents against removing the crop as he had a charge thereon for rent.

As regards the second, it appears that 1st and 3rd appellants got a decree against Lu Gale and Ma Hnin Zi in another suit, in which they had attached certain of their property before judgment, and 2nd respondent Po Lun gave a security bond for the due payment of the decree and costs in order to obtain release of the property from attachment, and he subsequently paid up the amount of the decree and costs. This no doubt gives him a right to sue Mg. Lu Gale and Ma Hnin Zi for the money he paid, but it is no defence to the present action. We come now to the main points in the case. The District Judge held that inasmuch as plaintiffs admitted that after the respondents had removed the paddy some 400 to 500 baskets still remained on the land, there could be no claim against respondents for a greater quantity of paddy than the difference between the rent due, 700 baskets, and the quantity remaining, viz., 400 to 500 baskets. In my opinion this view is correct and the respondents cannot in the aggregate be held liable for more than 200 baskets of paddy, the difference between 700 and 500 baskets. Apportioned between them according to the gross amounts they took the quantities for which each is liable are the following—

1st respondent 29 baskets;
2nd respondent 143 baskets;
3rd respondent 14 baskets;
4th respondent 14 baskets.

The Divisional Judge, however, held that under the document sued upon plaintiffs could in no case recover more than Rs. 320, and as the paddy remaining after respondents had removed what they took was admittedly worth this sum or more, plaintiffs could recover nothing from the respondents. The document sued upon is a lease for nine months at a rental of 700 baskets of paddy for that period. So far as it is a lease it is exempt from stamp duty under exemption (a) to Article 35, Schedule I, of the Stamp Act, 1899, the tenants being cultivators. The document, however, gave the appellants the sole right over the whole crop until the rent was paid, and the tenants agreed not to alienate or otherwise do away with the crops without appellants' consent until the rent was paid. It was, therefore, an instrument evidencing an agreement relating to the hypothecation of moveable property by way of security for the re-payment of a future debt, and as such was liable to the duty chargeable on a bill of exchange under Article 13 (b) of Schedule I of the Stamp Act, 1899, see Entry No. 80 in Government of India Finance Department Notification No. 3616, Exhibit C, dated the 16th July 1909 (Burma Stamp Manual, Part XIV, page 9). Now the document actually bears an 8-anna stamp and under the Article referred to above this would have been sufficient to cover a sum of Rs. 600, and under section 26 of the Stamp Act no more than that sum is claimable under it. The value of the 200 baskets of paddy for which the respondents are liable is, however, only Rs. 250, and that amount is recoverable under the document. I, therefore, reverse the decree of the Divisional Court and instead grant appellants decree as follows, with costs in all Courts, against San Dun for 29 baskets of paddy or Rs. 36-4 0; against Po Lun for 143 baskets of paddy or Rs. 178-12-0; against Yaung Zaung for 14 baskets of paddy or Rs. 17-8-0; and against Maung Ba U for 14 baskets of paddy or Rs. 17-8-0.

The respondents will get 2 gold mohurs Advocate's fee in this Court.

Appeal allowed.

A landlord who obtains a decree in ejectment against his tenant, which also directs payment of compensation to the latter under the Malabar Compensation for Tenants' Improvements Act, cannot on the decree becoming barred maintain another suit on the same cause of action. The payment of compensation which is assessed in a suit for ejectment by a decree under the Malabar Compensation for Tenants' Improvements Act, is a matter relating to execution and is intended to be dealt with as such. According to the scheme of the Act, the decree for ejectment on payment of compensation is left to be governed by the law of limitation with regard to the execution of decrees and it was not intended to interfere with the general principle that a man who sues on his cause of action and obtains a decree and allows his decree to become barred has no further remedy. [p. 112, cols. 1 & 2.]

Per Sadasiva Aiyar, J.—When a plaintiff has obtained in one suit based on some legal title a decree for the reliefs which he was entitled to as against a defendant and has allowed that decree to become barred, he cannot be allowed to bring another suit for obtaining the very same relief against the very same defendant, though on a different basis, if the latter ground of claim is founded on a right or title which existed and could have been relied on as a basis of relief when the first suit was brought. [p. 112, col. 2.]

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the District Judge, South Malabar, in Appeal Suit No. 143 of 1916, preferred against that of the Court of the District Munsif, Ponnani, in Original Suit No. 400 of 1914.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Mr. C. Madhavan Nair, for the Appellant, contended, relying on the decision of Kutti Ali v. Chindan (1), that the effect of the ejectment decree becoming barred was not to extinguish the landlord's title to the property and that he was not precluded from instituting a fresh suit in ejectment. The suit was one based on title.

Mr. M. N. Krishna Aiyar, for the Respondents, urged that the landlord had no fresh cause of action for a fresh suit and the original cause of action could not be revived, having become merged in the decree. He pointed to the analogy of redemption decree in mortgage suits and argued that the principle of law having a first suit for redemption after the redemption decree had become barred applied equally to ejectment suits. Vide the Full Bench decision in Vedapuratti v. Vallabha Valiya Raja (2). In the case of Malabar tenants there was the further fact that under the ejectment decree the tenants have a statutory right to remain on the land till compensation is paid for improvements. It was the plaintiff's duty to seek his remedy on the decree obtained by him in execution and on the extinction of the remedy by the statutory bar, his rights also were extinguished.

JUDGMENT.

WALLIS, C. J.—This case raises a question of considerable importance and interest, namely, what is the effect of a plaintiff, who obtains a decree in ejectment in Malabar directing payment of compensation, allowing that decree to become barred. The question is whether he is entitled to maintain another suit, as it is contended, upon his title, a proposition which is supported by reference to the decision in Kutti Ali v. Chindan (1). Now, the ordinary principle is that, when a man has a cause of action and brings a suit upon it, that cause of action is merged in the decree, transit in rem judicatum; and then his remedy is in execution and if he does not enforce his remedy and allows it to become barred, his rights are gone. When a lessor sues to eject a lessee, he has to prove that there was in existence a lease and a determination of that lease. That is his cause of action, and if he gets a decree and allows that decree to become barred, it seems to me that, on general principles, his remedy is gone. I do not, with great respect, quite understand what is meant in Kutti Ali v. Chindan (1) by saying that he will still be allowed to sue on title. The suit on title, I take it, is a suit to eject the defendant on the ground that he was a trespasser. Even if it could be said that the effect of a decree in ejectment was to determine the tenancy and convert the tenant into a trespasser, that would not apply to the present case where the tenant has a statutory right to continue in possession after decree until he is paid for his improvements. Further, the decision in Kutti Ali v. Chindan (1) seems difficult to reconcile with the subsequent decision of a Full Bench of five Judges in Vedapuratti v. Vallabha Valiya Raja (2), in which it was held, overruling some earlier cases, that, where a mortgagor brings a suit for redemption and allows the decree for redemption to become barred, his rights are gone and he cannot bring a subsequent suit for redemption. I do not see any reason why the same doctrine is not applicable to the case of lessor and lessee. Lastly, as regards the Malabar tenancies, I think that the provisions of sections 5 and 6 of the Malabar Compensation for Tenants' Improvements Act strongly support the view I have taken and show that it was the intention of the Legislature that these matters should be dealt with in execution. Section 5 provides that, notwithstanding the determination of the tenancy, the tenant is entitled to remain in possession until ejectment in execution of a decree or order of Court. Section 6 deals with the form of the decree in ejectment and the determination of compensation, and the decree is to direct that "on payment by the plaintiff into Court of the amount so found due and also the mortgage money (if any), the defendant shall put the plaintiff into possession of the land with the improvements thereon," which is very like a decree for redemption. Sub-section (3) deals with compensation for subsequent improvements and re-valuation, if necessary, of the improvements at the time of ejectment. Sub-section (4) provides that "every matter arising under sub-section (3) shall be deemed to be a question relating to the execution of the decree within the meaning of clause (c) of section 244 of the Code of Civil Procedure." It seems to me a fortiori that the payment of the compensation which is assessed in the suit by the decree is still more a matter, or at least as much a matter, relating to execution and is intended to be dealt with as such. As I understand the scheme of the Act, it is that it leaves the decree passed under the Act for ejectment on payment of compensation to be governed by the law of limitation with regard to the execution of decrees, and it was not intended to interfere with the general principle, that a man who sues on his cause of action and obtains a decree and allows that decree to become barred has no further remedy. With great respect I am not prepared to follow the decision in Kutti Ali v. Chindan (1) in this case. The second appeal is dismissed with costs.

(1) 23 M. 629; 8 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 842.

(2) 25 M. 300; 12 M. L. J. 128 (F. B.).

SADASIVA AIYAR, J.—When a plaintiff has obtained in one suit, based on some legal title, a decree for the reliefs which he was entitled to as against a defendant and has allowed that decree to become barred, he cannot, in my opinion, be allowed to bring another suit for obtaining the very same relief against the very same defendant, though on a different basis, if the latter ground of claim is founded on a right or title which existed and could have been relied on as a basis of relief when the first suit was brought. If he had failed in the first suit on the basis on which he had brought it, he might be entitled to claim the same relief in a second suit on another basis, if this latter basis could be treated as affording a different cause of action.

In Chowakkaran Keloth v. Karuvalote Parkum (3) the provisions of section 6 of the Malabar Compensation for Tenants' Improvements Act and the decision in Vedapuratti v. Vallabha Valiya Raja (2) do not seem to have been considered and brought to the attention of the Court. I do not, therefore, with great respect, feel bound to follow the decision in Chowakkaran Keloth v. Karuvalote Parkum (3).

Appeal dismissed.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 182—False information—Petition of resignation containing untrue statements—Offence.

The accused, a peon of the Court of Wards, had a quarrel with one S, brother of a zilladar employed by the Court of Wards, and afterwards submitted a petition of resignation to the Collector, the officer in charge of the Court of Wards, in which he gave a distorted version of the whole affair in order to forestall any proceedings which might be taken against him by S or his brother:

Held, (1) that the petition did not amount to a complaint; [p. 113, col. 2]

(2) that the accused was not guilty of an offence under section 182 of the Penal Code inasmuch as he never intended the Collector to use his powers to the injury or annoyance of the persons mentioned in the petition nor had he any knowledge that such a result was likely. [p. 113, col. 2; p. 114, col. 1.]

Criminal revision from an order of the Sessions Judge, Farrukhabad.

Mr. Satya Chandra Mukerji, for the Applicant.

Mr. R. Malcomson (Assistant Government Advocate), for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—I take what seem to me the essential facts of this case from the judgment of the learned Sessions Judge. The applicant Debi, being at the time a peon in the service of the Court of Wards, had a quarrel with a youth of the name of Shiam Deo, brother of one Suraj Bali, zilladar in the service of the Court of Wards. The quarrel resulted in a scuffle and came to the notice of Mrs. Thomas, wife of the Special Manager locally employed by the Court of Wards. She interposed to stop the scuffle and later on Suraj Bali appears to have complained to the Special Manager, Mr. Thomas. Under these circumstances Debi addressed to the Collector, the officer in charge of the Court of Wards, a petition in which he requested to be allowed to resign his employment. In that petition he embodied his own version of his affray with Suraj Bali's brother; and I have no doubt that in so doing he departed from the truth and made statements defamatory to Mrs. Thomas. The Collector seems to have felt it incumbent on him to make some enquiry into the matter and to record the statements on oath of Debi and Shiam Deo. The Sessions Judge says that this was done by the Collector of the district in the exercise of his powers as District Magistrate, but this I hesitate to believe. The petition addressed to the Collector by Debi did not amount to a complaint and the Criminal offence therein referred to was not a cognisable one. At any rate, the result was that the Collector satisfied himself that the allegations made in Debi's petition against Mrs. Thomas were untrue and he ordered his prosecution for committing an offence punishable under section 182 of the Indian Penal Code.

I have to consider in revision whether the petition presented by Debi supplied the necessary ingredients for such an offence. I wish to make it quite clear that, if that petition had contained any allegations against any person employed as a subordinate under the orders of the Collector of the district as Manager of the Court of Wards, I should have been prepared to hold that the making of such allegations under the circumstances amounted to an offence under section 182 of the Indian Penal Code. The presumption would be that the person complaining to a superior officer of misconduct on the part of his subordinate intended that the superior officer in question should use his powers to the injury or annoyance of the person complained of, or at any rate knew that such a result was likely. I do not think, however, that anything in Debi's petition can be construed as an allegation either against Mr. Thomas, or against Suraj Bali. Reading this petition in connection with the facts as found by the Sessions Judge, it seems to me that Debi's object was, firstly, to get his resignation accepted at once, so that he might leave the neighbourhood, and secondly, to place on record a document containing a distorted version of what had actually happened, in order to discount beforehand any proceeding which might be instituted against him by Suraj Bali or his brother in a Criminal Court, or by Mr. Thomas, as Special Manager of the Court of Wards, for his dismissal from his employment. I certainly do not think that he intended that the Collector should use his powers as Manager of the Court of Wards so as to cause injury or annoyance to Mrs. Thomas or to Suraj Bali's brother, nor am I prepared to infer that he knew it to be likely that such a result would follow. I do not think the conviction can be affirmed. I set aside the conviction and acquit Debi of the offence and direct that the fine, if paid, be refunded.

Conviction quashed.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 343—Wrongful confinement—Prostitute kept in brothel house—Offence.

Accused No. 1 brought the complainant, his mistress, to Bombay and after living with her for a few days in a brothel house left her in charge of accused No. 2, the brothel-keeper, who kept guard over the complainant and allowed her to go out only on rare occasions under proper control. Accused No. 1 was aware of the conditions under which the complainant would have to live in the house:

Held, that both the accused were guilty of the offence of wrongful confinement. [p. 115, col. 2 p. 116, col. 1; p. 117, cols. 1 & 2.]

Criminal appeals from convictions and sentences passed by the Acting Fourth Presidency Magistrate, Bombay.

Mr. Velinkar (with him Mr. D. W. Pilgamkar), for the Appellants

Mr. S. S. Patkar (Government Pleader), for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

SHAH, J.—We have heard an interesting and a careful argument from Mr. Velinkar on behalf of the appellants in this case. I have considered the evidence in the light of his arguments and the criticism to which the evidence has been subjected by him. The charge against the two accused is that from the 10th of October 1916 they wrongfully confined one Vithibai for three or more days and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 343 of the Indian Penal Code. The accused No. 2 is a brothel-keeper in Bombay and accused No. 1 is said to have supplied women to be used as prostitutes in this brothel from time to time. He brought Vithibai, the complainant in this case, to Bombay and kept her in the brothel of accused No. 2. The case for the prosecution is that this Vithibai like other women in the brothel was kept in confinement. Vithibai stayed on in the house kept by accused No. 2 from the 10th of October until May 1917, when an application was prepared on her behalf by the witness Abdul Gani and sent to the Commissioner of Police. Thereafter an enquiry was made and the present prosecution is the result of that investigation.

The evidence for the prosecution consists of the statements made by Vithibai and three other women who stayed in the house, namely, Chandrabai, Godibai and Sundri. Vithibai describes the manner in which she was kept in this house in these terms:—"I was always kept in confinement by the accused No. 2. The accused No. 1, Bandu, lived with me in the brothel of the accused No. 2 for eight days. During these eight days I was not free to go out anywhere. The brothel of the accused No. 2 is on the first floor of a house at Kamatipura. The entrance to the building was always kept closed. It used to be opened for the visitors but the servant in charge used to close it up. The servant used to be always at the door. Besides this servant a man and his woman used to keep guard over us and, therefore, we were not free to go out of the house." To the same effect is the evidence of Chandrabai. She says as follows:—"We four were kept like prisoners in the brothel. We were never allowed to go out. One Vitha and her paramour Dewoo used to keep watch over us." And Godibai deposes to the same effect: "They were constantly in a state of confinement. There is a woman named Vitha in the brothel and she has a paramour named Dewoo. Vitha and Dewoo watched the four girls." Sundri who was examined by the Court stayed in the brothel for a short time; she swears that accused No. 2 never allowed her to go down. This evidence, if believed, would clearly show that accused No. 2 wrongfully confined the complainant Vithibai.

The main argument on behalf of the defence has been that these women, who more or less voluntarily submitted themselves to prostitution, now exaggerate matters and that their evidence is not worthy of credence. In the first place the learned Trial Magistrate, who saw these witnesses, has in the main believed them. I have read the evidence of these witnesses, particularly the cross-examination of Vithibai; and after a careful consideration thereof I am unable to find any good reason to hold that in so far as they speak of wrongful confinement their evidence is not true. I am satisfied on the evidence of these four women that not only was Vithibai kept in a state of confinement, but that the women in this brothel house were kept in that state and that such confinement was a part of the life which the inmates of the house were constrained to live. It has been urged on behalf of the accused that Vithibai had abandoned her husband and lived for some time with accused No. 1 at Kolhapur as his mistress, that she accompanied him to Bombay also voluntarily and that she took to the life of prostitution voluntarily. I have carefully considered this argument; and having regard to the circumstances of the case I am not satisfied by any means that Vithibai did voluntarily submit herself to the life which she undoubtedly led in the house of accused No. 2. If the evidence as to wrongful confinement is true, it is not easy to believe that these women submitted themselves to prostitution voluntarily. However, I am willing to assume for the sake of argument in favour of the defence that Vithibai of her own accord accompanied accused No. 1 and commenced to stay in the house of accused No. 2 to lead the life of a prostitute. Even then the question is whether the wrongful confinement to which she is said to have been subjected is proved. I am satisfied that the evidence as to wrongful confinement is true. It is urged on behalf of the defence that now and then Vithibai and other women in the brothel were allowed to go out. It seems to me, however, that their going out casually does not make their confinement in the house any the less wrongful on that account. The mere fact that they could leave it on occasions, probably under proper control and largely according to the wishes of accused No. 2, goes to emphasize in my opinion the truthfulness of the evidence that generally they were kept confined in the house and were used for the purposes of prostitution under that restraint. Having regard to this view of the evidence in the case there can be no doubt about the guilt of accused No. 2.

It has been urged as regards accused No. 1 that he stayed in the house of accused No. 2 only for a short time after Vithibai was placed in her charge and that during that time Vithibai had no reason to complain. As stated by her in her cross-examination, for a week or fortnight after she was brought to Bombay she was all right and that after accused No. 1 left, accused No. 2 put her to prostitution. No doubt this statement so far as it goes is in favour of accused No. 1, but there is evidence in the case to show that this was not the first time that accused No. 1 supplied a woman to accused No. 2. There is a letter, Exhibit C in the case, which goes to show that accused No. 2 depended upon accused No. 1 for this purpose; and there is other evidence in the case to show that the accused No. 1 used to supply women to accused No. 2 for this immoral purpose. That being so, it is a fair and proper inference that he knew the conditions under which the women in this house had to live. The accused No. 1 himself was in the house for some days, certainly exceeding three days. The evidence also shows that the wrongful confinement alleged in respect of Vithibai was not restricted to that particular woman but that such confinement was an ordinary incident of life in this brothel. I am, therefore, unable to accept the argument on behalf of the defence that accused No. 1 could not have known the conditions under which Vithibai would have to live in the brothel. The evidence of Vithibai herself shows that during the time that accused No. 1 stayed in the house of accused No. 2, she was practically confined in the house and was not allowed to move out. It may be that she was not put to prostitution during that time, but the fact remains that accused No. 1 brought her to this house and left her there practically in a helpless condition, knowing the kind of life which she would have to lead and the conditions under which she would have to live. There is also evidence in the case to show that certain moneys were borrowed from two Marwadis in the name of Vithibai, and I am satisfied on the evidence that though the borrowing was in the name of Vithibai, the money did not reach her or remain with her. Under the circumstances it is not an unreasonable inference that the sum of Rs. 100 which was borrowed in the name of Vithibai was given by accused No. 2 as a consideration to accused No. 1. But whatever the truth about this sum of Rs. 100 may be, the evidence makes it clear that accused No. 1 and accused No. 2 knew each other very well and that accused No. 1 was fully aware of the condition in which he left Vithibai in the house of accused No. 2. I am, therefore, satisfied that accused No. 1 was also instrumental in wrongfully confining Vithibai during his stay in the house of accused No. 2 and that he is equally guilty, though he may not be equally responsible for the subsequent wrongful confinement by accused No. 2. I am unable to accept his explanation that when he left Bombay for Kolhapur he offered to take Vithibai with him but that Vithibai of her own accord refused to leave the house of accused No. 2. I have no hesitation in accepting the evidence of Vithibai on this point in preference to the explanation offered by accused No. 1. The charge brought against the two accused is clearly established, and their convictions must be confirmed.

As regards the sentence it is undoubtedly a serious offence and not easy of detection. Further, the evidence shows that this system of wrongful confinement was not restricted only to the complainant but was generally adopted in respect of practically all the women who were kept in the house. On the other hand, it is to be remembered that Vithibai's antecedents are not in her favour and it is possible that she voluntarily accompanied accused No. 1 to Bombay and was perhaps not unwilling to be kept in the house of accused No. 2 for an immoral purpose. Having regard to all the circumstances of the case, I think that the sentence ought to be substantial and deterrent. I do not think, however, that there is any need for the maximum sentence allowed by the section. I think that the sentence of one year's rigorous imprisonment in the case of each of the accused would be sufficient to meet the ends of justice, and I would accordingly reduce the sentence to that period in the case of each of the appellants.

HEATON, J.—This case is of some considerable importance in itself as it raises a question that needs very careful consideration and so I will give in my own words my view of the salient features of the case.

It is admitted that the inmates of accused No. 2's brothel were subject to a certain degree of restraint. There was a barred door and the egress and ingress of persons was watched. The prostitutes were dependent on the brothel-keeper accused No. 2 for their food, clothes and ornaments. The money earned by the prostitutes was taken by the brothel keeper.

All these matters are either notorious and admitted or are clearly indicated by the evidence. The daily circumstances of life are, therefore, such that this normal restraint could very easily be tightened so as to become virtual imprisonment and be of such a nature as to amount to wrongful confinement within the meaning of the Indian Penal Code. The question before us is whether on the evidence recorded by him the Magistrate was rightly convinced that this was the case. I think he was. The evidence is specific enough and it is the evidence of persons with knowledge of what they spoke about. Not only did the principal person concerned, the complainant in the case, give evidence but three other prostitutes, inmates of this brothel, also deposed to the state of virtual imprisonment in which they lived.

It is perfectly true that prostitutes are not reputed to be scrupulously truthful persons and it is true also that the four witnesses I have mentioned were no doubt indignant with, and exasperated against, the brothel-keeper accused No. 2. These are matters to make us cautious in accepting their testimony. Nevertheless with this need for caution in my mind I accept their testimony as a substantially true account of their ordinary conditions of life. I do not suppose, however, that they were never allowed to go out, that they were perpetually in confinement. That was probably not so, indeed, certain excursions into the outside world are admitted. But though not perpetual the normal condition of the complainant Vithibai was, I am satisfied, a condition of real confinement. There is nothing improbable or remarkable in this. As I have shown the normal restraint is easily tightened. In Vithibai's case, moreover, there is an undoubted circumstance which shows that she felt herself to be a helpless prisoner.

What released her from this brothel was a petition which was sent to the Commissioner of Police. The petition was got written by one Abdul Gani who had visited and conversed with Vithibai in the brothel. It relates that she is ill-treated and anxious to be released. That petition, unless it can otherwise be explained, does show conclusively that this woman felt herself to be in a hopeless condition, unable to escape, unable to reach freedom. And that could hardly be unless in fact she were under such restraint as to amount indubitably to wrongful confinement within the meaning of the Indian Penal Code. An explanation of this petition is offered on behalf of the accused, but I confess it seems to me that it has far less probability about it than the explanation which I have just recited. I believe myself that this petition was signed by the woman, or caused to be signed by her, because of a genuine desire to escape and a very real feeling that unaided she was unable to do so.

The case of accused No. 1 is, of course, different. But I think that as against him also the evidence establishes the charge. Taking into account the evidence and the circumstances which have been disclosed, I cannot but believe that accused No. 1 knew the state of affairs in accused No. 2's brothel. He knew that Vithibai would be subjected to the conditions of life there prevailing. I do not doubt that he did all that was on his part necessary to detain Vithibai in the brothel so long as he himself was there and I do not doubt that he left in the assurance that she would be, as indeed she was, detained there after he had left. On those facts I think that he took so essential and material a part in the confining of this girl that he is guilty of this offence as a principal.

I agree with my learned colleague that this is not one of those peculiarly atrocious cases which sometimes arise under the section of Indian Penal Code which we are now considering and I agree that the sentence of twelve months' imprisonment for each of these appellants is in the circumstances quite as heavy a sentence as justice and law in this case require.

Sentences reduced.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 145, 146—Attachment of land—Decree of Civil Court, effect of—Punjab Land Revenue Act (XVII of 1887), s. 36, applicability of—Revision—Chief Court, interference by.

In proceedings under Chapter XII of the Criminal Procedure Code where the Magistrate attaches property, the attachment should continue only until a competent Court has determined the rights of the parties thereto, and the mere fact that an appeal from such determination is pending before a higher Court is no reason for the Magistrate continuing to keep the property in attachment. [p. 119, col. 1.]

Obiter dictum.—Section 36 of the Punjab Land Revenue Act is not properly applicable to cases in which property has been attached by a Magistrate under section 146 of the Criminal Procedure Code. [p. 119, col. 1.]

Where after the attachment of certain property by a Magistrate under section 146 of the Criminal Procedure Code, one of the parties is put in possession of it by a Revenue Officer acting under section 36 of the Punjab Land Revenue Act, the Chief Court, as a Criminal Court, cannot interfere with the Revenue Officer's order. EMPEROR v. ABDUL AZIZ.

Case reported on 8th May 1916 by the District Magistrate, Lahore.

FACTS of the case appear from the following report of the Sessions Judge:—

"Sardar Kahan Singh, the grandfather of complainant, Sardarni Anup Kaur, made a registered deed of gift of 1229 ghomaos 4 kanals and 4 marlas of land in favour of Musammat Bishen Kaur, his daughter-in-law and complainant's mother. Possession was given to the donee. It was stated in the deed of gift that the gifted property is the self-acquired property of the donor and after the death of the donee, her offspring is entitled to possession. The above said donee was forcibly dispossessed by the collaterals of the Sardar, and a mutation was effected in their favour by the Revenue Officers. The complainant then filed a suit for declaration of right to the effect that she was entitled to the land. This was decreed in her favour. At the time when the complainant was forcibly dispossessed proceedings under section 145 were taken and with the consent of both parties the property was made over to a Receiver. When the complainant asked the Court to put her in possession of the land after the decision of the Civil Court was announced, she was not put in possession on the ground that the opposite party had appealed to the Chief Court and the Revenue (Settlement) Authorities had made a mutation in the favour of the collaterals.

"The application by the complainant was rejected by Malik Sahib Khan, exercising the powers of a Magistrate of the 1st Class in the Lahore District, by order dated 6th December 1915.

GROUNDS.—"Certain landed property was in dispute between Sardarni Anup Kaur (wife of Sardar Tara Singh, and daughter of Sardarni Bishen Kaur, deceased) and her father Sardar Abdul Aziz. The land had been owned by Sardarni Bishen Kaur. Feelings ran high and in June 1913 proceedings were taken under section 145, Criminal Procedure Code, with the result that a Receiver was appointed with the consent of both parties till a decision had been arrived at by a Civil Court. In October 1915 the Subordinate Judge decided that Sardarni Anup Kaur had right and title to the land, but when the Receiver was asked to hand over the property it transpired that in December 1914, the Settlement Authorities had effected mutation in favour of Sardar Abdul Aziz and given him possession, though the Receiver was still actually in possession, when this happened.

"This, it is clear, was a most inequitable proceeding. But when the lady applied to the successor in office of the Magistrate who appointed the Receiver, the succeeding Magistrate refused to upset the arrangement made by the Settlement Authorities. I recommend that, if practicable, the Chief Court may order the Receiver to again be put in possession with a view to handing over the land to Anup Kaur.

"It is said that Abdul Aziz has appealed against the decision of the Subordinate Judge, but, be that as it may, his present possession is clearly inequitable."

Mr. Nanak Chand, for the Complainant.

The Hon'ble Mr. Muhammad Shafi, Mr. Habib Ullah and Sheikh Ghulam Mohi-ud-Din, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The land in dispute was the property of Sardar Kahan Singh, who left it by gift to his daughter-in-law Musammat Bishen Kaur. On the death of Musammat Bishen Kaur, a dispute arose between the present petitioner, who is the daughter of Musammat Bishen Kaur, and, therefore, granddaughter of Sardar Kahan Singh, and the respondents, who are the collaterals of Sardar Kahan Singh. Proceedings under Chapter XII of the Criminal Procedure Code were started and by agreement of the parties the Magistrate attached the property and made it over to a Receiver who held possession for some time. The present petitioner, having brought a Civil suit to establish her right to the property, has succeeded in obtaining a decree against which decree an appeal is pending in this Court. On the strength of her decree the petitioner has applied to the Magistrate to put her in possession of the property, but the Magistrate has refused saying that the result of the appeal to this Court should first be awaited. This order of the Magistrate by no means meets with my approval. In such cases where the Magistrate attaches the property, the attachment should continue only until a competent Court has determined the rights of the parties thereto (see section 146, Criminal Procedure Code). And in the present case a competent Court has determined the petitioner's title and the mere fact that an appeal to this Court is pending is no good reason for the Magistrate continuing to keep the property in attachment

But a more serious obstacle stands in the way of the petitioner's claim to get possession. The property is, as a matter of fact, no longer in possession of the Receiver. Some time after the appointment of the Receiver the Revenue Authorities decided the mutation dispute in favour of the respondents, and the Revenue Officer, acting apparently under section 36 of the Land Revenue Act, directed that the respondents should be put in possession. Thereupon the respondents got possession and are still in possession (though I may here note that the land in question or at all events the greater part of it is, so I understand, in the possession of tenants who have been in physical possession throughout).

On behalf of the petitioner it is urged that the Magistrate having attached the land and put in a Receiver he, as the ministerial officer, is responsible to the petitioner for the return of the land. The fact, however, remains that it is the Revenue Officer who has put the respondents in possession and I fail to understand how I, as a Criminal Court, can interfere with the Revenue Officer's orders. Those orders are appealable to the Land Revenue Authorities. As far as I can see at present, section 36 of the Land Revenue Act is not properly applicable to cases in which property has been attached by a Magistrate. It seems, therefore, to me that the petitioner has an excellant case for applying to the Revenue Authorities either by way of appeal or by application for revision, as the case may be, to get the orders of the Revenue Officer revised and the possession of the land handed back to the Receiver. As soon as this has been done the petitioner can then make a fresh application to the Magistrate, who, unless the appeal lodged by the respondents to this Court has in the meantime been decided in their favour, should then put the petitioner in possession. Or possibly the Revenue Authorities on appeal may find their way to cutting matters short by themselves putting the petitioner in possession. As matters stand, however, I am at present unable to do anything for the petitioner and I, therefore, dismiss this application for revision.

Application rejected.

EMPEROR—RESPONDENT.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 202, 203—Postponement of process—Procedure—Irregularity not amounting to miscarriage of justice—Revision—High Court, power of.

If a Magistrate takes it upon himself to postpone the issue of process for compelling the attendance of the person complained against for any purpose at all, he is required either to enquire into the case himself or to direct a local investigation. The fact that a local investigation has already been made does not affect the proceedings necessary under section 202 of the Criminal Procedure Code when once process has been postponed. [p. 120, col. 2.]

If an irregularity in procedure has not resulted in a miscarriage of justice, the High Court will not make an order which can result only in harassment to the parties and waste of public time. In a case in which a perfunctory enquiry has been made by the Police and the report considered in a perfunctory fashion by the Magistrate, the High Court will interfere and insist upon the provisions of section 202 being strictly enforced. But where the enquiry has been carefully made and carefully considered, the Court will exercise its discretion and refuse to re-open the matter. [p. 120, col. 2.]

Criminal revision from an order of the District Judge, Patna.

Mr. Bankim Chandra Dey, for the Appellant.

Mr. Bimala Charan Sinha, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—On the 21st October 1917 the complainant lodged an information at Chandi Police Station to the effect that he was taking his cattle to plough his rabi lands when he saw the accused's cattle grazing in his paddy fields. He made an attempt to seize the cattle but was attacked by the accused and as a result of the attack received a severe injury from a garasa. His brother was also beaten with a lathi. The Sub-Inspector in charge of the thana took up the enquiry and on the 9th November submitted a long report, more in the nature of a judicial pronouncement than a statement of the result of a Police enquiry, to the effect that the complainant had no doubt been struck on the head and his brother beaten by two of the accused's party, but that the whole story of the cattle grazing was obviously false. The real quarrel arose from an altercation between the complainant and a woman of the accused's family. This report did not reach the Magistrate until the 15th of November. In the meantime, i.e., on the 13th November the complainant had filed a complaint before the Magistrate and had been examined on oath and an order made: "Put up at Bihar on the 19th November with Police papers if any." On the 19th November the Police report was considered and the complaint dismissed, and an order recorded on the Police report: "Enter true section 324, Criminal Procedure Code, place of occurrence and real subject-matter of dispute changed." The complainant on the 24th November filed a petition before the Sessions Court asking for further enquiry into his complaint. The learned Judge on the 15th December rejected the application on the ground that in view of the Police report it would be idle to order a further enquiry. On the 3rd January an application was made to this Court in revision. It was admitted by the Criminal Bench of which I was a member.

In support of the Magistrate's proceedings a judgment has been shown to me in an unreported case decided by my learned brother Mr. Justice Jwala Prasad, in which it is held that under section 203 a Magistrate is entitled to dismiss a complaint if after examining the complainant there is in his judgment no sufficient ground for proceeding, and that there is nothing in section 203 requiring an enquiry under section 202. The basis of this decision is that section 202 deals only with the question of postponing the issue of process, whereas section 203 deals with the procedure to be adopted in dismissing the complaint. It has been argued before me that if a Magistrate takes it upon himself to postpone the issue of process for any purpose at all, he is required either to enquire into the case himself or to direct a local investigation. The fact that a local investigation had already been made would not affect the proceedings necessary under section 202, when once process has been postponed. I am myself of opinion that this argument is sound. But it is not in every case that this Court should interfere in revision. If an irregularity in procedure has not resulted in a miscarriage of justice, this Court will not make an order which can result only in harassment to the parties and waste of public time. In a case in which a perfunctory enquiry has been made by the Police and the report considered in a perfunctory fashion by the Magistrate, the Court will interfere and insist upon the provisions of section 202 being stringently enforced. But where the enquiry has been carefully made and as in this case carefully considered, this Court will exercise its discretion and refuse to re open the matter. I have read the Police report with care and am satisfied that there was no cattle grazing and that, therefore, the whole basis of the complaint was false. In this view of the matter I decline to order any further enquiry.

RAPAKA VIYYANNA—RESPONDENT No. 1—APPELLANT

PARAKALA BAJAMMA alias SESHAMMA—PETITIONER—RESPONDENT.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 195 (6), (7)—Sanction to prosecute granted by Subordinate Judge—Appeal, forum of—Madras Civil Courts Act (III Mad of 1873), ss 13, 27.

A District Court is the authority to which the Court of a Subordinate Judge is subordinate within the meaning of sub-section (6 of section 195 of the Criminal Procedure Code [p. 21, col. 2.]

That section only refers to Courts and makes no distinction between appellate and original jurisdiction. [p. 121, col. 2.]

Muthuswami Mudali v. Veeni Chetti, 30, M. 382; 17 M. L. J. 266; 2 M. L. T. 239; 6 Cr. L. J. 102 (F. B.), followed.

An appeal lies, therefore, from orders passed by Subordinate Judges under section 195 of the Criminal Procedure Code, whether in the exercise of original or appellate jurisdiction, to the District Court and not to the High Court. [p. 121, col. 2.]

Appeal against the order of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Kistna at Ellore, in Appeal Petition No. 64 of 1916, preferred against that of the Court of the District Munsif, Tanuku, in Miscellaneous Petition No. 2104 of 1914, in Original Suit No. 778 of 1911.

FACTS.—The District Munsif of Tanuku passed an order under section 195 of the Criminal Procedure Code in Original Suit No. 778 of 1911. There was an appeal against the order to the Subordinate Judge's Court at Ellore, and from the order passed by the latter Court, the appellant preferred an appeal to the High Court.

Mr. P. Narayanmoorthy, for the Respondent, took the preliminary objection that the appeal to the High Court was not maintainable, and that, under section 195, Criminal Procedure Code, the Subordinate Judge's Court was subordinate to the District Court, and the appeal should, in the first instance, have been presented to the latter Court. Under section 195 (7) (a) the District Court is the Appellate Court of inferior jurisdiction, and an appeal from an order of the Subordinate Judge granting sanction for prosecution of a party or witness lies to the District Court.

Mr. V. Ramadoss, for the Appellant, argued that the order in question was an appellate order of the Subordinate Judge and the High Court was the only Court competent to entertain and hear the appeal.

Mr. Narayanamoorthy, in reply, urged that the order of the Subordinate Judge should itself be treated as an original order on an application to him for reversing the order of the Munsif.

JUDGMENT.—Under section 27 of the Civil Courts Act, the general control over all Civil Courts in any District is vested in the District Judge and the latter is, therefore, an authority to which the Court of a Subordinate Judge is subordinate within the meaning of the Criminal Procedure Code, section 195 (6). The High Court has general powers of superintendence over all Courts and is a similar authority. Sub-section (7) of that section deals with the case of several controlling authorities and provides that only the Court to which appeals ordinarily lie from the Court granting sanction shall exercise the power conferred by sub-section (6). Sub section 7 (a) also provides that where such appeals lie to more than one Court the Appellate Court of inferior jurisdiction shall be the authority to exercise this power.

Appeals lie from the Court of a Subordinate Judge in certain cases to the District Judge and in other cases to the High Court, and section 13 of the Civil Courts Act treats the latter class of cases as an exception to the general rule that appeals lie to the District Judge. Since appeals ordinarily lie to the District Court and the latter is of inferior jurisdiction to the High Court, the District Court is the authority to which the Court of the Subordinate Judge is subordinate within the meaning of sub-section (6).

It is contended by Mr. Ramadoss that in this case the Subordinate Judge passed the order in the exercise of his appellate jurisdiction and that appeals lie from orders so passed only to the High Court under section 100 of the Civil Procedure Code. Section 195 of the Criminal Procedure Code, however, only refers to Courts and makes no distinction between appellate and original jurisdiction, and in Muthuswami Mudali v. Veeni Chetti (1) it was held that an order of a Superior Court passed under section 195 was not merely an order confirming or reversing the order of a Subordinate Court, but was itself an order granting or refusing sanction. If it were treated as a mere appellate order, section 195 makes no provision for further applications and it is only by treating the order as an original order that any further application lies under section 195. We, therefore, think that this application should have been made to the District Court and accordingly dismiss it.

Application dismissed.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 145, proceedings under—Arbitration—Award accepted by both parties—Revision—Objection to award, validity of.

Where after drawing up proceedings under section 145 of the Criminal Procedure Code the matter is, with the consent of the parties, referred to arbitration and the award is filed and accepted by both parties, it is not open to either of them to object to the award in revision.

Criminal revision from an order of the Magistrate, Patna.

Mr. Seshir Kumar Mitter, for the Petitioner.

Mr. Nirsu Narain Sinha, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—The facts of this case are that on proceedings under section 145 having been drawn up and parties having appeared in Court, it was agreed that the matter should be referred to arbitration. On the submission of the award by the arbitrators, both sides accepted it and an order was made in accordance with the award which was in favour of the first party. The second party now comes to this Court on the basis of the decisions in the cases of Hamidul Haq v. Ataet Hossain (1) and Hari Prasad Tiwari v. Sewak Das (2). We may say at once that we are in entire agreement with the principles of those two decisions; but it is to be noted that in both these cases the parties were not disposed to accept the award when it arrived before the Magistrate. It was, therefore, if we may say so, correct to say that the Magistrate was still required in spite of the award to proceed in accordance with law as prescribed in section 145, clause (4). In the case before us the second party acquiesced in the award. It is recorded upon the award itself, "filed by the parties. Second party accepts the decision of the arbitrators." No evidence was offered by the second party. The Magistrate, therefore, proceeded in accordance with section 145, clause (4). In the absence of any written statement he perused the statement made by the arbitrators which had been handed to him by the parties jointly, he heard the parties and the only reason why he did not receive evidence may be said to be that there was no evidence to receive. Having heard the second party declare that he accepted the decision of the arbitrators, it was hardly open to him to go outside that statement and to insist upon the production of evidence which the second party had no desire to produce. We are, therefore, of opinion that there was nothing in the proceedings of the Court below to justify our interference.

The application is rejected.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 107—Breach of peace apprehended in sub-division—Accused living in Sudder Division—Procedure—Irregularity—Overt acts—Apprehension of breach of peace.

In a case under section 107, Criminal Procedure Code, the breach of the peace apprehended being in a sub-division and the accused residing in the Sudder Division, the District Magistrate was moved for the commencement of the proceedings, but he, instead of drawing up the proceedings and sending them to the Sub-Divisional Magistrate for trial, merely said that he "sanctioned the proceedings" and sent the case to the Sub-Divisional Magistrate:

Held, that although the District Magistrate did not express his intention strictly in accordance with law, the irregularity in expression did not deprive the trying Magistrate of jurisdiction in the case and could not affect the merits of the trial in any way. [p. 123, col. 1.]

In the matter of NARINDRA SINGH.

Held, also, that though there were no actual overt acts on the part of the accused during the six months preceding the commencement of the proceedings still the proceedings were not bad as there was a likelihood that the accused might commit a breach of the peace or disturb the public tranquillity or do some wrongful act which might occasion a breach of the peace. [p. 123, col. 1.]

Babus Manmatha Nath Mukerjee and Hemendra Kumar Das, for the Petitioners.

Mr. Orr (Deputy Legal Remembrancer), for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—In this case an objection is taken on behalf of the three accused who have been bound down under section 107, Criminal Procedure Code, that the proceedings before the Trying Magistrate were without jurisdiction. It appears that the breach of the peace apprehended was within the Sub-Division of Chandpur, whereas the accused reside in the Sudder Division. It was, necessary, therefore, under section 107 (2), Criminal Procedure Code, to go before the District Magistrate for commencement of the proceedings. The District Magistrate, instead of drawing up proceedings and sending them to the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, said that he 'sanctioned' proceedings and sent the case to the Sub-Divisional Magistrate. The intention of the District Magistrate is clear, but he expressed himself loosely and not strictly in accordance with the section. We do not think, however, that that would deprive the Trying Magistrate of jurisdiction in the case. It is a mere irregularity in expression which could not affect the merits of the trial in any way.

Then it is urged that the overt acts, if any, proved against the accused were sometime prior to the commencement of these proceedings in January 1917. That, however, is a matter which must be taken into consideration with all the circumstances in the case and it may well be that, though there were no actual overt acts on the part of the accused during the six months preceding the commencement of this trial, there might still be a likelihood that they would commit a breach of the peace or disturb the public tranquillity or do some wrongful act which might occasion a breach of the peace. We do not, therefore, feel disposed to interfere on this ground.

The last ground, which is taken by Ohiduddin Choudhury alone, is that the amount of the security demanded from him is excessive and that he will not be readily able to find it. He was ordered to enter into his own bond for Rs. 5,000 and to find one surety in a like sum. It is urged that it may be difficult for him to find a single surety in a sum of Rs. 5,000. He will, however, be able to find two sureties in Rs. 2,500 each. To this the Crown has no objection. We accordingly vary the order and direct that, besides his own bond of Rs. 5,000, Ohiduddin Choudhury do find two sureties in two sums of Rs. 2,500 each. In other respects the Rule is discharged.

Rule discharged.

Jamiat Singh, Magistrate, 1st Class, Jullundur, in which he asked the Magistrate to dismiss a criminal case under section 420 of the Indian Penal Code, then pending against one Nur Mahomed, an Arain of Basti Danishmandan in the Jullundur District.

In the matter of NARINDRA SINGH.

Narindra Singh has admitted writing the letter in question, and it has been further admitted by him that his action was wholly unjustifiable. It has, however, been argued on his behalf that there were extenuating circumstances, (a) in that the charge against Nur Mahomed was false, Nur Mahomed, though convicted by the Magistrate, having been ultimately acquitted by the Sessions Judge on appeal, and (b) that the letter was written at the instance of Mian Nihal Singh, the father of the Magistrate.

As regards (a), the character of the case against Nur Mahomed is, in our opinion, entirely immaterial. Further, Narindra Singh admits that he had no personal knowledge of the facts of that case and did not know whether it was true or false.

As regards (b), the contention that the letter was written at the instance of M. Nihal Singh, we have ourselves examined Narindra Singh at some length.

The allegation of Mian Jamiat Singh, the Magistrate, was that the letter had been written at the instigation of Munshi Wazir Din, Naib Tahsildar of Una, who is himself a resident of Basti Danishmandan. An enquiry was held by the Deputy Commissioner of Hoshiarpur into the conduct of Munshi Wazir Din regarding this and other matters, with the result that he was suspended; he was, however, afterwards given the benefit of the doubt on this point by the Commissioner of Jullundur. We do not intend to discuss the question whether or not it was Wazir Din who instigated the letter written by Narindra Singh. We are, however, completely confident that whoever instigated the writing of that letter it was not M. Nihal Singh, the father of the Magistrate. The statement of Narindra Singh on this point is hopelessly unconvincing, and we do not believe that there is any truth in it at all. It is a fact that Mian Nihal Singh was, at a later date, induced to write to his son on the subject of the case against Nur Mahomed, but it is beyond doubt that M. Nihal Singh knew nothing about the letter which is the subject of this charge, and had no acquaintance whatever with the facts of the case pending against Nur Mahomed.

We have, accordingly, no hesitation in finding Narindra Singh guilty of the grossly improper conduct with which he is charged and we are unable to see any extenuation; on the contrary we think that Narindra Singh has greatly aggravated his offence both by his plea that the letter was written at the instance of M. Nihal Singh, and by his adherence to that plea in the statement which he has made before us. He would have done much better to have admitted the truth frankly and to have thrown himself on the mercy of the Court.

It is apparent from the terms of the letter that the writer was fully aware that he was doing wrong. It is indeed impossible that he should not have been aware of that, and the offence is not one which it is possible for us to regard lightly.

In the case of a more senior man, of more experience, it might have been necessary to pass a sentence of dismissal. In the present case, however, we are not disposed to go to that length. We have taken into our consideration the facts that Narindra Singh is a young man who, though he practised for a short time previously as a Mukhtar only commenced practice as a Pleader in 1914, and that he is a member of a family of which some members have apparently rendered good service to Government, and we do not desire to inflict such a sentence as would, even though it is merely one of suspension, have the practical effect of precluding, by reason of its length, the offender from retrieving his character and from future practice as a Pleader.

The sentence which we are about to pass is, however, the least, in our opinion, which can be adequately inflicted in view of the gravity of Narindra Singh's misconduct.

The sentence of the Court is that the certificate of Narindra Singh, Pleader, 2nd Class, be suspended for a period of one year from the date of this order.

Pleader suspended.

KALKA PRASAD v. EMPEROR.

ALLAHABAD HIGH COURT.

CIVIL REVISION NO. 170 OF 1917.

December 22, 1917.

Present:—Mr. Justice Walsh.

KALKA PRASAD—APPLICANT

EMPEROR—OPPOSITE-PARTY.

Legal Practitioners Act (XVIII of 1879), s. 36—Tout, person proclaimed as—Evidence of general repute, admissibility of—'General repute or otherwise,' meaning of—S. 36 (3), interpretation of—Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 110.

The evidence which may legitimately be tendered in a case under section 36 of the Legal Practitioners Act, is of general repute, The phrase 'general repute' in the section clearly includes hearsay evidence, which may be tested when admissible by cross-examination just as any other evidence may be tested and challenged. The words 'or otherwise' are clearly intended to include all the ordinary modes of proof known to the law which might otherwise be said to have been impliedly excluded, such as personal observation, evidence of conduct, admissions in conversation and the like, proved by first hand testimony. [p. 125, col. 2; p. 126, col. 1.]

The recognised principles applicable in cases under section 110 of the Criminal Procedure Code apply to cases under section 36 of the Legal Practitioners Act. [p. 125, col. 2.]

Sub-section (3), section 36, of the Legal Practitioners Act means that the exhibition of the copy-list there referred to is necessary to constitute a man a proclaimed tout. A mere removal or failure, however, to keep the list exhibited in the Court of a District Judge has not the effect of cancelling the list altogether, inasmuch as it is to be exhibited in all Courts subordinate to the District Court and its mere removal in one Court out of many does not per se cancel the original order. [p. 127, col. 2.]

Civil revision from the order of the District and Sessions Judge, Meerut, dated the 4th May 1917.

Messrs. A. P. Dube and S. C. Mookerji, for the Applicant.

Mr. A. E. Ryves, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—These are four applications in revision made by six persons, Abdul Rahim, Iftikhar Husain, Nisar Ahmad, Rup Chand, Abdul Karim and Kalka Prasad, against one order made by the District and Sessions Judge of Meerut on the 4th of May 1917 ordering the names of these persons with others to be posted and put on a list of touts under section 36 of the Legal Practitioners Act. Although the cases of the various applicants are not precisely similar, I propose to deal with all of them in one judgment.

The proceedings were undertaken by the District Judge at the instance of the Bar Association of Meerut, which had sat and considered the matter with great thoroughness and which supported the complaint which they made against the system of touting by a large number of persons with a considerable body of evidence.

The hearing of the case was spread over a considerable period and the learned Judge devoted great pains to the performance of a difficult but highly important task. I have to consider in the case of each applicant to this Court how far he is entitled to complain of the order made against him. Before doing so; however, it is necessary to make one or two general observations. While exercising due care to see that each case is fairly made out by the evidence called, and is established in a hearing according to law, it is desirable to emphasize the great importance of this legislation both to the general public and to the legal profession. The Judge has used language, none too strong, about the pests who perennially infest the Courts, though I doubt whether he is accurate in attributing their success to the technicalities of English Law rather than to those of Indian Legislation. But it is common knowledge that systematic touting is inseparable from a great deal of deception and imposition practised upon poor and ignorant litigants, whose interests are subordinated to those of the needy persons who prey upon their credulity. It is also inseparable from unprofessional conduct on the part of those who employ them. It is only by the vigilant efforts of bodies like the Meerut Bar Association and by strict enforcement of statutory safeguards, that the poorer members of the public and the respectable members of the profession can obtain protection.

The nature of the evidence which may legitimately be tendered in such a case does not really admit of much controversy. The learned Judge has held that the recognised principles applicable in cases under section 110 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, or the "evil livelihood" section, are applicable here. This is clearly right. Indeed it was admitted at the Bar by both sides in this case, which was well and temperately presented. The Statute says "by general reputation or otherwise." The former of those provisions clearly includes hearsay evidence which may be tested, when admissible, by cross-examination just as other evidence may be tested and challenged. The latter provision "or otherwise" is clearly intended to include all the ordinary modes of proof known to the law which might otherwise be said to have been impliedly excluded, such as personal observation, evidence of conduct, admissions in conversation and the like, proved by first hand testimony. In this case almost every possible kind of evidence was given. I note that none of the alleged touts themselves gave evidence on oath, though I can find nothing in the statute or in the general law to prevent their doing so if they chose. The Code of Criminal Procedure is not applicable and there seems no reason in good sense or in the general law to disentitle them to be heard on oath. It is not to be supposed that direct evidence of a specific case of consideration passing between tout and employer can be forthcoming, except in the rarest cases. The case quoted to me from the Punjab Record is not in point. The only evidence in that case was a letter of introduction which did not suggest remuneration, and might have been perfectly harmless. But it is a reasonable and legitimate inference of fact that if a man is shown to spend the greater portion of his working hours in canvassing and introducing clients to members of the profession, he is not rendering gratuitous service such as a casual friend or acquaintance may do.

In my opinion revision may be entertained in such a case as this. It is "a case in which no appeal lies." I am aware that the contrary view has been expressed by some Judges of this Court in Madho Ram, In the matter of the petition of (1). The point taken was that the finding was against the weight of evidence. That is not a ground for revision and, therefore, it was not necessary for the Court to decide more. I do not think that it is necessary to invoke the aid of the superintendence section in the Government of India Act, 1915, though it seems to have been held in Kedar Nath, In re (2), that this was one way of questioning orders in this Court. There is no decision binding upon me and I prefer the view taken in Bavu Sahib v. District Judge of Madura (3), where the High Court interfered in revision in a similar case. The matter has been very fully discussed in Hari Charan Sarkar v. District Judge of Dacca (4), where it was held that the revisional jurisdiction could only be entertained in the furtherance of justice.

These being the general considerations applicable, I now come to the particular case of each applicant before me. In the cases of Rup Chand, Iftikhar Husain and Abdul Karim there was ample evidence to justify the order. They were constantly seen to be taking clients about, one of them had taken away one case from one of the witnesses, they had been seen to stop clients, hold them in conversation and apparently take charge of them. The evidence as to their general reputation was very strong. It was urged on behalf of Rup Chand, and I think one of the others, that the Judge had erred in refusing to send for files of cases which would have shown that they were legitimately engaged in litigation in which they or members of their family were interested. This might be so, but it would not negative or prove anything inconsistent with the other evidence called against them. The learned Judge was, no doubt, pressed for time to conclude enquiry before going on leave. He took the right view in assuming that these files would prove what they were alleged to show and that it was superfluous to prove them strictly, because they would not alter his view. I see no reason to interfere with the decision in the case of these three applicants and I, therefore, dismiss their applications.

The cases of Nisar Ahmad and Abdul Rahim stand upon a somewhat different footing. I have felt some doubt as to whether I ought to interfere even in their cases. I am not prepared to overrule the findings of the learned Judge on a question of fact of this kind even if I had the power to do so, and it may be that [ am stretching the powers of this Court in revision somewhat by interfering at all. I only do so because the evidence as recorded in the Judge's note in these two cases is not very strong, and the Judge being admittedly pressed for time and having given reasons in their cases which are not entirley satisfactory, it is just possible that they may have suffered injustice by being, so to speak, swept away in the general current against their co defendants. Abdur Rahim had been in the employment for one year of Mr. Abdul Bari, a Barrister against whom the complainants made no suggestion, but who had been temporarily absent from Meerut. Those who mentioned Abdur Rahim said very little about him. Muhammad Husain in cross-examination (see page 58 of the Judge's English notes) really spoke in his favour and mentioned that he had returned to Mr. Abdul Bari's employment. Gauri Prasad said little or nothing about him Ghasi Ram (see page 21 of the English notes) mistook him altogether for another.

As to Nisar Ahmad two Pleaders were called for the defence. One with over three years' experience spoke of him as being regularly in the employment, and constantly being seen in the company, of Mr. Zamirul-Islam, his employer. Mr. Abdullah Shah had nothing to suggest against the latter (see page 6). Bahal Singh and Ghasi Ram certainly gave positive evidence about his holding clients. Ramji Lal (pages 36-37) on the whole spoke in his favour. In these two cases the learned Judge's reason, namely, that the evidence did not warrant him in rejecting the considered complaint of the Bar Association, is not quite satisfactory. He must form an independent view of his own, though no doubt the opinion of the Bar Association on a matter of general reputation is entitled to very great weight. I am not deciding that his conclusion was wrong. It is a question of fact of which he is a better Judge than I. I merely hold that these two applicants have made out a case for further consideration and I remit their cases to the learned Judge for consideration and for such final order thereon as he, on hearing any further evidence on either side or of the men themselves, sees fit to make. He can, of course, take into account the evidence already given. And in the exercise of my discretion I leave it to the learned Judge to decide whether in the cases of these men he will suspend the operation of the list until he is able to take up the further enquiry. Further than this I decline to interfere,

The last case is the case of Kalka Prasad. This case has caused me some difficulty. The applicant was put upon a list in 1908 by the then District Judge of Meerut, the list which gave rise to the decision in Kedar Nath, In re (2). The District Judge reports that he has repeatedly applied to have his name removed as it was impeding his chances of obtaining work in Delhi, but the District Judge, of course, had no material on which to act. The applicant, undoubtedly, wrote to the Court on the 9th of February of this year and received what I may accept as an official reply that no list of touts was then affixed. According to the learned Judge it was also not affixed from the long vacation of 1916 and afterwards. It is clear that the list ought to be exhibited. I think sub-section 3 means that the exhibition of the copy list, there referred to, is necessary to constitute a man a proclaimed tout, though it is not necessary for me to decide that point in this case. But upon further consideration, I have come to the conclusion that the mere removal or failure to keep the list exhibited in the Court of the District Judge of Meerut had not the effect of cancelling the list altogether, inasmuch as it was by the order to be exhibited in all Courts subordinate to the District Court, and its mere removal in one Court out of many would not per se cancel the original order of 1908. The form, however, adopted by the learned Judge in this particular case has caused some embarrassment. He might have made a further list supplementary to the existing list of 1908 and merely ordered his officials to restore the list of 1908 to the place from which it should not have been removed. In that event the applicant would have had no grievance. As it is, he has the grievance, technical though it may be, that his name has been included in a new list consisting of the old list and the new names added thereto by the order of the 4th of May, and before that was done he was given no opportunity of showing cause. In this case again I decline in my discretion to interfere. Though the applicant's name would not be properly upon the new list and ought to be removed, it is not improperly upon the old list. The section gives the Judge the power, from time to time, to alter and amend the list and under the circumstances, inasmuch as the present applicant is desirous of being heard and may be able to satisfy the learned Judge that if he had been given an opportunity of showing cause his name would not have been included in the list of the 4th of May, I think the learned Judge might well allow an application by Kalka Prasad, if he sees fit to make it, to have the list altered or amended by the removal of his name, on the ground that whatever may have been the case in 1908 he is no longer a tout. The result is, though feeling some doubt in the matter, that I dismiss the application of Kalka Prasad.

Application dismissed.

EMPEROR—PROSECUTOR—RESPONDENT.

Provincial Insolvency Act (III of 1907), s. 43 (2)—Omission to enter property in schedule—Offence.

Where an insolvent, not knowing or forgetting that an equity of redemption is a valuable asset, failed to show in his schedule of assets certain land belonging to him but mortgaged with possession to two of his scheduled creditors:

Held, that he was not guilty of an offence under section 43 (2) of the Provincial Insolvency Act.

First appeal from the order of the District Judge, Lyallpur, dated the 12th December 1916, convicting the appellant.

Lala Hukam Chand, for the Appellant.

Mr. D. C. Ralli for the Government Advocate, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The appellant has been convicted under section 43 (2) of Act III of 1907, and sentenced to four months' simple imprisonment.

The charge against him is that when applying to be made an insolvent he wilfully made false entries, not showing in his schedule of assets certain mortgaged land.

This land was mortgaged with possession to two of his creditors and I do not think it at all likely that the omission was wilful. Most of the land is banjar. The creditors knew of the land, and I do not see what appellant had to gain by not entering the land in the schedule. He could not have hoped to keep it from the knowledge of his creditors. Mr. Ralli suggests that he wanted to arrange matters with the mortgagee to the prejudice of the other creditors, but there is no evidence of any collusion between him and the mortgagees. I should say it is most probable that he knew simply that he had to put all his available property at the disposal of the Court, and did not enter the land in the schedule simply because it was not in his possession, not knowing or forgetting that the equity of redemption was a valuable asset.

I accept this appeal and reversing the conviction and sentence, I acquit the appellant and release him from his bail.

Appeal accepted.

LAL AND OTHERS—PLAINTIFFS—APPELLANTS

GAUHAR AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Custom—Alienation—Proprietary rights acquired by occupancy tenants, effect of.

Where the sons of a Government tenant who acquired occupancy rights in the lands granted to him acquire the full proprietary rights therein, the occupancy rights merge in the proprietary rights and determine absolutely, and the persons who have acquired the proprietary rights are entitled to alienate the lands with or without necessity.

First appeal from the decree of the Senior Subordinate Judge, Lyallpur, dated the 19th August 1914.

Mr. Gokal Chand, for the Appellants.

Mr. Harcharn Das, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—Manda, grandfather of plaintiffs-appellants, was a Government tenant of the land in dispute and having fulfilled the necessary conditions acquired occupancy rights therein. He was succeeded by his sons, defendants Nos. 1 to 3, who in 1912 by a payment of Rs. 250 acquired full proprietary rights. On 12th May 1913 they sold the land for Rs. 7,150 to defendants Nos. 4 and 5.

The plaintiffs, contending that the land which was acquired by Manda was their ancestral property, sued for a declaration that the sale would not affect their reversionary rights after the death of the vendors.

The Subordinate Judge held that the occupancy rights acquired by Manda had merged in the proprietary rights acquired by the vendors and that, therefore, the land in suit was not the ancestral property of the plaintiffs.

He further held that if the occupancy rights be separated from the proprietary rights and held to be ancestral property of the plaintiffs, even then the suit must fail as it was proved that about Rs. 4,000 had been spent by the vendors on necessary objects. He accordingly dismissed the suit and plaintiffs appeal.

We have not been referred to any decision of this Court on all fours with the present case. The decision in Civil Appeal No. 765 of 1913, dated the 29th January 1914 (pages 11 and 12 of the paper-book) is distinguishable, because in that case proprietary rights had not been acquired.

The decisions in Civil Appeal No. 1255 of 1906 of 28th November 1907 and in Civil Appeal No. 869 of 1908 of 1st March 1910 are also not in point, because the alienors had obtained yeoman's grants of the land alienated, and a yeoman grantee's status is quite different to that of an occupancy tenant.

It is clear that in the present case the alienors themselves acquired the proprietary rights in the land, and, they were, therefore, authorized to alienate them, whether with or without necessity. Had they not acquired proprietary rights, and had they remained mere occupancy tenants, then according to custom they could not have alienated the occupancy rights except for valid necessity, but the occupancy rights have merged in the proprietary rights and have absolutely determined, and it cannot be said that any portion of the proprietary rights is ancestral qua the plaintiffs.

The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

pleaded that the plaintiff was not entitled to sue for rent inasmuch as his name had not been registered as mortgagee. The question of his title as mortgagee was also put in issue and was decided against him. He subsequently brought another suit for rent for the same period after registration of his name:

Held, (1) that the subsequent suit was barred by res judicata; [p. 132, col. 1.]

Appeal from a decision of the Additional District Judge, Gaya, dated the 16th November 1917.

Messrs. Nandkaloya and Kailaspati, for the Appellants.

Messrs. Kulwant Sahay and Sivanandan Rai, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—In this case the plaintiff Bansi Singh sued Mohan Mahton and others for the recovery of rent for the years 1319, 1320, and 1321 basing his claim as usufructuary mortgagee of a share in Mouza Barwa Khurd. He made Acchutanand, a malik in the mouza, as one of the defendants, alleging him to be his mortgagor. The case went to trial and the evidence on behalf of the plaintiff was recorded and finished, when Acchutanand put in an application praying to be entered as a plaintiff in the case and by an order passed on the 26th April 1916, the learned Munsif directed Acchutanand's name to be entered as such. The case before the Munsif turned on the consideration as to whether the doctrine of res judicata applied to the present suit.

It appears that there was an earlier suit instituted by Bansi Singh as against the tenant-defendants in this case for rent of 1319 and 1320 on the very same ground of his having been a usufructuary mortgagee of a share of Acchutanand. In that suit, it appears from Exhibit 8, the judgment in that case, the claim was resisted by the defendants principally on two grounds, firstly, they challenged the right of Bansi Singh to recover rent on the ground that if he was a mortgagee he could not successfully sue for rent unless his claim was registered under the Land Registration Act. In the alternative they also pleaded payment.

The introductory part of the judgment, Exhibit 8, would go to show that in the pleadings of that case the question of the title of Bansi Singh as mortgagee of Acchutanand was not raised. The issues framed in that case show that one of them was in these words: "Is the plaintiff entitled to receive rent from the defendants?" It is evident that the language in which this issue was framed was wide enough to cover not only the locus standi of the plaintiff with reference to the registration of his name, but also his title as mortgagee of Acchutanand.

It has been urged before me on behalf of the respondents that the language of this issue, though framed in general terms, could not have been intended to cover the issue affecting the title of the plaintiff as the mortgagee of Acchutanand. On the face of the pleadings as set out in the introductory part of the judgment one would be disposed to take that view, but a glance at that part of the judgment which deals with this issue shows that the Court did not confine itself to the consideration of only that part of the plaintiffs' right to realize rent which referred to the matter of the registration of his name, on the contrary it appears from his judgment that the learned Munsif who tried that case went exhaustively into an examination of the title of the plaintiff resting on the allegation that he was a mortgagee of Acchutanand. After considering the various points relating to this matter of the alleged title of the plaintiff, the learned Munsif in that case concluded his observations on this particular issue in these words: "The thicca, therefore, confers no right on the plaintiff (defendant No. 2 in this case) and he cannot in any capacity realize rent from the tenants."

On a proper appreciation of this part of the judgment of the learned Munsif it is obvious that he did go into the question of the title of the plaintiff as mortgagee to sue the defendants and that he gave his decision on that point adverse to the plaintiff. I am, however, invited to consider this part of the judgment of the learned Munsif as a decision on a point which was not before him, as the question of the title of the plaintiff as mortgagee was never raised in the pleadings. In other words, I am invited to hold that unless and until in the pleadings the issue is raised any decision given must be regarded as a decision that did not arise in the case. There would seem to be some force in this argument were it not that Order XIV, rule 3, of the Code of Civil Procedure clearly lays down that the Court may frame the issues from allegations made on oath by the parties or by any persons on their behalf or made by the Pleaders of such parties. I have endeavoured to find in this case whether the issue regarding the title of the plaintiff as mortgagee of Acchutanand was before the Court and whether the plaintiff had an opportunity to contest the defendants' denial of his title, as it appears it was denied in the judgment of the learned Munsif. With a view to this it was necessary to find from the judgment of the learned Munsif as to whether the consideration of this question of title was sprung upon the plaintiff, when the judgment was given. I find that this was not so, inasmuch as it is clearly laid down in the judgment of the learned Munsif that in the argument before him the plaintiff had full notice of the contention and that he had resisted the contention of the defendants on this point to the best of his ability. I have not the pleadings of that case before me, but taking the introductory part of the judgment to represent what the pleadings were it would appear that this part of the issue was framed, if not on the pleadings, at any rate on allegations of the two parties, namely, the plaintiff and the tenant-defendants in the case. In the circumstances I must hold that the issue on this point framed by the Munsif was an issue which covered the consideration of the question of the title of the plaintiff as mortgagee of Acchutanand. I also hold that the plaintiff was fully cognisant of the meaning of that issue. I also hold that in the argument on his behalf before the learned Munsif the point was gone into and that he contested the point to the best of his ability, and I also hold that after this contest the learned Munsif came to a clear decision adverse to the plaintiff.

These being the facts the question that arises now for consideration is as to whether the judgment in the present case given by the learned Subordinate Judge reversing the order of the Munsif of Aurangabad can be sustained.

The Munsif in this case held that the judgment in the previous case was res judicata and barred the claim set up by the plaintiff, Bansi Singh. In doing so I notice that the Munsif did not overlook the fact that the principal ground on which the former suit was resisted was the ground of non-registration of Bansi Singh's name. Having that point before his eyes the learned Munsif has carefully examined the question as to how far the decision of this particular issue in the former case would be a bar. In this connection it is also noticeable that the judgment given by the Munsif in the previous case was accepted by Bansi Singh sub silentio. If he realized after the judgment was given that the Munsif had in that case gone out of the scope of the case and delivered a judgment on a point which did not arise, it is expected that Bansi Singh should have taken some steps to remove such disability as might have been placed upon him by that judgment. Bansi Sing did not do so.

The question then is whether with reference to Bansi Singh and the tenant-defendants the doctrine of res judicata must be held to apply to this case. The learned Subordinate Judge in his judgment reversing the judgment of the Munsif in the present case says: "Now the law is that a finding can operate as res judicata only if it was 'directly and substantially in issue', was alleged by one party, and denied by another" and was raised and decided." "Now the question of validity or invalidity of the thika lease was never alleged or denied by any party in the previous suit it was never directly or even indirectly, or substantially in issue and it was raised by none, and the plaintiff had no opportunity of adducing evidence on the point or of meeting it."

For the reasons given above I am unable to agree with the view taken by the learned Subordinate Judge. As I have said, before this issue was raised or else it could not have been contested one as is apparent from the judgment of the learned Munsif, and I am unable to agree with the learned Subordinate Judge in regarding the decision of the Munsif in the previous case on the question of title as mortgagee as a mere obiter dictum. I, therefore, hold that on this point Bansi Singh's case is concluded by the doctrine of res judicata.

The learned Vakils appearing on behalf of Bansi Singh and Acchutanand have pressed before me the consideration that should it be held that the question of Bansi Singh's title is concluded by res judicata, then I should in that case hold in favour of plaintiff No. 2 Acchutanand. He admittedly was no party to the first suit. I am unable to accept this suggestion, for I look upon Acchutanand in this case as a person who does not appear to have been a bona fide plaintiff in the suit. It was not, as I have said before, till after Bansi Singh's case had closed and Acchutanand occupied the position of a defendant that he applied to be made a plaintiff in the case. It seems to me that the contest really has been between Bansi Singh on the one side and the tenant-defendants on the other. I am, therefore, unable to accept this suggestion.

I have also been asked to consider the question of the rent of 1321. It is urged that if the previous judgment is a bar by the doctrine of res judicata to the relief claimed by Bansi Singh, then that should be limited to the rent of 1319 to 1320 only and that I should allow Bansi Singh relief in respect of the rent of 1321. I do not agree with this view for the reason that the question of res judicata, as I have said before, is not limited to the consideration of Bansi Singh's title to receive rent for 1319 and 1320, rather it goes to the very root of his claim inasmuch as his title as mortgagee of Acchutanand has been rejected by the Munsif in the previous case.

The next point that has been placed before me on behalf of Bansi Singh is that it is not open to the tenant-defendants in this case to plead in defence to the claim set up by Bansi Singh that not he but somebody else is entitled to receive rent. This is advanced on the ground that Bansi Singh has been registered under the Land Registration Act of 1876 and I am asked to hold that section 60 of the Bengal Tenancy Act is an absolute bar to any plea set up by the tenant-defendants denying the right of Bansi Singh to realize rent because of the plea that rent is due to a third person. I do not sympathise with this suggestion, inasmuch as I am unable to think that section 60 of the Bengal Tenancy Act was intended to be of the effect which the learned Vakil on behalf of Bansi Singh invites me to give to it. A reading of that section clearly points out to me that it relates to cases of those who are proprietors, managers or mortgagees of an estate. In the present case the defendants deny the position of Bansi Singh as a mortgagee. Admittedly he is not a manager or a proprietor; if his position as a mortgagee had been admitted I could understand the application of section 60 of the Bengal Tenancy Act, but that has been denied and that very title in the previous case has been held to be not in Bansi Singh. In the circumstances section 60 of the Bengal Tenancy Act has no application to the present case. The decree given in this case by the learned Subordinate Judge must, therefore, be vacated and the order passed by the Munsif dismissing the suit be confirmed. The appeals are allowed with costs.

Registration Act (XVI of 1908), s. 17 (1) (b), (2) (xi)—Relinquishment of portion of mortgage debt, agreement for—Registration—'Interest,' meaning of.

An agreement by which a mortgagee agrees to relinquish a portion of the mortgage debt is one which 'purports to limit or extinguish interest' in immoveable property and requires registration. [p. 133, col. 2; p. 135, col. 2.]

Per Napier, J.—A receipt for money paid in discharge of a mortgage debt is an instrument which operates to extinguish the mortgage within the meaning of section 17 (b) of the Registration Act. Extinction by receipt applies to the right, title and interest and thereby makes the amount covered by the security an 'interest' within the meaning of clause (b). Where the effect of the document is to 'limit', the same meaning must be applied to the word 'interest' and it must be read as applying to the amount of money secured. [p. 135, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.

ABDUR RAHIM, J.—The only question we have to deal with in this appeal is whether Exhibit V, which is in these words, 'Now if you will pay Rs. 3,000 towards the debt due by you on the two documents we shall receive the money and return the documents,' is admissible in evidence having regard to the provisions of section 17 of the Registration Act.

On the date of Exhibit V more than Rs. 3,000 was due, and the balance which the plaintiff agreed to relinquish under Exhibit V amounted to more than Rs. 100. We do not think, though the question under consideration has been argued very elaborately before us, that the matter admits of any real doubt. Section 17, clause (b), says that "other non-testamentary instruments which purport or operate to create, declare, assign, limit or extinguish, whether in present or in future, any right, title or interest, whether vested or contingent, of the value of Rs. 100 and upwards, to or in immoveable property" must be registered. The exception which, it is argued, applies to Exhibit V is dealt with in clause (xi) of sub-section 2, which lays down that "any endorsement on a mortgage-deed acknowledging the payment of the whole or any part of the mortgage money, and any other receipt for payment of money due under a mortgage when the receipt does not purport to extinguish the mortgage" need not be registered. It seems to me that an agreement by which the mortgagee agrees to relinquish a portion of the debt is one which "purports to limit or extinguish interest in immoveable property". It was argued by the learned Vakil for the respondent that, in considering what the interest is, we are not to take into consideration the amount of money payable under the mortgage, but only the security apart from the amount due. Such a construction seems to be opposed to the language of the section, for in clause (b) the Legislature says that an instrument has to be registered if the interest or right affected by it is of the value of Rs. 100 or upwards. Now, that would indicate that the interest of a mortgagee cannot be computed without taking into consideration the amount for which the property is made security. Then, clause 11 of sub-section 2, in exempting from the operation of that clause receipts purporting to extinguish the mortgage, tends to support the same view. Though clause (c) was also referred to in the course of the argument I do not think that it has any application to this case. It seems to me, also, that the question is concluded by authority. In Abdullah Khan v. Basharat Hussain (1) the question arose with reference to an agreement come to between the mortgagee and the mortgagor as to the mode in which the profits of the property which was usufructuarily mortgaged were to be dealt with, and their Lordships of the Privy Council held that a document like that was inadmissible by reason of the provisions of the Registration Act.

It is difficult to see how that case can be distinguished from the present case. I take it that the rukka which introduced a new mode of paying off the mortgage money was held to be inadmissible, on the ground that it was an instrument purporting to limit or extinguish interest in immoveable property' within the meaning of clause (b) of section 17. In Durga Prasad Singh v. Rajendra Narayan Bagchi (2) their Lordships affirmed the judgment of the Calcutta High Court reported as Durga Prosad Singh v. Rajendra Narain Bagchi (3), in which it was held that a subsequent unregistered agreement for reduction of rent payable under a registered lease was inadmissible for want of registration.

In Tika Ram v. Deputy Commissioner of Bara Banki (4) the agreement which was held by the Judicial Committee to be inadmissible was on the part of the mortgagee to pay a higher rate of interest. It is difficult to understand how agreements of the above character could be substantially distinguished from the agreement in question in this case.

The exact point was decided in Gobardhan Sahi v. Jadunath Rai (5), where it was held that an "agreement executed by a mortgagee after the date of the mortgage whereby he relinquished a certain part of the principal and all interest, past and future, in the mortgage in lieu of certain services rendered by the mortgagor to the mortgagee was a document which required registration to make it admissible in evidence, and it could not be said to be an acknowledgment of payment within the meaning of the exception contained in section 17, clause (n), of the Indian Registration Act, 1877, which corresponds to clause 11 of sub-section 2 of the present Act.

On the other hand, Mr. Krishnaswami Ayyar for the respondent referred us to two cases, one of which is reported as Shidlingapa v. Chenbasapa (6). That was a case under the old Registration Act. The question raised there was whether certain receipts for payment of money were inadmissible for want of registration; and it was held that they were not. I do not think that this decision really throws much light upon the uestion we have to deal with here. There is a decision, however, in Kailash Chandra Nath v. Sheikh Chhenu (7) which does support the respondents' contention. The learned Judges say, "we can find nothing in the law or in any authority which would require such waiver to be registered," the waiver alluded to being that of the right to compound interest. We do not find that any of the decisions to which we have referred are alluded to in the judgment or in the summary of the arguments at the Bar. Nor does it appear from the judgment that section 17, clause (b), of the Registration Act was discussed, and the learned Judges refer only to section 92 of the Evidence Act which requires that such an agreement must be in writing.

I hold, therefore, that Exhibit V is inadmissible in evidence.

The appeal will be allowed with costs and there will be the usual mortgage decree for the full amount due under Exhibit H. Time for payment six months from the date of the decree.

NAPIER, J.—I entirely agree with my learned brother that this matter is covered by authority of the Privy Council. I would only add a few words on the construction of the section of the Act itself. It would hardly be possible to find words of wider import than we have in clause (b) of section 17, sub-section 1, of the Registration Act "which purport or operate to create, declare, assign, limit or extinguish, whether in present or in future, any right, title or interest." If words of that extremely wide character are not sufficient to cover a case where a mortgage debt is by agreement of parties largely reduced, it seems to me difficult to find words which will have that effect. Then there is this further reason, namely, that the language of the clause (b) actually imports into the consideration of the necessity for registration the question of the value of the interest, for it speaks of the right, title or interest being of the value of Rs. 100 and upwards, and it is a little difficult to see how, if no question with regard to the amount is, as argued by Mr. Krishnaswami Ayyar, a question "affecting any interest", the amount can be a test for limiting the application of the section. There is, to my mind, further, a complete answer to the argument to be found in the amendment introduced by the Act of 1886 and now incorporated in the present Act of 1908. The language of clause (b), as I have pointed out, contains the words 'limit or extinguish' and turning to sub-section 2 which is the amendment, we find this, "Nothing in clause (b) applies to" . . . . . then clause (xi) "any endorsement on a mortgage-deed acknowledging the payment of the whole or any part of the mortgage money, and any other receipt for payment of money due under a mortgage when the receipt does not purport to extinguish the mortgage."

Now here clearly we have a case of "extinction;" so a receipt for the money must be an instrument which operates to extinguish within the language of clause (b). The same meaning must, of course, be attached to the words "right title and interest" when you are dealing with the question of limitation as when you are dealing with the question of extinction, and if extinction by receipt applies to the right, title and interest and thereby makes the amount covered by the security an 'interest' within the meaning of that clause, it necessarily follows, it seems to me, that where the effect of the document is to 'limit', you must also apply the same meaning to the word 'interest' and read it as applying to the amount of money secured. One result of holding that the words 'limit or extinguish' the interest do not apply to words that limit the amount of money to be recovered in future would be that, whereas under this proviso "any other receipt for payment of money due under a mortgage" is only exempted from registration when it does not purport to extinguish the mortgage, if this view was to be upheld, that limitation and extinction do not apply to the amount of money, it would be absolutely immaterial whether a receipt for money did or did not purport to extinguish the mortgage, because on that reading of clause (b) the document itself would not be necessarily registrable under clause (b), so that that portion of sub-section 2, clause (xi) which takes such receipts out of the operation of clause (b) and also that part which leaves them within it would neither of them have any operation on the reading suggested by Mr. Krishnaswamy Ayyar, as there would be no 'interest' to be extinguished and so the whole of clause (xi) would be meaningless.

I am, therefore, clear that clause (b) must be given the meaning which the cases show has been applied to it, with the result that this agreement falls within its mischief.

The appeal must, therefore, be allowed, with the result as stated in my learned brother's judgment.

Appeal allowed.

MISCELLANEOUS FIRST CIVIL APPEAL No. 2782 OF 1915.

December 6, 1917.

Present:—Mr. Justice Shah Din and Mr. Justice Scott-Smith.

DEBI SAHAI—DEFENDANT—APPELLANT

TARA CHAND AND OTHERS—PLAINTIFFS—RESPONDENTS.

Partition—Decree for partition, effect of—Rights of co-sharers—Remand for fresh enquiry "so far as appellants are concerned"—Suit, whether can be dismissed in toto.

The property in suit belonged to three brothers one of whom N. alienated part of it and in 1903 another brother T. brought a suit against his co-sharers for his one-third share and joined the alienees also as defendants. This suit was decreed even against the alienees, two of whom preferred appeals which having been accepted, the case was remanded for fresh enquiry "so far as the appellants were concerned". After remand a final decree was passed by which the whole suit was dismissed. An application for execution of the first decree having been made, the widow of the third brother demanded her share of the property and sought relief against the alienees:

Held, (1) that the original decree stood as between the plaintiff and those defendants who did not appeal and could not be treated as having been set aside as a whole; [p. 137, col. 2.]

(2) that inasmuch as every co-sharer is entitled to obtain possession of the share allotted to him under a decree for partition, whether he be the plaintiff or the defendant, the widow of the third brother in this case being herself a defendant was entitled to take advantage of the decree passed in favour of the plaintiff and to claim a one-third share under it. [p. 137, col. 2.]

DEBI SAHAI v. TARA CHAND.

Miscellaneous first appeal from the order of the Subordinate Judge, 1st Class, Delhi, dated the 23rd April 1915, directing that the property in possession of the appellant be divided.

ORDER.

LeRossignol, J.—(March 3, 1917.)—The property in dispute originally belonged to the three sons of Lallu Misr. Nathu Parshad, one of the sons, alienated much of the joint property and in 1903 Tara Chand, another son, brought a suit against his co-sharers for his one-third share of the whole property, and he joined the alienees as defendants, among them appellant.

The decree of July 1905 which is the subsisting decree as between the parties decreed Tara Chand's claim even against the alienees, and in execution Musammat Bhuri, widow of the third son of Lallu Misr, also demands partition of her share and is seeking relief against the alienees thus attempting to take advantage of the decree favouring Tara Chand.

The case has become very complicated from the circumstance that two of the alienee-defendants Nos. 9 and 11 preferred appeals to this Court against the District Judge's decree of 28th July 1905 and this Court accepting those appeals remanded the case for fresh enquiry so far as the appellants were concerned. The final decree passed after that remand is that of Lala Damodar Das of 29th October 1907 by which he, apparently oblivious of the fact that this Court had accepted the appeal and ordered a fresh inquiry regarding the claims of only two of the alienees, dismissed the whole suit.

That decree, however, as the decree shows, is a decree between the plaintiff Tara Chand and defendants Nos. 9 and 11 only.

The result is that concerning this property of Lallu Misr we have two conflicting decrees, one holding that the private partition of 1898 between Nathu Parshad the plaintiff and Bhola Nath, sons of Lallu Misr, was bad and that plaintiff was entitled to one-third of the whole estate of his father even against the alienees, the other holding that the partition was valid and that plaintiff had no right to a share in the bulk of what had been allotted in the partition of 1898 to Nathu Parshad.

His share under that partition consisted of—

No. in list:—

1. Katra value Rs. 6,250 purchased by defendant No. 9.

2. Plot of land Idgah Kubna value Rs 600 purchased by defendent No. 11.

3. Nimwala house value Rs. 600 purchased by defendant No. 11.

13. Five plots Paharganj value Rs. 523 purchased by Shimbu Umrao Singh, who did not appeal.

Thus the practical effect of the appeal of defendants Nos. 9 and 11 was that the partition of 1898 was upheld.

This appeal is concerned with properties Nos. 4 and 7 which in the 1898 partition did fall to the share of Tara Chand and Bhola Nath, but which are now in the possession of Debi Sahai.

The points for decision are whether Debi Sahai who now holds properties Nos. 4 and 7 has a right to more than one-third in them and whether Bhuri the widow of Bhola Nath can claim her share in execution as against Debi Sahai.

Bhuri is now said to have contracted a liaison with Tara Chand. She never challenged the right of the alienees and I do not think that she can take advantage of Tara Chand's decree which comprised (1) a declaration, (2) an order for possession by partition.

The point is one on which I should like the opinion of another Judge. So I refer the case to a Division Bench. Early date.

Lala Moti Sagar, R. S., for the Appellant.

Dewan Mehr Chand, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The facts of the case out of which the present appeal arises appear sufficiently from the order of the lower Court and from that of LeRossignol, J., dated the 3rd March 1917, referring the case to a Division Bench, and from the judgment of Mr. Clifford, dated the 2nd November 1916, from whose decision Appeal No. 170 of 1917 has been lodged. The present judgment disposes of Civil Appeal No. 2782 of 1915 and Civil Appeal No. 170 of 1917.

The main point raised by Rai Moti Sagar in arguing Debi Sahai's Appeal No. 2782 of 1915 is that this Court by its order dated the 30th January 1907 in Civil Appeal No. 1178 of 1905 set aside the decree for partition in plaintiff's favour dated the 28th July 1905 as a whole and that consequently plaintiff's suit for partition was dismissed by Lala Damodar Das by his order of the 29th October 1907 and that, therefore, there is no subsisting decree in his favour which can be executed. This point does not appear to have been taken by Debi Sahai in the lower Court nor is it raised in the grounds of appeal, and in the circumstances we should not have been inclined to allow it to be raised in arguments before us, had it not been raised in Abdul Ahad's case from the decision of which Appeal No. 170 of 1917 has been instituted. Mr. Clifford by his order of the 2nd November 1916 has held that there is no subsisting decree in Tara Chand's favour which can be executed and, therefore, it it necessary for us to decide the point.

It is quite clear from the record that only those alienees who purchased in the insolvency proceedings the share in the family property which fell to Nathu Parshad in the partition of 1898 appealed to this Court. They were original defendants Nos. 9—11; the other defendants in the suit were apparently satisfied with the decree and did not appeal. The appellants in the appeal to this Court were obviously interested in maintaining the partition of 1898, for if it were maintained then their rights in the property bought by them would be preserved. They did appeal and their appeals were accepted, but this Court did not set aside the decree as a whole. It merely accepted the appeals before it and remanded the case to the lower Court for fresh inquiry so far as the various appellants were concerned. The case after remand came before Lala Damodar Das, who eventually held that the partition of 1898 was a fair one and dismissed the suit. The parties to that decree were those who had appealed to the Chief Court or their representatives-in-interest. It is, therefore, clear that the original decree of 1905 stood as between Tara Chand and those defendants who did not appeal. Under Order XLI, rule 4, Civil Procedure Code, the appellants might perhaps have appealed from the whole decree, but as a matter of fact they only appealed from so such of it as concerned that part of the property in which they were interested, and therefore the order of this Court only affected that part. We hold therefore, that there is no force in the objection that the decree of 1905 was set aside as a whole. On the contrary it is still subsisting and Mr. Clifford's order of the 2nd November 1916, therefore, cannot stand.

Musammat Bhuri was a defendant in the case and she like Tara Chand plaintiff is entitled to a one-third share. She has, therefore, been allotted a share in the partition proceedings. It was urged, however, that she could not take advantage of the decree which was passed in Tara Chand's favour. As regards this objection it is sufficient to refer to Wasdeo v. Rup Chand (1), in which it was laid down that "as a decree for partition is a joint declaration of the rights of all the co sharers interested in the property of which partition is sought, each co-sharer is entitled to obtain possession of the share allotted to him under the decree whether he may be the plaintiff or a defendant." Musammat Bhuri, therefore, is entitled to claim her share under the decree.

It was pointed out by Rai Moti Sagar that in 1905-06 the plaintiff mortgaged his one-third share in the whole property to Jangli Mal, though he knew at that time that the share allotted to Nathu Parshad in the partition of 1898 had been sold in insolvency proceedings. That is so, but we do not see how it affects the present dispute and Counsel was unable to show how it did so.

The next point urged is that the plaintiff was given a decree for one-third in every item of the joint property and that if certain items have disappeared he cannot have his share made up out of others as there was no provision of this sort in the decree. We are unable to accept this argument. If a partition decree be given for a share in a number of different joint properties, it is not necessary that a share in each and every item should be allotted to every co-sharer. It frequently happens that actual possession is given effect to and that co-sharers are allotted the property of which they have long been in possession, the shares of others being made up out of other items of the property. Thus when at the actual partition it is found that one co-sharer has alienated portions of the joint property, those portions are taken into consideration in the allotment of shares and the shares of other co-sharers are made up out of those portions of the property which have not been alienated. In the present case the share of Nathu Parshad, which was allotted to him at the partition of 1898, has been sold to certain persons in the insolvency proceedings and there is a decree binding on the plaintiff that the property thus sold cannot be touched. He is, therefore, entitled to have his one-third share made up out of other property and so is Musammat Bhuri. What the lower Court, therefore, has done is to allot the plaintiff and Musammat Bhuri each a half share in the rest of the property. There can be no doubt that this order is a perfectly equitable one, for the enquiry made by Lala Damodar Das shows that the share which Nathu Parshad got at the partition of 1898 was probably considerably more than an actual one-third share in the whole property. One-third of the property has been transferred to Debi Sahai appellant by mortgage and sale and the plaintiff has no claim thereto. Out of the remaining two-thirds, half has been allotted to Musammat Bhuri and one sixth to Tara Chand plaintiff. In this way the latter's half share is made up. We see no reason to interfere with the lower Court's order in Debi Sahai's case and we dismiss his appeal with costs.

Appeal No. 170 of 1917 is accepted and the order of Mr. Clifford being set aside, the case is remanded under Order XLI, rule 23, Civil Procedure Code, to the District Judge of Delhi for re-decision of the appeal in accordance with law. Stamp in this Court will be refunded and other costs will be costs in the case.

Appeal dismissed.

Probate and Administration Act (V of 1881), ss. 13, 23, 41—Object of Act—Letters of Administration, to whom may be granted—S. 41, applicability of.

The object of proceedings under the Probate and Administration Act is to determine only the question of representation of the deceased for the purpose of administering the estate, and not for the purpose of determining any question of inheritance. [p. 138, col. 2; p. 139, col. 1.]

Jagannath Prasad Gupta v. Runjit Singh, 25 C. 354 at p. 369, 13 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 237, followed.

Any decision on questions such as adoption in administration proceedings is not final and would not operate as res judicata in any subsequent suit in which the party dissatisfied with the decision might raise the same question. Held, that prima facie the sister was a person under section 23 of the Probate and Administration Act to whom Letters might be granted, but that even if she might as the result of litigation turn out to have no right to any part of the estate in consequence of the minor having been adopted with right of inheritance, she was a person to whom Letters of Administration might be granted under section 41 of the Act. [p. 139, col. 1.]

Mr. Ko Ko Gyi, for the Appellant.

Mr. Isral Khan, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This case illustrates the inconvenience which may be caused by a District Judge not bearing in mind the object of proceedings under the Probate and Administration Act.

A sister applied for Letters of Administration to the estate of her deceased brother. He had no children of his body, but the father of the minor respondent acting as her guardian set up that she had been adopted by the appellant's brother and his wife. The District Judge framed one issue, "was Ma Chit Saw the adopted daughter of U Nge and Ma Saung?"

He found in the affirmative and rejected the application.

There were debts due to the deceased, the documents relating to which were apparently in the appellant's possession. As matters stand no one can sue to recover those debts and some of them may have become barred by limitation.

As stated in Jagannath Prasad Gupta v. Runjit Singh (1), the object of proceedings under the Probate and Administration Act is to determine only the question of representation of the deceased for the purpose of administering the estate, and not for the purpose of determining any question of inheritance.

In Ma Tok v. Ma Thi (2) a Bench of this Court warned District Courts against entering into questions of adoption in proceedings under the Act, pointing out that the rulings up to that time were to the effect that any decision on such a question under the Act was not final and would not operate as res judicata in any subsequent suit in which the party dissatisfied with the decision might raise the same question.

The later case of Lalit Mohan Das v. Radha Raman Saha (3) is to the same effect.

A decision in such proceedings being practically ineffective, it is waste of time and labour to take evidence about the adoption.

The present case was a simple one. The applicant was admittedly a sister of the deceased, and nothing against her character was alleged.

Section 13 of the Act forbids Letters of Administration being granted to a minor, and there being no Will and consequently no residuary legatee, Letters could not have been granted to the guardian of the minor even if he had applied for them.

Prima facie the sister was a person under section 23 of Act to whom Letters might be granted, but even if she might as the result of litigation turn out to have no right to any part of the estate in consequence of the minor having been adopted with right of inheritance, she was a person to whom Letters of Administration might have been granted under section 41 of the Act.

The order of the District Judge is set aside. He will issue Letters to the applicant in the case on her filing the proper Court-fee and furnishing security. The respondent's guardian must pay the costs of the appellant on this appeal two gold mohurs allowed as Advocate's fee.

Appeal accepted.

NATIONAL INSURANCE AND BANKING COMPANY, LTD., IN LIQUIDATION—RESPONDENT.

Companies Act (VII of 1913), s. 246, r. 53, forms Nos. 34, 35—Liquidation—Call, order for · Procedure—Notice, form of.

Every application by the liquidators of a Company to the Court to make a call upon the contributories must be made by a petition, and notice in form No. 34 must be served four clear days before the date of the hearing on each contributory, unless the Judge directs that personal service be dispensed with and advertisement in form No. 35 be substituted therefor. Where the latter course is adopted, the contributories must be given sufficient time to appear and show cause against the order being made. [p. 140, col. 2; p. 141, col. 1.]

Miscellaneous first appeal from the order of the Adititonal Judge, Lahore, dated the 19th August 1916.

Mr. Nihal Chand, for the Appellant.

Mr. Herbert, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal and the connected Appeals Nos. 3120 and 3121 of 1916 are against an order of the Additional Judge, Lahore, dated the 19th August 1916, making a general call of Rs. 65 per share on the contributories of the National Insurance and Banking Company, Limited, now being wound up subject to the supervision of the Court, and may be disposed of by one judgment. I have listened to elaborate arguments advanced by the learned Pleaders for the appellants and to the reply made by the learned Advocate for the liquidators, and reached the conclusion that the procedure adopted by the lower Court does not comply with the requirements of the law in essential particulars and that the order in question must be set aside.

It will be observed that a call of Rs. 35 per share was made before the commencement of the winding up, and that the proposed call of Rs. 65, which represents the maximum amount remaining unpaid on the shares, would bring in a sum of six and a half lacs of rupees, if all the contributories meet the demand made upon them. The magnitude of the claim made by the liquidators and the fact that a very large number of persons resident in various Provinces of India are affected thereby emphasize the necessity of strict compliance with the provisions of the Indian Companies Act, VII of 1913, and the rules framed thereunder and of a careful scrutiny of the assets and the liabilities of the Company.

Now, what are the facts and circumstances of the present case? It appears that on the 4th of August 1916, the liquidators placed before the Additional Judge an affidavit with a brief schedule showing the estimated assets and liabilities, and that the latter thereupon signed a copy of a notice in form No. 34 calling upon the contributories to attend the Court on the 19th August, fixed for the hearing of "an application" on the part of the liquidators that a call to the extent of Rs. 65 per share should be made upon all the contributories of the Company. The liquidators did not, however, serve the notice on each contributory affected by such call as required by rule 53, but instead published it in some of the newspapers. Realising the mistake one of the liquidators wrote on the 12th of August a letter to the Judge asking him to sign an advertisement in form No. 35 and stating that he (liquidator) intended to publish it in certain newspapers, but not in the Punjab Gazette "inasmuch as the next issue would be published on the 18th instant and would thus not give the period of advertisement prescribed in rule 53." Upon this letter there is an order of the Court, dated 15th August 1916, in the following terms:—"Signed and returned." The liquidators then published a notice in form No. 35 by advertisement in newspapers, and the copies of the "Tribune" and the "Desh," dated the 15th August, containing the said advertisement have been placed upon the record to prove the publication of the notice. On the 19th August the order appealed against was passed requiring the contributories to pay Rs. 65 to the liquidators in respect of each share held by them.

Now, a perusal of rule 53 leaves no doubt whatever that every application to the Court to make a call upon the contributories must be made by a petition, and it is clear that no such petition was ever presented in this case. Mr. Herbert feeling this difficulty has asked me to regard the affidavit made by one of the liquidators as a petition, but I cannot accede to this suggestion. The document may supply the evidence necessary to establish a case for a call, but cannot take the place of the petition referred to in the rule. In fact the form prescribed for a general order for a call (vide form No. 36) clearly contemplates both an application and an affidavit; and the learned Judge himself refers in his order making the call not only to an affidavit but also to an application, though it is beyond doubt that no application in accordance with rule 53 was ever presented to him. Further, the law requires that every petition to the Court must bear a Court-fee stamp, unless an exemption can be claimed under the provisions of the Court Fees Act; and it is manifest that the affidavit in question does not satisfy this test.

There can be little doubt that the very foundation for making an order for a general call does not exist in this case and the superstructure must, therefore, fall to the ground. But the matter does not rest here. It is admitted by Mr. Herbert that rule 53 requires notice in form No. 34 to be served four clear days before the date of the hearing on each contributory, unless the Judge directs that the personal service be dispensed with and advertisement in form No. 35 be substituted therefor. Upon the record there is no indication of this direction and as observed already, the only thing we find in this connection is a typed notice in form No. 34 signed by the Judge on the 4th of August and the letter of the liquidator, dated 12th August, bearing the order "signed and returned" followed by the initials of the Presiding Officer of the Court. It may be that this was a fit case for substituted service, but there is nothing to show that the Court applied its mind to the matter and gave the direction dispensing with personal service.

The result is that personal service has not been effected, and that the notice in form No. 35 prescribed for public notification was published for the first time in the "Tribune" and the "Desh" on the 15th August. It is alleged, and the allegation has not been challenged by the respondents, that a large number of the contributories reside in Burma, Bengal, Bihar and Orissa and other Provinces; and it was physically impossible for many of them to come to Lahore in response to the general notice and show cause on the 19th August. This fact has been strongly relied upon by the appellants, and has not been seriously contested by the respondents.

The appellants have also urged inter alia that the assets are sufficient to meet the liabilities; that the liquidators have made no real effort to realise either the arrears of calls (about Rs. 1,65,037) made before the winding up or the large sums of money due from the debtors of the Company; and that they have improperly spent money in defending P. L. Rajpal, the late Managing Director of the Company, and have incurred very heavy expenditure on establishment, etc. These and other matters to which my attention has been drawn have an important bearing upon the question whether a call should be made, and, if so, to what extent; and they will, no doubt, receive due consideration from the Additional Judge.

In view of the fact that the proceedings taken so far are wholly defective and that the contributories, who have not been afforded any opportunity to show cause against the grant of the liquidators' prayer, have been materially prejudiced, I am of opinion that the proper course to adopt is to quash the proceedings and refrain from making a pronouncement upon the merits of the matters relating to assets and liabilities.

For the aforesaid reasons I accept the appeal and quash the order of the lower Court making a call upon the contributories. This decision will not debar the liquidators from making a proper application to the Court for the exercise of its functions. The respondent must pay the costs incurred by the appellants in both the Courts.

Appeal accepted.

Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 182 (2)—Partition suit—Consent decree by High Court, directing valuation—Supplementary decree by trial Court, set aside—Execution—Limitation, commencement of.

In a partition suit the High Court on appeal passed a consent decree directing that the plaintiff do pay to the defendant the price to be ascertained by the Court of first instance within one month from the date of the valuation being made, and upon such payment being made the defendant do convey her share to the plaintiff. The case then went back to the Court of first instance, which made the valuation and passed a supplementary decree in the terms of the High Court decree. On revision the High Court held that no supplementary decree should have been passed and that the only decree in the case was the consent decree passed by the High Court. The defendant then applied for execution of the decree offering to execute the conveyance and agreeing to recover from the plaintiff as much as she could out of the valuation fixed by the Court of first instance:

Held, (1) that the decree was capable of execution; [p. 142, col. 1.]

(2) that limitation under Article 182 (2), Schedule I, of the Limitation Act began to run from the date on which the High Court set aside the supplementary decree passed by the Court of first instance. [p. 142, col. 2.]

Appeal against the order of the Subordinate Judge, at Alipur, of 24-Perganahs, dated the 25th of March 1912.

Dr. Rash Behary Ghosh and Babu Monmotha Nath Mookerjee, for the Appellant.

Mr. S. R. Das, Dr. D. N. Mitter and Babu Baikuntha Nath Mitra, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—At the hearing of an appeal from an original decree in a partition suit the dispute between the parties was settled by the plaintiffs agreeing to purchase the share of the defendant No. 1, at a price to be fixed by the Court of first instance. By consent of parties a decree was made to the following effect:—"The plaintiffs do pay to the defendant No. 1 the price so ascertained within one month from the date of the valuation being made and upon such payment being made the defendant No. 1 do convey her share to the plaintiff." This order was made on the 4th of June 1903 in this Court. The case then went back to the Subordinate Judge, who fixed the value at Rs. 26,290 and on the 12th of December 1905 passed a supplementary decree directing the plaintiffs to pay that amount and the defendant No. 1 to execute a conveyance. There was an appeal to this Court and it was held that no appeal lay as no supplementary decree should have been passed and that the only decree in the case was the decree of the High Court, dated the 4th of June 1903, which became capable of execution one month after the making of the valuation. This order was passed on the 14th of June 1909. The defendant No. 1 then applied for the execution of the decree on the 23rd of August 1911, and was opposed by the plaintiffs who contended, first, that the decree was incapable of execution, and secondly, that it was barred by limitation.

As regards the first point it was argued that when the plaintiff failed to make the payment, the defendant could not force them to take a conveyance as there was no such direction in the decree and if the full amount could not be realized from them the defendant could not be forced to execute a conveyance for any lesser amount that could be realized. They contended that the defendants must bring a fresh suit for the specific performance of the contract embodied in the consent decree. The contract having been embodied in the decree the defendant could perhaps have brought a suit on the basis of the decree. In such a suit he would have to offer to make the conveyance for the amount of value fixed, for which he could only obtain a money decree which he might or might not succeed in fully realizing. That would not improve his position in any degree or that of the respondents. As he offers to make a conveyance and takes the risk of realising what he can from the plaintiffs, we do not see the necessity of a fresh suit on the decree. The consent decree supplemented by the valuation is quite sufficient as a decree which would give the same remedy to the defendant without going through the circuit of a fresh suit. The learned Vakil who represented the defendant in the Court below did not give an undertaking to make the conveyance for whatever he could realize from the plaintiffs, but the learned Vakil who represents him here has intimated to us the readiness of his client to execute the conveyance and realize the value or whatever portion of it he could from the plaintiffs. We think this is a reasonable solution of the difficulty raised by the first objection.

As regards limitation it is contended that the application should have been made within 3 years from the 12th of January 1905, i. e., one month after the valuation made by the supplementary decree. It is contended that as the High Court held that the decree appealed against ought not to have been passed and interfered by way of revision, Article 182, clause 2, of the First Schedule to the Limitation Act has no application, and reliance is placed on the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of Batuk Nath v. Munni Dei (1), There the appeal was filed but not prosecuted and by the rules of the Privy Council the appeal stood dismissed without any order to that effect. There was, therefore, no order of the Appellate Court to commence the counting of limitation from. Here there was an appeal as well as an order of the Appellate Court which terminated the existence of the appeal. In the case of Akshoy Kumar Nundi v. Chunder Mohun Chathati (2) it was held that the clause applied even if the appeal was rejected as filed out of time. In the case of Wazir Mahton v. Lulit Sing (3) it was held that the clause would apply even if the appeal was rejected as incompetent. In this case the appeal was filed by the plaintiffs mainly on the question of valuation and after contest was rejected as incompetent, but an order was made which superseded the decree of the Court below.

We think the application was within time.

In this view of the case we allow the appeal and direct the Court below to proceed with the execution upon the defendant executing a conveyance of his share as agreed and binding himself to be satisfied with whatever part of the value

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No. 1047 OF 1917.

Present:—Mr. Justice Roe.
Mahanth MUKHLAL GIR—PLAINTIFF APPELLANT

Court Fees Act (VII of 1887), s. 17, applicability of —Alternative reliefs—Court-fees payable.

Section 17 of the Court Fees Act applies to cases in which two different reliefs may be applied simultaneously to the wrong done to the plaintiff; it does not apply to cases where alternative reliefs are asked for. Where alternative reliefs are sought Court-fee must be paid on the relief which appears to be of the higher value.

FACTS.—Defendant No. 2 mortgaged his property to defendant No. 3 in 1898. On the basis of the mortgage a decree was obtained in 1902 which was assigned to the plaintiff in 1906. The plaintiff executed the decree, purchased the property himself and obtained delivery of possession. Subsequently he applied for registration of his name, but his application was opposed by defendant No. 1 on the allegation that he was in possession by virtue of an earlier mortgage of 1897 executed by the defendant No. 2 in his favour upon which he had obtained a decree, in execution whereof he had purchased the property for Rs. 90. The plaintiff's application for registration of his name was, therefore, refused. The plaintiff thereupon brought the present suit for possession of the property and for mesne profits after a declaration that he was the purchaser of the property and was thus entitled to it. In the alternative the plaintiff sued for redemption of the property on payment of Rs. 90. The suit was valued at Rs. 90 for purposes of jurisdiction but the Court-fee was paid only on ten times the Government Revenue. The plaintiff's suit was dismissed by both the Courts below and he preferred a second appeal. The Stamp Reporter relying on Musammat Fatima Begam v. Muhammad Zakaria (1) and Hashmat-un-Nissa Begam v. Muhammad Abdul Karim (2) submitted that the two alternative reliefs claimed by the plaintiffs were two distinct subjects within the meaning of section 17 of the Court Fees Act, and that plaintiff, therefore, should have paid Court-fees on Rs. 90, the greater of the two reliefs claimed.

The Taxing Officer agreed with the Stamp Reporter but thinking it to be an important matter referred it to the Taxing Judge for order.

Mr. Baikunth Nath Mitra, for the Appellant.

JUDGMENT.—Section 17 applies to cases in which two different reliefs may be applied simultaneously to the wrong done to the plaintiff; it does not apply to cases in which alternative reliefs are asked for. Where alternative reliefs are sought a Court fee must be paid on the relief which appears to be of the higher value, in this case the amount for which the appellant seeks to redeem the property.

Order accordingly.

MAHAMED AMIR—INSOLVENT—RESPONDENT.

Insolvency proceedings—Court, power of, to hold summary proceedings for discovering properties of insolvent—Creditor, remedy of, where insolvent conceals property.

The Provincial Insolvency Act contains no section corresponding to section 27 of the Bankruptcy Act. An Insolvency Court has, therefore, no jurisdiction to hold summary proceedings for the purpose of summoning before it and examining persons in order to discover whether any portion of the insolvent's property has been concealed by him by having vested it in a benamdar and thereupon directing the benamdar to transfer to the Official Receiver the property so vested in him,

When a scheduled creditor in an insolvency proceeding has a prima facie case that a portion of the insolvent's property has been concealed by the insolvent by having vested it in a benamdar, his remedy is to apply to the Court to direct the Official Receiver to institute a suit against the benamdar to recover the property in question on condition that the creditor so applying shall put the Official Receiver in funds and properly indemnify him against the costs in the suit. Babus Sarat Chandra Basak and Bepin Chandra Bose, for the Appellant.

Babu Rupendra Lal Roy, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

FLETCHER, J.—This is an appeal by a scheduled creditor in an insolvency proceeding. The appeal is preferred against an order made by the learned District Judge in whose Court the insolvency proceedings are pending refusing to examine certain persons and the insolvent and his wife with reference to a portion of the property of the insolvent, which is alleged to have been concealed by the insolvent by having vested the same in the name of his wife. The case has been argued before us that the Court must have inherent jurisdiction to hold summary proceedings which section 27 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1883 authorizes—to which there is a corresponding section in the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act. We cannot assume that any such summary powers are given. The case must turn on the sections of the Act itself. The Provincial Insolvency Act contains no section corresponding to section 27 of the Bankruptcy Act. The Court has, therefore, as the learned Judge remarks, no jurisdiction to summon before it the wife of the insolvent and to examine her and direct her to transfer to the Official Receiver the property vested in her name, if it proves to be the property of the insolvent. The learned Judge's order that this is not a proper proceeding is right. But the course that he has suggested that the appellant should adopt is not accurate. His view is that the appellant can maintain a suit to recover the property. It is quite clear that he cannot. The usual order that is made in a case of this nature is that the creditor should apply to the Court to direct the Official Receiver to institute and continue a suit against the wife of the insolvent to recover the property in question, making it a condition precedent that the creditor so applying that the Official Receiver shall institute such a suit does put the Official Receiver in funds and properly indemnifies him against the costs in the suit. That is obviously the proper course for the appellant to take. He must apply to the learned District Judge, if he has a prima facie case, as the report of the Official Receiver suggests that there is a prima facie case, that the Official Receiver be directed to institute a suit against the wife of the insolvent on these terms namely, that the creditor should put the Official Receiver in funds and indemnify him against the costs of the suit, and if he fulfils those conditions, the Official Receiver should bring a suit to recover this property from the wife of the insolvent. The suggestion that this can be done in the course of the insolvency proceedings by a summary proceeding is not supported by the terms of the sections of the Provincial Insolvency Act. The present appeal, therefore, so far as the main question, is concerned, must stand dismissed. As I have already stated, the creditor is entitled to make that application to the learned Judge with reference to a suit being instituted by the Official Receiver for recovery of this property. As the respondent is an insolvent and is supposed not to have any money except the tools necessary to carry on his trade and the necessary bedding and clothing for himself and his family, although he is quite able to indulge in engaging eminent lawyers to conduct his case, we do not make any provision for the costs of this appeal.

CHATTERJEA, J.—I agree.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O XLIII, r. 1 (m), O. XII, r. 6, O. XXIII, r. 3—Appeal from order rejecting petition asking for judgment and decree on defendants' admission, maintainability of.

Orders rejecting separate petitions filed by the plaintiff and the defendants, by which the plaintiff prays for judgment and decree against the defendants and the defendants state that they consent to a decree being made against them, are not appealable under the Civil Procedure Code, unless such petitions are presented and dealt with in the Court on the footing that they taken together amount to a lawful agreement or compromise within the meaning of rule 3 of Order XXIII, Civil Procedure Code. [p. 146, col. 1.]

Appeal against the order of the Subordinate Judge, Darjeeling, dated the 18th May 1917.

FACTS material to the report are as follows:—

The plaintiff instituted a suit for the ejectment of the defendants on the ground that their tenancy had been determined by a notice to quit. The defendants admitted the plaintiff's claim in full and consented to a decree being passed against them. In the meantime a Receiver was appointed to the estate of the defendants in a certain mortgage suit against them; that Receiver made an application to be made a party to the present suit and that application was subsequently granted. Before any order, however, had been passed by the Court on the application of the Receiver, two petitions were separately filed by the plaintiff and the defendants and the Court rejected both of them. The two petitions and the Court's order are given below:—

"The humble petition of the plaintiff above named ... ...

Showeth:—

(1). That according to admission of facts made by the defendants to-day, the petitioner is entitled to judgment in his favour at once.

(2). That the defendants have admitted in full the plaintiff's claim in the suit.

The petitioner prays for a judgment and decree in full with costs being passed in his favour to-day, the defendants having also consented to such judgment and decree practically. And the petitioner shall, as in duty bound, ever pray.

Darjeeling.

The 18th May 1917."

"The petition is filed after my order to put up written statement on date fixed. It appears to be a mere trick to get judgment before the application for the appointment of a Receiver in S. J. Suit No. 10 of 1916 has been heard. That application has been fixed for to-morrow and the defendant in this suit (Darpa Narayan) admits that he has received the application to show cause. Order II, rule 6, permits the Court a discretion and I am of opinion that it would not be just to pass judgment in this suit to-day.

L. Burrows, Sub-Judge, Darjeeling.
May 18th, 1917."

"The humble petition of the defendants Nos. 1 and 2 above named ... ...

Most respectfully showeth:—

(1). That according to the written statement filed to-day by the petitioners in the aforesaid suit, they consent to a decree being passed against them with costs to-day in favour of the plaintiff in this suit.

And your petitioners as in duty bound shall ever pray.

Darjeeling.

The 18th May 1917."

"This petition is filed on my ordering the written statement to be put up on the date fixed for its filing, i.e., 21st May 1917. I do not intend to take any action on it for the reasons stated in my order on the similar petition filed by the plaintiff. I may add that to-morrow (19th May 1917) was deliberately fixed for the hearing of the application in S. J. Suit No. 10 of 1916 regarding a Receiver, in order that that application might be heard before this suit came on for hearing. It appears to me therefore that this attempt to obtain judgment to-day is an attempt to defeat the ends of justice.

L. Burrows, Sub-Judge, Darjeeling.
The 18th May 1917."

Babus Dawarka Nath Chakrabuty and Upendralal Roy, for the Appellant.

Mr. S. N. Banerjee and Babu Tara Keshor Pal Chowdhury, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal from two orders of the Subordinate Judge of Darjeeling both dated the 18th May 1917. It appears that the suit in which these orders were made was instituted by the plaintiff, the appellant before us, on the 23rd April 1917, to eject the defendants from certain lands on the footing that having been tenants under the plaintiff their tenancy had been determined by a notice to quit. On the 18th May 1917 the defendants filed written statements by which they confessed judgment. It further appears that the same defendants were the mortgagor defendants in a suit previously instituted by the mortgagee on his mortgage in 1916. In that suit the question arose whether a Receiver of the property should be appointed, a question which was decided in the affirmative. In the present suit, an application was made on behalf of the Receiver on the 21st May 1917, that he should be added as a party defendant. Meanwhile on the 18th May 1917, the day on which the written statement was filed, the plaintiff and the defendants in this suit filed separate petitions by which the plaintiff prayed for judgment and decree against the defendants and the defendants stated that they consented to a decree being made against them. The present appeal is from the orders made on those petitions, and a preliminary objection is taken that these orders rejecting the petitions are not orders from which an appeal lies under the Code of Civil Procedure. It is suggested on behalf of the appellant that the petitions taken together amount to a lawful agreement or compromise within the meaning of rule 3 of Order XXIII. In the Court below, however, the matter does not appear to have been presented or dealt with on that basis. The learned Subordinate Judge in one of the orders in question referred to rule 6 of Order XII, and in our opinion the substance of the matter is merely this, that the learned Subordinate Judge was moved by the parties to make a decree on the footing that the defendants had admitted the facts stated in the plaint and confessed judgment. In that view of the matter no appeal lies and this appeal must be dismissed with costs. We assess the hearing fee at 2 gold mohurs. The costs of the paper-book prepared by the respondents will be borne by the appellant after being assessed by the office.

Appeal dismissed.

According to the Mithila School of Hindu Law a paternal grandmother is entitled to a share on partition of the joint property between her son and grandson. Such share, however, is not her stridhan and on her death goes back to the estate from which it came. [p. 149, col. 2; p. 150, col. 1.]

The mother or grandmother's share on partition is taken in lieu of maintenance and on her death reverts to the general estate and does not cease to be ancestral property. [p. 150, col. 1.]

The institution of a suit for partition of joint family property is a sufficient indication to separate, so that the birth of a member subsequent to the institution of the suit does not affect the share which the plaintiff is entitled to receive. [p. 150, col. 1.]

A minor can either himself or through his guardian express an intention to do that which is clearly not against his own interest. The institution of a suit by a minor member of a joint Hindu family for partition of the family property may, therefore, amount to the indication of an intention to separate. [p. 151, col. 1.]

The decisions of the Calcutta High Court, which until recently exercised jurisdiction in the Province of Bihar and Orissa, although they do not prevent the Patna High Court from exercising an independent judgment, are entitled to the greatest respect and should not be departed from without cogent reasons. Messrs. Soroshi Charan Mittra and Murari Prashad, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the District Judge of Darbhanga in a suit for partition brought by one of the members of a joint Hindu family governed by the Mithila School of Law. The family consisted of Krishna Lal Jha, his mother Girija Ojhain, his two wives Jaimangla Ojhain and Aina Ojhain and his son Nandeshwar Jha by his first wife Jaimangla. The suit was instituted on the 11th August 1913 by the son Nandeshwar Jha against his father and the other members of the family as defendants. At that time the plaintiff was a minor and in his plaint made certain charges against his father of mismanagement of the family property and preferential treatment of his step-mother to the detriment of himself and his mother Jaimangla. Since the institution of the suit and before the date of the judgment appealed from the plaintiff attained his majority and those charges then ceased to be material and were not dealt with in the judgment. The plaintiff claimed an eight-annas share in the family property. The defendants, the father, step-mother and grandmother of the plaintiff, opposed the partition and each claimed in the event of partition one-fifth part as their respective shares. The defendant the mother of the plaintiff supported the partition and claimed one-fourth part as her share. The plaintiff's father also claimed that several of the properties set out in the schedule were his self-acquired property and not part of the family estate. Judgment was delivered in the Court below on the 4th August 1915. The learned District Judge decided that each of the members of the family including the plaintiff's grandmother Girija was entitled to one-fifth share and that the properties claimed by Krishna Lal Jha the plaintiff's father were not his separate property but formed part of the family estate. From this decision the defendant Krishna Lal Jha presented an appeal on the 2nd September 1915, on the ground that the properties claimed by him were wrongly found to have been joint family property. The plaintiff entered a cross-appeal on the 10th November 1915, on the ground that his mother and step-mother were wrongly awarded a share and that his grandmother should have been allowed maintenance only and further that proper directions were not given either for ascertaining the properties which might be ascertained to be liable to partition before passing the final decree or for taking accounts.

Since the date of the judgment now under appeal two events have happened which complicate the issues between the parties and the final adjustment of their rights. On the 21st November 1915 a son was born to Aina Ojhain the plaintiff's step-mother and on the 5th August 1916 Girija Ojhain his grandmother died. It was agreed between the parties that these events should be taken into consideration by this Court and that the legal consequences resulting therefrom, in so far as they affect the shares which the parties are now entitled to, should be determined and given effect to in our judgment.

The points argued by the defendant were (1) that on the evidence the Judge wrongly decided that the properties claimed by him in schedule kha of his written statement were joint family property; (2) that he was entitled to succeed by inheritance to his dead mother's one-fifth share apportioned to her by the judgment, on the ground that it devolved on him as her stridhan property to which he was sole heir or as her deceased husband's property of which he was also heir; (3) that the after-born son of his wife Aina Ojhain was entitled to a share, he having been conceived before the partition took place though born afterwards.

The plaintiff contended (1) that his grandmother was not entitled to a share at all according to the Mithila Law on a partition between her son and grandson and that in any case the grandmother's share, if any, was not her stridhan but family property allotted to her by way of maintenance and after her death went back to the estate and was divisible in equal shares amongst the co-parceners; (2) that the after-born son was not entitled to a share, on the ground that the partition must be regarded as taking place not later than the 11th August 1913 when the plaint was filed and the son was not born until more than two years later.

The point that his mother and step-mother were not entitled to share under the Mithila Law was not pressed.

As to the question of fact whether the disputed property belonged to the defendant, we have been referred to the evidence and the learned Judge's reasons for the findings at which he arrived and we have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that those findings were amply justified. There were no separate accounts of the alleged self acquired property produced, nor is there any reliable evidence to show how the defendant could have himself acquired the funds necessary to purchase properties worth nearly Rs. 24,000 except by recourse to the ancestral property. On the other hand, there is evidence from which the inference is almost irresistible that the family funds were employed in paying for the properties claimed. This part of the appeal must, in our opinion, fail.

The next question is whether Girija Ojhain the grandmother of the plaintiff and mother of the defendant Krishna Lal Jha was entitled to a share on partition. Upon this point divergent views have been expressed by the High Courts of Calcutta and Allahabad, The decisions of the Calcutta High Court which until recently exercised jurisdiction in this Province, although they do not prevent this Court from exercising an independent judgment, are entitled to the greatest respect and should not be departed from without cogent reason. In Badri Roy v. Bhugwat Narain Dobey (1) it was decided by Mitter and Maclean, JJ., that in a partition between a father and son at the instance of the son both the mother of the latter and his paternal grandmother were entitled to share equally with him and his father. That was a case of a Mitakshara family and the Mitakshara together with the Vivada Ratnakara and the Vivada Chintamani is the leading authority recognised by the Mithila School. In the case of Sheo Narain v. Janki Parshad (2) a Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court on the other hand held that in a partition between a father and his sons the father's mother is not entitled to a share according to the Benares School of the Mitakshara Law. The latter case appears to be based mainly upon the consideration that whilst the author of the Mitakshara expressly recognises the right of the wife of the father to share equally with the sons when distribution is made during the lifetime of the father no mention is made of the father's mother, although after the father's death, if the sons separate, the mother is mentioned as entitled to an equal share with the sons. The passage relied on is found in section VIII of the Mitakshara and reads as follows in Colebrooke's translation:—"When a distribution is made during the life of the father the participation of his wives, equally with his sons, has been directed." (If he make the allotments equal his wives must be rendered partakers of like portions). The author now proceeds to declare their equal participation when the separation takes place after the demise of the father: "Of heirs dividing after the death of the father let the mother also take an equal share." It seems fairly clear that Vijnaneswara in the passage just referred to is considering the claim of the same person, first, as a wife of the head of a joint family when a partition takes place and secondly, as the widow of the late head of the family when the sons themselves are seeking separation, and in either case she is awarded a share equal to that of a son. In the case now under appeal if the defendant Krishna Lal Jha had had a brother alive and unseparated from him, it would appear that on a partition taking place between them their mother would be entitled to share with them the ancestral property, they being "the heirs dividing after the death of the father", in which case the Mitakshara provides "let the mother also take an equal share". The fact that either or each of the brothers had issue living would not, we apprehend, affect the rights of the mother although in such a case she might with equal accuracy be described as a grandmother concerning whom the Mitakshara is silent. How then ought her claim to be considered when the partition takes place, not between her sons as heirs of her deceased husband, but between her only son who is undoubtedly an heir and her grandson? On referring to the text of Yajnawalkaya it also appears that where the father in his lifetime makes an equal distribution among his sons, his wives to whom no stridhan has been allotted take like portions and where after his death the sons separate their mother takes a share equal to that of a son. Separation between a father and an only son does not appear to be contemplated by Yajnawalkaya nor is it in terms referred to in the text of the Mitakshara. It is not improbable that at the time when the Mitakshara was written a partition between a father and an only son at the instance of the latter was seldom if ever resorted to. However this may be, the propriety of such a proceeding could hardly be challenged at the present day. It is not easy to see on what principle of justice or equity the mother of an only son on a partition between him and his heirs should be excluded, when if two or more of her sons as co parceners were dividing the family property she would be entitled to share equally with them. It was argued as a reason for leaving her unprovided that her maintenance should properly fall after partition as a charge upon her son's share. This argument appears to us to have little to recommend it. Before partition he would have control of the whole of the family property from which to provide for his mother's maintenance. After partition that control would cease and his resources would be limited in proportion to the number of sharers with whom he divided. It could be urged with equal force that on partition between sons after the death of a father the mother should have no portion as her maintenance should fall on the eldest son or any other, but in such a case she is in fact allotted a full share equal to that of her sons. But as the Mitakshara makes no express provision for the case now under consideration, we should have some difficulty in coming to a decision not expressly authorised by the great commentator if the Mitakshara were the only authority recognised by the Mithila School. The Vivada Ratnakara and the Vivada Chintamani, which are authorities of at least equal weight amongst the followers of the Mithila School, both quote a text of Vyasa which says: "But the sonless wives of the father are pronounced equal sharers and all grandmothers also are pronounced equal to mother". The above quotation occurs in Chapter IV 31 of Golapchandra Sarkar's translation of the Vivada Ratnakara. In Tagore's translation of the Vivada Chintamani the passage is rendered: "Even childless wives of the father are pronounced equal sharers and so are all the paternal grandmothers who are declared equal to mothers". It has been argued before us that the quotation from Vyasa should be treated as applying only to cases of partition amongst brothers, as in the Vivada Ratnakara it occurs in a Chapter dealing with partition among brothers and in Vivada Chintamani it forms one of the paragraphs under the heading "grandsons of different fathers." We can see no reason for so restricting its application and we are supported in this view by the decision of the Calcutta High Court in the case of Badri Roy v. Rhugwat Narain Dobey (1) already referred to. If we are right in supposing that in Vijnaneswara's day a separation between a father and an only son was not an established practice, this may account for the fact that no mention is made in the Mitakshara of the father's mother in such a case. It would not, however, account for the case of a separated brother as the head of a new line of descent partitioning with his sons in the lifetime of his mother. But such a case ex hypothesi supposes an earlier separation between the present head of the family and his brothers, in which case his mother would have already been provided for by her share in the earlier partition. There is no evidence that the grandmother had been so provided for in the present case. This does not exhaust all possible cases where the question could arise, but other cases would necessarily be of rare occurrence. In any case the claim of the grandmother is distinctly recognised in two out of three of the leading authorities governing the Mithila School and although we have great hesitation in view of the Full Bench decision of the Allahabad High Court in arriving at a conclusion in favour of the grandmother's claim, we think that such a claim should be recognised amongst those governed by the Mithila Law.

The next question for consideration is whether the share allotted to the plaintiff's grandmother on partition is to be regarded as her stridhan and if not, how it should now be dealt with. If it constitutes her stridhan, there being no daughter or other nearer heir in the line of inheritance applicable to such property, her son the defendant Krishna Lal Jha would succeed. In Debi Mangal Prosad Singh v. Mahadeo Prasad Singh (3) it was decided by the Judicial Committee that the share which the mother in a joint Hindu family governed by the Mitakshara Law obtains on partition of the family property is not her stridhan and on her death does not devolve upon her stridhan heirs but goes back to the estate from which it came. It is sufficient to say that in our opinion that case is not distinguishable from the present.

A further point was taken but not pressed that the defendant Krishna Lal Jha was entitled to the whole share of his deceased mother to the exclusion of the other co-sharers, on the ground that it reverted to him as the heir of her deceased husband and that a partition having been effected before the mother's death the other co-sharers ceased to have any interest in the property. We think the proper view is that the mother's share is taken in lieu of maintenance and on her death reverts to the general estate and does not cease to be ancestral property. Moreover in the present case the partition has not been finally carried out, the decree being a preliminary one, and the mother had had no separate enjoyment and no actual allotment had been made at the time of her death and if the property has not lost its character of ancestral property, it would remain subject to partition in the present proceedings. The case of Sheo Dyal Tewaree v. Judoonath Tewaree (4) would appear to support this view. In that case a partition took place between several co-sharers including an uncle and nephew and the mother of the former. The last named died pending an appeal in the partition suit and after the preliminary decree a claim was made to her share by a person alleging herself to be her devisee. Mitter, J., in delivering judgment said:—"It is quite clear that the share which ought to have been allowed to Golaba (the mother) was merged in the general estate.... But the mother or grandmother (as the case may be) can never be recognised as the owner of such a share until the division has been actually made. She has no pre-existing vested right in the estate except a right of maintenance." In our opinion the share of the defendant's mother Girija Ojhain should be divided amongst the co-sharers as part of the ancestral property.

The next point is whether the after-born son of Aina Ojhain is entitled to a share as against the plaintiff. This depends upon whether the date of the preliminary decree or the date of the institution of the suit must be taken as the time when the plaintiff's interest became severed from that of the other members of the family, for it is conceded that if the after-bron son was conceived before the partition he is entitled under the Mitakshara Law to a share in the estate. The case of Girja Bai v. Sadashiv Dhundiraj (5), which is the latest pronouncement of the Judicial Committee on this question, appears to conclude the matter in favour of the plaintiff. In that case the plaintiff's husband one Harihar, a member of a joint Mitakshara family, having previously expressed his intention to effect a separation instituted a suit for that purpose. The defendants did not dispute the right which he claimed to a third share in the family property, but after some attempts at a compromise and before any decree in the suit was made Harihar died and his widow applied for substitution as heir and legal representative of her deceased husband. The defendants claimed Harihar's share by right of survivorship on the ground that no partition had taken place at the date of his death. Mr. Ameer Ali in delivering their Lordships' judgment referred to the earlier case of Suraj Narain v. Iqbal Narain (6), where it was laid down that "a definite and unambiguous indication by one member of an intention to separate himself and to enjoy his share in severalty may amount to separation. But to have that effect the intention must be unequivocal and clearly expressed." He then proceeded: "It would probably be enough for the determination of this appeal to say that nothing could be more unequivocal or more clearly expressed than the conduct of Harihar in indicating his intention to separate himself and enjoy his share in severalty by the notice of the 1st October 1908 coupled with this suit and that these acts amounted to a separation with all its legal consequences." It is true that there was no denial in that case of the plaintiff's right, but it is clear from the rest of the judgment that the principle upon which their Lordships' decision was based was not confined to cases of agreement between the parties. A passage in the judgment of Dwarkanath Mitter, J., in Musammat Deo Bunsee Kooer v. Dwarkanath (7) in which that learned Judge says, "It is settled law that every member of a joint undivided family has an indefeasible right to demand a partition of his own share. The other members of the family must submit to it whether they like it or not", was referred to with approval. And in referring to the judgment of the Board in Appovier v. Rama Subba Aiyan (8), Mr. Ameer Ali says: "Some of the Courts in India have supposed Lord Westbury's expressions to imply that the severance of status can take place only by agreement. Their Lordships have no doubt that this is a mistaken view." We think that the plaintiff in the present case unequivocally and unmistakably manifested his intention to separate himself from the defendants at the latest on the 12th August 1913, the date when he instituted the suit. The other material dates are 4th August 1915 when the preliminary decree was made, and the 21st November 1915 when the son was born. It was contended that as the plaintiff was a minor when the suit was instituted, he was incapable of expressing any intention at that date, but no argument was adduced in support of this contention nor were any authorities referred to and we are unable to accede to the proposition that under Hindu Law a minor cannot express either himself or through his guardian an intention to do that which is clearly not against his own interest. We think, therefore, that the plaintiff's share in the family property should not be diminished by reason of the birth of another member of the family more than two years after the time when he must be deemed to have separated from the joint family.

The result of this decision will be that the plaintiff will receive one-fifth of the whole property in the first instance, the remaining four-fifths being distributed between the four defendants and the after-born son, the female members taking in lieu of maintenance only. These shares will be one-fifth of four-fifths or four-twenty-fifths of the whole. Girija Ojhain's share will then be distributed between the three male members of the family, including the after-born son who was born before the death of Girija. They will, therefore, each receive in addition to their original shares one-third of four-twenty-fifths, that is, four-seventy-fifths. This works out in the following proportions: The plaintiff nineteen-seventy-fifths, his father sixteen-seventy-fifths, the after-born son sixteen-seventy-fifths and the two surviving females twelve-seventy-fifths. The decree will direct partition of the property moveable and immoveable which belonged to the joint family at the date of the institution of the suit and of any property acquired subsequently by employment of the joint family funds and for that purpose the Commissioner will take the usual accounts.

As neither party in this case has succeeded in his appeal there will be no order as to costs.

Ordered accordingly.

JUDGMENT.

IN S. A. No. 176 OF 1913.

In this case it appears that the landlord appellant made an application under section 105 of the Bengal Tenancy Act for the settlement of fair rents in the case of each of a large number of tenants. The application came on for hearing before the Settlement Officer and judgment was delivered on the 23rd August 1912. At the close of the judgment the Settlement Officer says this :—" It is now necessary to prepare schedules on the basis of the findings and in accordance with the directions given above for all the tenancies of those cases except the tenancies regarding which the claim was withdrawn. Office to prepare the schedules and to put them up. The schedules will show the fair rent settled." In accordance with that order a schedule was prepared, approved and signed by the Settlement Officer on the 14th September 1912. Then followed the Civil Court vacation. On the re-opening day, the 12th November 1912, the plaintiff-landlord presented an appeal against the fair rents settled in the cases of 148 of the tenants whose tenancies were included in the schedule, to which reference has been made. The learned Special Judge dismissed that appeal on the ground that it was barred by limitation.

It is not contested before us in this appeal that if time is to be taken as running from the 23rd August 1912, the date of the judgment, the appeal to the District Judge was barred ; but it is contended that in taking that date as the starting point and not the 14th September 1912, the date on which the schedules were prepared and signed, the learned Judge has fallen into error. On behalf of the respondents it is not suggested that if 14th September be taken the appeal to the District Judge is within time. Thus the one question for our determination is whether time should be taken as running from the 23rd of August, the date of the judgment, or from the 14th of September, the date of the schedule. The learned District Judge says that the 23rd August, must be taken because by section 109A of the Act the appeal lies not against a decree or a schedule but against a decision of the Revenue Officer and the schedule in his opinion forms no part of that decision.

Now when we turn to section 105 we find that what the Revenue Officer is required to do is to settle fair rent in respect of the land held by the tenant, that is to say, by each tenant. No doubt in his judgment of the 23rd August 1912 the Revenue Officer did arrive at certain findings and did lay down certain principles in accordance with which fair rents were to be ascertained, but it is clear that until the fair rent to be thus calculated had been ascertained, there was in fact no decision in the case of any one of the tenants and no settlement of the rent which he had to pay. The schedule settling the rents is clearly a part of the decision and in fact read with the judgment is the decision.

If any doubt can possibly remain on this point, it would be removed by a reference to the statutory rules framed by the Bengal Government under the provisions of sections 39, 61, 134 and 189 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. Rule 63 of those rules to be found in part III, which deals with the settlement of fair rents, says in its sub-rule (9): "it shall not be necessary for the Revenue Officer to draw up a separate decree with regard to fair rent settled but the entry in his decision or schedule attached thereto with regard to the fair rent settled shall be held to be a decree." That rule reproduces rule 62 (9) of Chapter VI of the Rules framed by the Government of Eastern Bengal and Assam under the provisions of the sections already referred to on the 24th August 1909, which in the years 1912 to 1914 were in force in the District of Mymensingh.

When we next turn to Schedule III of the Bengal Tenancy Act, Part II, we find that for appeals to the Court of the District Judge or Special Judge the period of limitation is 30 days from the decree or order under the Act. From this also it would appear that the schedule is in effect the decree.

Whether, however, the schedule be or be not a decree, it is clear that without the schedule the decision remains incomplete and uncertain in the case of each tenant and the schedule is thus an essential part of the decision.

For these reasons we set aside the order of the Special Judge in this case and return the appeal to be presented to him in order that it may be heard and disposed of on the merits in accordance with law.

IN S. A. NOS. 436, 574 AND 2403 TO 2410 OF 1913.

These appeals are governed by the judgment just delivered in S. A. No. 176 of 1913. The order of the Special Judge in each of those cases is set aside and the appeals returned to him in order that they may be heard and disposed of on the merits in accordance with law.

IN S. A. NO. 906 TO 914 OF 1913.

These appeals are also governed by the judgment just delivered in S. A. No. 176 of 1913. True it is that the dates are somewhat different, but when due allowance is made for the time requisite for taking copies and for the days in which the Courts were closed those appeals were well within time, taking time as running from the date on which the schedules were prepared and signed. The order of the Special Judge in each of these cases is set aside and the appeals returned to him in order that they may be heard and determined on the merits.

The applications connected with these Appeals Nos. 176, 436, 574, 2403 to 2410 and 906 to 914 of 1913 are all rejected. Costs in all the above appeals will abide the result. We assess the hearing fee in each of the appeals valued at sums not exceeding Rs. 200 at one gold mohur and in each of the other appeals at two gold mohurs.

No general rule can be laid down as to the effect of a zarpeshgi transaction. Every case must depend upon its own facts. [p. 145, col 2.]

Plaintiff executed a zarpeshgi ijara in favour of defendant, which stipulated that in the event of the plaintiff's failure to re-pay the zarpeshgi money the defendant would be entitled to retain the land till re-payment. It further stipulated that out of the annual consolidated jama of the property transferred to the possession of the defendant, estimated at Rs. 112-8-0, the defendant was entitled to retain a certain sum on account of interest, revenue, cesses and irrigation charges and that the balance should be paid to the plaintiff:

Held, that the intention of the parties was to create the relationship of mortgagor and mortgagee, and that the amount advanced to the plaintiff could not be viewed as an advance of the rent fixed upon the land. [p. 155, col. 1.]

Appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Roe, dated the 22nd March 1916.

Mr. Muhamad Ishaq, for the Appellant,

Mr. Kulwant Sahai, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The suit out of which this appeal arises was instituted on the 22nd September 1910. The plaintiff is the proprietor of Mouza Chak Amanulla and on the 14th March 1896 he executed a document, which is called a zarpeshgi ijara, in favour of defendant No. 1 and Jitan Mahton, husband of defendant No. 1. The interest of Jitan Mahton has been transferred to defendant No. 3. The zarpeshgi ijara stipulated among other things that an annual sum of Rs. 35-10-8 was payable to the plaintiff by the defendants or their predecessors and the present suit is brought for the years 1311 to F. S. 1317 in respect of this sum of Rs. 35-10-8 with interest. The trial Court and the Court of first appeal found that the defendants' contention that the plaintiff was not competent to recover more than the amount due for three years was not sustainable. The defendants also contended that in July 1896, that is, about three months after the zarpeshgi ijara, the plaintiff borrowed by three simple bonds a total sum of Rs. 300 from defendant No. 1 and Jitan Mahton and that it was stipulated in these bonds that the interest payable thereon, namely, a sum of Rs. 18 per year should be credited towards the payment of the money due to the plaintiff upon the zarpeshgi ijara. It is necessary to observe that the period of the zarpeshgi ijara and of the three bonds was five years. The zarpeshgi ijara also stipulated that in the event of failure to pay the sum of Rs. 700, which was the loan taken by the plaintiff on that transaction, the defendants should be competent to retain the land till the re-payment of the zarpeshgi money. It also stipulated that the annual consolidated jama of the property transferred to the possession of the defendants by the zarpeshgi ijara was estimated at Rs. 112-8-0, and that out of this amount the sum of Rs. 42 should be retained by the defendants as interest upon the zarpeshgi money, that a sum of Rs. 23-2-8 should be paid on account of revenue, road and dak cess, and a sum of Rs. 11-9-8 on account of irrigation charges, leaving a balance of Rs. 35-10-8 payable on account of haq-ajri to the plaintiff. On appeal to this Court Mr. Justice Roe held that the relationship created by the zarpeshgi ijara was not one of mortgagor and mortgagee but of landlord and tenant and that under the Bengal Tenancy Act the plaintiff was not entitled to recover more than three years' rent. The plaintiff had a cross-appeal before the learned Judge as to the deduction of the yearly interest of Rs. 18. He contended that the defendants were not entitled to make any deduction for the years in suit, but the learned Judge of this Court was against the plaintiff on this point with the result that he gave the plaintiff a decree for three years only for the principal sum of Rs. 17-10-8 per year.

This matter now comes before us in Letters Patent Appeal and the first question that has been argued is, what is the relationship created by the zarpeshgi ijara. Now it is impossible to lay down any general rule as to the effect of a zarpeshgi transaction. Every case must depend upon its own facts, and in this particular case we must determine upon a construction of the document whether or not we can accept the contention of the defendants that a relationship of landlord and tenant subject to the provisions of the Bengal Tenancy Act was created. On a careful examination of the terms of the document it seems to be clear that the intention of the parties was to create the relationship of mortgagor and mortgagee and that this is not a case in which the amount advanced to the owner of the land is to be viewed as an advance of the rent fixed upon the land. In Nidha Sah v. Murli Dhar (1) their Lordships had before them the case of a plaintiff, who in consideration of advances which had been made to him by the defendant executed what purported to be a mortgage of certain villages with possession to the defendant for 14 years, the deed providing that on "the expiration of the term the mortgagor shall come into possession of the mortgaged villages without settlement of account, that on the expiration of the term the mortgagee shall have no power whatever in respect of the said estate which, after the expiration of the term of the mortgage-deed, shall be returned to the mortgagor without his paying the mortgage money secured under this document." In regard to this document their Lordships observed as follows:—

"The instrument, though it is called a mortgage, and though it will be convenient to follow the nomenclature used in the document itself and in the pleadings and judgments ni the Courts below, is not a mortgage in any proper sense of the word. It is not a security for the payment of any money or for the performance of any engagement. No accounts were to be rendered or required. There was no provision for redemption expressed or implied. It was simply a grant of land for a fixed term free of rent in consideration of a sum made up of past and present advances."

That case is a very different case from that before us here. Here there is a distinct provision for interest upon the sum advanced and we see no difference between the nature of this document and that which was before their Lordships of the Privy Council in the Bengal Indigo Co. v. Roghoubur Dass (2) and where their Lordships observed that the real question was whether the main object of the instrument was to provide security for the loan. The same principle was followed in Ram Khelawan Roy v. Sambhoo Roy (3). In that case a sum of one rupee per year was reserved as rent to be paid to the debtor and the creditor was to remain in possession until the payment of the zarpeshgi money. Their Lordships held that the proper intention to be inferred from the document was that the land was hypothecated for a term of years as security for the payment of the loan. Upon a consideration of all the facts in this case and the document itself, it is impossible to say that the contention of the plaintiff is not correct and that the intention of the parties was not to create the relationship of mortgagor and mortgagee but that of simple landlord and tenant. The document being a registered instrument the amount payable to the plaintiff will be governed by Article 116 of the Limitation Act, the period of which is 6 years from the date on which the cause of action accrued and not 3 years as provided in the schedule attached to the Bengal Tenancy Act.

The next question is whether the defendants are entitled to credit the sum of Rs. 18 per year for the years in suit. Now the Courts below have proceeded on the assumption that the stipulation in the three bonds of 1896 was that the defendants were entitled to pay themselves the sum of Rs. 18 per year so long as the zarpeshgi ijara remained in force. The bonds themselves do not appear to make any such stipulation and if anything is to be inferred from the conduct of the parties, all that appears to be established is that up to the year 1901 the plaintiff gave a receipt to the defendants acknowledging payment of Rs. 17-10-8 per year and allowing the defendants credit for the sum of Rs. 18. The learned Vakil for the plaintiff-appellant before us has admitted in the course of the argument that he continued to allow the defendants to make this deduction up to the year 1903. This being so, the defendants would be under the operation of section 20, sub-clause (1), of the Indian Limitation Act entitled to sue upon their bonds for three years after the last payment of Rs. 18, and if they were entitled to sue it follows that they would also be entitled to credit themselves with the sum of Rs. 18 by way of interest up to that period. Therefore, the defendants are entitled to credit for the sum of Rs. 18 and interest thereupon up to the end of the year 1906. That means that for the year 1311 the defendants will be entitled to Rs. 18 and interest which amounts roughly to Rs. 6-4-0, for 1312 they will be entitled to the same sum and interest amounting to Rs. 5-3-8 and for 1313 they will be entitled to the same sum with interest which amounts to Rs. 4-3. The total of these sums will have to be deducted from the total claim of Rs. 293-10-2 and for the balance the plaintiff will be entitled to a decree with interest at 6 per cent. from the date of the institution of the suit till the date of realisation. The result, therefore, is that the appeal will be decreed in this modified manner and the plaintiff will be entitled to his costs in all Courts below calculated proportionately to his success. The defendants will be entitled to their pro-

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 47—Execution—Decree-holder ordered to furnish security—Order accepting security offered, whether appealable—Security accepted without enquiry into sufficiency—Court, duty of.

An order by which security proffered by the decree-holder for getting delivery of possession of the property forming the subject-matter of the decree is accepted and delivery of possession is directed to be made to the decree-holder is appealable, inasmuch as the order directing delivery of possession is a final order and not an interlocutory or intermediate one. [p. 156, col. 2.]

In an appeal by a judgment-debtor to the High Court it was ordered that on the decree-holder furnishing security in immoveable property, he should be at liberty to proceed with the execution. In accordance with the order the decree-holder proffered securities to which the judgment-debtor took various objections, but the executing Court without entering into the question of the sufficiency of the securities offered accepted the securities and ordered delivery of possession in execution of the decree:

Held, that the executing Court was wrong in accepting the securities without holding any enquiry into their sufficiency and that the case must go back to the executing Court for making the necessary enquiries. [p. 156, col. 2; p. 157, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.

TEUNON, J.—In this appeal it appears that on a previous application to this Court by the judgment-debtor-appellant it was directed by an order, dated 19th December 1916, that on the decree holder furnishing security to the extent of Rs. 50,000 in immoveable property the decree-holder should be at liberty to proceed with execution.

The present appeal by the judgment-debtor is directed against an order accepting the proffered security and directing delivery of possession to the decree-holder of the property forming the subject-matter of the decree. A preliminary objection is taken that against this order no appeal lies and in support of this contention we have been referred to the cases reported as Saraswati Barmonya v. Moti Barmonya (1), Srinivas Prosad Singh v. Kesho Prosad Singh (2) and to the decision of this Court in Appeal from Order No. 5 of 1916. But these cases in fact show that though against the interlocutory orders or intermediate steps leading up to the final order an appeal may not lie, yet against the final order, in this case the order directing delivery of possession, an appeal will lie. For this proposition there is also authority in Luchmeeput Singh v. Sita Nath Doss (3).

The judgment-debtor took a number of objections to the sufficiency of the security and the learned Subordinate Judge has made the orders referred to above without making any inquiry into the said objections. He was of opinion that for the purposes of the inquiry before him it was unnecessary to enter into "interminable questions of title" and other like matters

In this view he has clearly erred. Property in which the surety cannot show a prima facie title is obviously of no value for the purpose of securing the judgment-debtor and the value may again be seriously affected by questions of transferability.

The properties pledged have been described in 7 lots or parcels.

The last 2nd and 6th lots of the 1st report and the additional lands in the supplementary report have been valued on the footing that they are raiyati holdings at a fixed rate of rent. The judgment-debtor contended that they are ordinary occupancy holdings not transferable by local custom or usage.

If there are reasonable grounds for thinking that the rent is or may be liable to enhancement or that the landlord's consent to a transfer has to be obtained, the valuation will obviously have to be revised. Moreover, as regards the additional properties there appears to be a controversy as to the extent of the interest at least of the proposed sureties.

In the 4th and 5th lots there is a question regarding the extent of the surety's share. In the 4th lot the surety says he has a half share, while the judgment-debtor says that the surety has and can pledge only a 1/5th share, the question raised apparently being whether the property descended from the surety's father, grandfather or great-grandfather. The 5th property stands in the name of the surety's wife who does not join in the transaction, and the question is whether the property is hers or belongs to the husband and wife in equal shares.

The 3rd item is described as debattar and the proposed surety is a co-sharer sebait. The surety says that the sebaits have mortgaged on previous occasions, but these transactions may represent merely breaches of trust and if the land in question is the absolute property of the thakur, obviously it cannot be accepted as a valid security for the personal debts of the sebait. It has been said that this debattar property has not been taken into account but that does not appear to be the case. Without this property the valuation does not exceed Rs. 49,000.

In respect of the 2nd item a further question arises. Of the six securities who are brothers two are minors. The eldest brother who is their guardian ad litem has been permitted to execute the security bond on their behalf. In granting this permission the Subordinate Judge appears to have overlooked the fact that default on the part of any of the major co-decree-holders will bring liability upon the properties of the minors and it will be for his consideration whether the 1/3rd share of the minors in properties not the subject-matter of the litigation should be accepted as a valid security.

For the foregoing reasons we set aside the orders complained of and direct that before accepting the security proffered the Subordinate Judge do make inquiry into the objections taken by the judgment-debtors.

The property of which possession has been given, it appears, to the decree-holder-respondents will now be restored to the possession of the judgment debtor-appellant. Costs of this hearing will be costs in the case. We assess the hearing fee at three gold mohurs.

The record will be sent down without delay.

NEWBOULD, J.—I agree.

Orders set aside.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), ss. 132, 183—Hindu lady of high family appearing in public, whether can be compelled to appear in witness-box.

An old Hindu lady belonging to a high family, who has abandoned entirely the protection of the purdah and who has no intention of resuming it, ought not to be compelled, having regard to her social position and the feelings of her class, to appear in the witness-box but should get the privilege of being examined on commission, the cost of such commission being costs in the cause. [p. 158, col 2; p. 159, col. 1.]

Section 132, Civil Procedure Code is wide enough to cover the case of such a lady. [p. 159, col. 1.]

Mr. P. L. Buckland, for the Plaintiffs.

Mr. B. L. Mitter, for the Defendant.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application to examine on commission the defendant in the suit and the mother of the defendant. So far as the defendant is concerned, it appears on the evidence that he probably cannot get leave to come to Calcutta, and that he is not likely to come to Calcutta for the period of one year. He is at present serving in the Bombay Presidency. The plaintiffs undertake not to bring on this case before February next, and under these circumstances the defendant at the same time undertakes that in the event of his coming to Calcutta before February next he will apply to be examined in Court de bene esse. Under these circumstances it seems to me that the best course is that this application should stand over, so far as the defendant is concerned, until the re-opening of the Courts after the Xmas vacation, and if before that time the defendant comes to Calcutta he will in accordance with his undertaking apply to be examined de bene esse, but if up to that time he is unable to come to Calcutta and still satisfies the Court that he will be unable to come before the trial of the action takes place, then, I think, the commission should issue. Under these circumstances the only order that I propose to make now is that so far as the defendant is concerned, the mutual undertakings being given, that I have already mentioned, this application is to stand over until the re-opening of the Court after the Xmas vacation.

So far as the defendant's mother is concerned, it appears on the evidence that she is a lady who appears in public. The evidence that I have before me on her behalf consists of an affidavit of Jogendranath Banerjee, a clerk in the employ of the defendant's solicitors. He states "that the lady is an old Hindu lady belonging to a high family, and according to the practices prevailing in the community a lady of her station in life does not appear in any Court of law, and the defendant apprehends that unless a commission is issued to examine her it will not be possible to have her evidence." The evidence on behalf of the plaintiff is contained in an affidavit of Sassoon Jacob Cohen, Manager of the estate of Mrs. Azeeza Joseph Solomon Joseph deceased, which estate is represented by the plaintiffs in this suit. He states in paragraph 6 that he is well acquainted with the lady and that she is not a pardanashin lady, on the other hand she is a cultured and educated lady of various accomplishments and freely appears in public and goes about in society and talks freely to Europeans and others face to face according to the manners and customs of European ladies. In paragraph 8 he states, that in October 1915 she came in an open carriage to their office at No. 6, Bentinck Street, and in paragraph 9 he states "that in December 1916 she personally called at the house of Mr. Satyendra Nath Sen, an Attorney, in Indian Mirror Street, and met the deponent and one of the plaintiffs, and talked to them in Mr. Sen's presence." Under these circumstances I have got to decide whether I shall compel the lady to appear in Court to give her evidence. She does not fall within the provisions of section 133 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which, Counsel for the plaintiffs admits for the purposes of this application, extends as well to the wives of the persons named therein as to the persons themselves. Accordingly the only section which is applicable is section 132, which provides that women, who according to the customs and manners of the country ought not to be compelled to appear in public, shall be exempt from personal appearance in Court. On behalf of the plaintiffs it is said that as the lady has taken advantage of such privileges as attach to the abandonment of the parda system, she is not now entitled to claim the privilege of exemption from appearing in the witness-box which is provided by section 132, and it is suggested that section 132 applies exclusively to pardanashin or quasi-pardanashin ladies, and that it was designed for persons who observe the parda system. On behalf of the defendant it is said that although she does appear in public to a considerable extent, yet according to the customs and manners of the class and community to which she belongs she could not appear to give her evidence in the witness-box in Court. I do not think that the lady, who, I am satisfied on the evidence, has abandoned entirely the protection of the parda, and who, upon the evidence before me, I cannot see, has any intention of resuming it, ought to be compelled, having regard to the feelings of her class, to appear in the witness-box and I am not prepared to force her to do so, because I think, that the Indian point of view, which I think should be respected, would be that although the lady has abandoned the parda for the purposes to which I have already referred, it would be something in the nature of an outrage if I were to compel her, having regard to her social position, to appear in the witness-box to give evidence in Court. Under these circumstances I think it would be unfortunate if I am forced, which I do not think I am, by the words of the section to compel her to come to Court to give her evidence, as I think that section 132 is wide enough to cover her case. I feel some considerable doubt whether, having regard to the position she has adopted, I ought not to make her pay the costs of the privilege which she claims. On the whole I think I ought not to do so, having regard to the terms of the section and the reasons which I have already stated and which have induced me not to force her to come into the witness-box. The result will be that so far as she is concerned. I grant the commission asked for and the costs of this commission will be costs in the cause. Mr. H. K. Mitra, Barrister-at-law, will be the Commissioner. The commission to be returnable a month after the issue of the writ.

Order accordingly.

Pleadings—Inconsistent pleas in different suits, whether can be allowed.

It is an elementary rule based on the most obvious grounds of justice, equity and good conscience that parties litigants cannot be allowed to take up inconsistent positions in Court to the detriment of their opponents. [p. 160, col. 2.]

In 1906 plaintiff sued K. for recovery of possession of land on declaration of title. K. objected to the plaintiff's claim for recovery of possession on the ground that a lease granted by the plaintiff to S. was in existence at the date of the suit. K.'s objection was given effect to and though plaintiff's title was declared, his claim for recovery of possession was disallowed on the ground that the lease in favour of S. was in force at the date of suit. Subsequently in 1913 plaintiff brought the present suit for recovery of possession against K. and S. The suit was opposed by K. on the ground that it was not maintainable inasmuch as the plaintiff could and should have made the same prayer for possession against S. in the previous suit since the lease in favour of S. had terminated before the institution of the previous suit:

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to succeed on proof that no sub-tenancy created by him existed at the date of the institution of the present suit. [p. 160, col. 2.]

Held, further, that it would be manifestly unjust, if the defendants were allowed to defeat the present claim on proof that, contrary to their previous allegation; a decree for recovery of possession might and should have been made in favour of the plaintiff in the previous suit. [p. 160, col. 2.]

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal by the plaintiffs in a suit for recovery of possession of land on declaration of title. The disputed land is claimed by the plaintiffs as situated within their village Bhuluk Khulla and by the Khan defendants as comprised within their village Sriramanipur. The Courts below have found that the title of the plaintiffs has been established, and the only question in controversy is whether the plaintiffs are entitled to a decree for recovery of possession.

There are two sets of defendants, the Khans and the Sheikhs. There was a previous suit between the plaintiffs and the Khans, which was instituted on the 13th September 1906 and terminated on the 29th April 1912. The plaintiffs in that suit claimed possession of the land now in dispute. The suit was dismissed by the Court of first instance, but, on appeal, was decreed by the Subordinate Judge. On second appeal to this Court Mr. Justice Coxe remanded the case to the Subordinate Judge for trial of two issues. The defendants at the time urged before Mr. Justice Coxe that even if the title of the plaintiffs was established and was found not to have been extinguished by limitation, they were not entitled to actual possession, inasmuch as a lease granted by them to the Sheikhs was still in force. Mr. Justice Coxe gave effect to this contention and ruled upon the authority of the decision in Gulzar Singh

v. Kalyan Chand (1) that the plaintiffs could obtain not actual possession but only declaration of their title. When the case went back to the Subordinate Judge, the plaintiffs offered to give evidence to show that the Sheikhs had relinquished their tenancy and that they themselves were consequently entitled to recover actual possession on establishment of their title. The Subordinate Judge held that the judgment of the High Court on the point was conclusive and that it was not competent to him to hold that the lease in favour of the Sheikhs had terminated before the institution of the suit. On the merits he found that the disputed land was within the village whereof the plaintiffs were the admitted proprietors. As regards possession he found that the plaintiffs were in occupation up to 1891, that in 1892 they let out the land to one Harbansa and that the tenant had possession till he was dispossessed by the Khans in 1898. Subsequently, in 1901, the plaintiffs purchased the holding of Harbansa at a sale in execution of a decree for arrears of rent. The Subordinate Judge finally held that the plaintiffs became entitled to recover possession, only when they purchased the holding in 1901. But as the lease granted to the Sheikhs in 1892 had not yet terminated, the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover actual possession The result was that on the 29th April 1912 a declaratory decree was made in favour of the plaintiffs. On the 5th April 1913 the plaintiffs instituted this suit against the Khans and the Sheikhs for recovery of possession. The Court of first instance decreed the suit against both. The Sheikhs did not appeal, but on the appeal of the Khans the District Judge has dismissed the suit as against both sets of defendants. He has held in substance that there is no new cause of action for this suit and that the plaintiffs cannot now sue for a relief which they could and should have obtained in the previous litigation. In our opinion this position cannot possibly be supported.

The Khans now contend that the lease granted by the plaintiffs to the Sheikhs had terminated prior to the commencement of the previous suit. This is inconsistent with the allegation which the Khans made in the previous litigation. It is an elementary rule, based on the most obvious grounds of justice, equity and good conscience, that parties litigants cannot be allowed to take up inconsistent positions in Court to the detriment of their opponents. The plaintiff and the Khans are both equally bound by the decision of Mr. Justice Coxe that the lease in favour of the Sheikhs was in force at the time of the institution of the previous suit, and presented an effective bar to the recovery of actual possession by the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs are now entitled to succeed on proof that on the date of institution of this suit there was not in existence a sub-tenancy created by them which could bar a decree for recovery of possession in their favour. It would be manifestly unjust, if the defendants were allowed to defeat the present claim on proof that, contrary to their previous allegation, a decree for recovery of possession might and should have been made in favour of the plaintiffs in the prior suit. In this view the decree of the District Judge cannot be supported.

But it has been very inconsistently argued that the plaintiffs cannot succeed in this litigation unless they prove affirmatively that the lease granted by them in favour of the Sheikhs in 1902 had terminated before the 5th April 1913. There is abundant evidence to show that the Sheikhs gave up their tenancy in 1905. The suit is thus in time, whether the time is taken to run against plaintiffs from the date of the decree in the previous litigation or from the date of the accrual of the cause of action as determined in the previous litigation, namely, May 1901

The result is that the appeal is allowed, the decree of the District Judge set aside and that of the Court of first instance restored. This order will carry costs both here and in the Court of Appeal below.

Appeal allowed.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XLVII, r. 1—Review—Mistake of law, whether ground for review —Any other sufficient reason.

A mere mistake of law is not in itself a sufficient mistake or error apparent on the face of the record so as to form a ground for review of judgment. [p. 161, col 2]

Where the mistake arises from the conduct of the applicant for review, the mistake cannot even be pleaded as "any other sufficient reason" within the meaning of Order XLVII, rule 1, Civil Procedure Code [p. 162, col. 1.]

The defendants in a partition suit preferred an appeal against the preliminary decree and the plaintiff preferred cross-objections to the same. The appeal was dismissed and the cross-objections were allowed. The defendants then applied for a review on the ground that their appeal was incompetent under section 97, so that the cross-objections of the plaintiff should not have been allowed:

Held, that the discretion of the Court to grant a review should not be exercised in this case inasmuch as owing to the applicants' own negligence, their appeal was argued and the cross-objections were allowed. [p. 162, col. 1.]

Application for a review of the judgment of this Court, dated the 25th March 1917, passed in Appeal from Appellate Decree No. 1342 of 1915, reported as 40 Ind. JUDGMENT.

FLETCHER, J.—This is a Rule obtained by the defendants calling on the opposite party, the plaintiff, to show cause why the judgment of this Court should not be reviewed "as regards the cross-objection." By those words, when I issued the Rule, I meant on ground No. 9 specified in the application for review preferred to this Court. The case is a peculiar one. The present petitioners, the defendants, appealed to this Court against the preliminary decree granted by the Court of the District Judge of the Twenty-four Perganahs. The appeal was argued by an experienced and learned Vakil and it was argued before the Court, it is not denied, as if it was a competent appeal which the Court was entitled to entertain. The Court was occupied, we are informed, for two days in hearing the appeal and, after this, not a small portion of the Court's time, the petitioners' appeal failed. In that appeal the opposite party, the plaintiff, had preferred cross-objections and on hearing those cross-objections we decided in favour of the view of the plaintiff. Then comes this application for review of judgment and the ground is that it is a case coming within Order XLVII, rule 1, Code of Civil Procedure, because under the terms of section 97 of the Code no appeal lay against the preliminary decree as the final decree in the suit had been passed. There is no statement made before the Court as to what was the view of the learned gentleman who conducted the appeal when we heard it originally, and I do not think that we can take it that an experienced Vakil was unaware of the fact that appeal did not lie against the preliminary decree, after the passing of the final decree. In fact, he invited our decision on the materials placed before the Court. It seems to me that in a case like that the Court ought not to exercise the discretion that it has in any case to review the judgment unless it is satisfied that a real mistake was made. It is no use changing one's legal advisers and getting them to put forward a case for review of judgment on this ground.

Another ground why this review of judgment should not be granted is that I do not think that this case comes within the terms of Order XLVII, rule 1. It is not a case of mistake or error apparent on the face of the record but it is a case where a mistake of law has been made, namely, that an appeal was argued without objection where apparently no appeal lay from the preliminary decree. The appeal was preferred at the instance of the persons who are the present petitioners. I do not think that a mere mistake of law is in itself a sufficient mistake or error apparent on the face of the record for us to interfere by way of review. Then, is there any other sufficient reason shown why the review should be granted? It is quite clear that there is no other sufficient reason where the whole mistake had arisen from the conduct of the petitioners themselves. They ought to have satisfied themselves that the appeal was a competent one, and if on account of their negligence the appeal was argued and the cross-objections were allowed, they have got only themselves to thank.

I think the present Rule should fail and must be discharged with costs, five gold mohurs.

SMITHER, J.—I agree.

Rule discharged.

The question of onus probandi in a custom case is not a pure question of law unconnected with custom. On the other hand, it is not, under all circumstances, a question relating to the validity or existence of a custom except in so far as, in proving or disproving the validity or existence of a custom, a party to a suit may be held to be entitled to an initial presumption in his favour on the strength of a generally accepted rule of custom as laid down by judicial decisions or otherwise. [p 163, col 2; p. 164, col. 1.]

Where the lower Appellate Court, holding that the parties were governed by custom, decided that the defendant, the sister of the last male holder, on whom the onus lay of establishing that she was entitled to succeed to the property of her deceased brother in preference to his collaterals, had failed to discharge the onus:

Held, that the question of onus probandi in this case was one relating to the existence of a custom governing the succession to the property of the deceased, and that, therefore, a certificate under section 41 (3) of the Punjab Courts Act was necessary to the institution of a second appeal regarding the said question. [p. 164, col. 1.]

Where some only out of several collaterals of a deceased proprietor bring a suit for possession of the property left by him, they can recover possession only of the shares to which they are entitled and not of the whole estate. [p. 164, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.—One Gaman, a Siviya Jat of Mauza Siviya, Tahsil Kharian, in the Gujrat District, who owned 488 kanals of land, died some years ago leaving an unmarried daughter, Musammat Hasni, and a married sister, Musammat Bhari. Musammat Hasni succeeded to her father's land but died towards the end of 1911; and soon after Musammat Bhari entered into possession of the land left by her. In January 1912 thirty proprietors of Mauza Siviya, who are collaterals of Gaman in the 9th degree, brought a suit for possession of 488 kanals of land against Musammat Bhari alleging that they, as collaterals of Gaman, deceased, were entitled to succeed to the land in question to the exclusion of his sister Musammat Bhari. In answer to the plaintiffs' claim Musammat Bhari put forward several pleas, the nature of which is clear from the following issues that were drawn by the Subordinate Judge:—

"(1) Whether the land in suit was ancestral, i. e., whether it was once occupied by Bhola, the common ancestor?

(2) Whether plaintiffs, collaterals in the 9th degree, are better heirs by custom than the sister of Gaman?

(3) Whether mortgage debts of Kanshi Ram, Karm Din, and Nur Siraj were paid by defendant No. 1 from the earnings of the ancestral estate and cannot be claimed by her?

(4) Whether plaintiffs can be allowed to sue for absentees? What was plaintiffs' (who were present) share if they cannot so sue?"

The Subordinate Judge held that the land in dispute was not proved to be the ancestral property of Gaman qua the plaintiffs; that no definite custom had been proved which governed a case of disputed succession such as the present between the sister of the last male proprietor and his remote collaterals; and that in the absence of a definite custom on the point the personal law of the parties should furnish the rule of decision. Under the Muhammadan Law Musammat Bhari, as sister of Gaman, took a half share in the land in dispute, and the other half devolved upon the plaintiffs as residuaries of the fourth class. The Subordinate Judge decreed possession of half the land in favour of the plaintiffs accordingly, conditional on their paying certain mortgage debts which had been liquidated by Musammat Bhari. As regards the objection taken by Musammat Bhari that since the plaintiffs did not represent the whole body of Gaman's reversioners, they could only claim possession of the land in dispute to the extent of their own shares, the Subordinate Judge held that such of the collaterals of Gaman as had not joined with the plaintiffs in bringing the suit could subsequently claim their share from the plaintiffs, and that the latter were entitled to take possession of the whole of the land to which all the collaterals of Gaman were entitled to succeed.

Both parties appealed to the Divisional Judge. The learned Judge agreed with the Subordinate Judge in holding that the land in suit was not the ancestral property of Gaman and the plaintiffs; but he was of opinion that the onus lay on Musammat Bhari of proving that she, as sister of Gaman, was entitled by custom to succeed to the land left by him to the exclusion of the plaintiffs who were his collaterals in the 9th degree. He further held that since Musammat Bhari had not proved that she had paid off the mortgage debts charged on certain portions of the land in suit out of her own pocket, the plaintiffs were not liable to her for any sums expended by her on redemption. Upon these findings he rejected Musammat Bhari's appeal, and accepting that of the plaintiffs, decreed their claim in full.

Musammat Bhari has filed a second appeal in this Court urging inter alia —

(1) that the lower Appellate Court was wrong in throwing on her the onus of proving that she was entitled to succeed to the non-ancestral property of her brother Gaman in preference to his collaterals in the 9th degree; and

(2) that the lower Appellate Court had overlooked the plea of Musammat Bhari to the effect that the plaintiffs could not sue for possession of the shares of certain absentees, who were collaterals of Gaman, and of the shares of other collaterals who had not joined with the plaintiffs in bringing the suit.

In regard to the first point, it has been urged by the respondents' Pleader that the question whether or not in this case the onus lay on Musammat Bhari of proving that by custom she excluded her brother's collaterals of the 9th degree from succession to the land in dispute was a question of custom and not one of law, and that, therefore, no second appeal lay to this Court regarding the existence of the alleged custom without a certificate under section 41 (3) of the Punjab Courts Act. After hearing Counsel for the appellant on this point, we are of opinion that the question of onus probandi which arises in this case is not a question of law, pure and simple, but a mixed question of law and custom, and that a second appeal is not competent to this Court unless a certificate is granted by the lower Appellate Court under section 41 (3) of the Punjab Courts Act. In the case of Arura v. Imam Bakhsh (1) it was held in effect by a learned Judge of this Court that the question as to the incidence of the burden of proof in a case involving a question of custom is a question which cannot be argued in second appeal without a certificate being first obtained under the Punjab Courts Act, and this view was approved by the late learned Chief Judge in Allah Din v. Salam Din (2). The matter is not altogether free from difficulty; but, after giving it our best consideration, we are of opinion that the question of the onus probandi in the present case is so indissolubly connected with the question of the existence of custom regulating the succession to the land left by Gaman that a certificate under sub-section (3) of section 41 of the Punjab Courts Act must be obtained from the lower Appellate Court before the question can be raised in second appeal in this Court. It seems to us that the question of onus probandi in a custom case is not a pure question of law unconnected with custom; and that, on the other hand, it is not, under all circumstances, a question relating to the validity or the existence of a custom except in so far as, in proving or disproving the validity or existence of custom, a party to a suit may be held to be entitled to an initial presumption in his favour on the strength of a generally accepted rule of custom as laid down by judicial decisions or otherwise. Considered in this light, the question of onus probandi in this case must be regarded as one relating to the existence of custom governing the succession to Gaman's land; and therefore a certificate under section 41 (3) of the Punjab Courts Act was necessary to the institution of a second appeal regarding the said question.

The learned Counsel for the appellant called our attention to the order of the Divisional Judge, dated the 13th January 1914, by which he refused to grant a certificate to the appellant under section 41 (3) of the Punjab Courts Act. The refusal was based upon the ground that the question as to the burden of proof that arises in this case is a question of law and not one of the existence or validity of a custom, and that, therefore, under the Punjab Courts Act a certificate cannot be given. As we have said above, this view is erroneous; and it is still open to the learned Judge of the lower Appellate Court to re-consider whether, in view of our finding that the question of onus probandi in this case is a question of custom, he would be prepared to grant a certificate for second appeal.

Apart from the question of custom involved in this case, it is clear that the plaintiffs, who are only some among the collaterals of Gaman, deceased, cannot sue for more than their own shares in the land in dispute, and the Subordinate Judge was, therefore, in error in giving them a decree for the share to which the whole body of Gaman's reversioners would be collectively entitled. The learned Divisional Judge overlooked this point altogether, and holding that by custom applicable to the parties the plaintiffs as collaterals of Gaman, deceased, excluded his sister from inheritance, he has decreed their claim in full. Assuming that Musammat Bhari is excluded from inheritance by the collaterals of Gaman, the plaintiffs clearly cannot get the shares of such of the collaterals as are absentees or of those collaterals who have not joined with the plaintiffs in bringing the present suit. The question as to what share of the land in dispute the plaintiffs are entitled to in their own right cannot be decided on the present record; and under Order XLI, rule 25, Civil Procedure Code, we remand the case to the District Judge of Gujranwala for a finding on this point. A return should be made within three months. The District Judge will also consider and decide the question of the grant of a certificate to the appellant, Musammat Bhari, under section 41 (3) of the Punjab Courts Act.

Case remanded.

Plaintiff obtained a decree for possession of a field and for mesne profits against a minor defendant. He subsequently agreed to sell the field to the minor judgment-debtor at a certain price, but the transfer was not completed:

Held, (1) that this did not amount to an adjustment of the decree but was only an agreement to adjust; [p. 165, col. 2.]

(2) that there being nothing to show that the decree-holder gave up his rights under the decree

Appeal from the order of the District Judge, East Berar, Amraoti, dated the 9th February 1917.

Mr. V. V. Chitale, for the Appellant.

Mr. M. Chuckerbutty, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of an application for execution of a decree obtained by the appellant for possession of a field and for mesne profits and costs. The respondent Jairam who is a minor pleaded through his guardian that the case had been compromised and in support of his plea put in a document which is described as Isarpatti. The parties admit that there was an agreement for the transfer of the field to the minor but the transfer has not yet been completed. They differ as regards the details of the consideration and other points. For the minor respondent it was urged that the terms of the compromise were fully set out in the Isarpatti. Objection was taken to the decree-holder's allegations varying the terms of that document. It was also pleaded that this document was intended to extinguish the decree unconditionally. The decree-holder on his part pointed out that sanction or leave of the Court was not obtained by the guardian before entering into the compromise; and the agreement, it was pleaded, was, therefore, void under Order XXXII, rules 6 and 7. It was also urged that the judgment debtor was barred by the provisions of Article 174 of the Limitation Act. The first Court held that the agreement could not be enforced as the sanction of the Court was not obtained. It held on the authority of Virupakshappa v. Shidappa (1) that Order XXXII, rules 6 and 7, applied to execution proceedings. On these findings the decree-holder's application was allowed. On appeal the District Judge correctly pointed out that under Order XXXII, rule 7, sub-section 2, the agreement or compromise entered into without leave of the Court is voidable against all parties other than a minor. The case has been remanded for further inquiry into the alleged adjustment. Against this order the decree-holder has filed this appeal.

(1) 26 B. 109; 3 Bom. L. R. 565.

It is contended on behalf of the appellant that the lower Appellate Court's view that there has been an adjustment within the meaning of Order XXI, rule 2, is erroneous, but it is argued for the respondent that the rule does not apply to a decree for possession. There is a conflict of opinion as to whether this rule applies to a decree other than a decree under which money is payable. The argument of the respondent is supported by Sankaran Nambiar v. Kanara Kurup (2), which limits the application of the rule to decrees for money.

On the other hand, the High Court of Calcutta has taken the opposite view: Baba Mohamed v. Webb (3), Iswar Chandra Dutt v. Haris Chandra Dutt (4). The Calcutta view has been followed in the Punjab, Lachu v. Kishen Lal (5). In the present case the decree was partly for money. It is unnecessary to decide in this case which view should be followed. But even upon the Calcutta view there has been in this case no adjustment of the decree, but only an agreement to adjust it: Jatindra Nath Roy v. Chandra Nath Banerjee (6). It is also clear that there has been no satisfaction of the decree within the meaning of section 47, Civil Procedure Code. Order XXIII, rule 3, which relates to compromise of a suit, is inapplicable to execution proceedings as laid done in Order XXIII, rule 4.

Whether the plea of the judgment-debtor is an adjustment within the meaning of Order XXI, rule 2, or a satisfaction within the meaning of section 47 in either case his plea fails as a complete answer to the application.

The Isarpatti filed by the defendant provides that a sale-deed should be executed for Rs. 500 within the 20th March 1916. There is nothing in that document to suggest that the decree-holder gave up his rights under the decree upon the mere execution of the document. The decree-holder was willing to give up his rights provided he received the balance of his consideration money within the time stipulated. The contract was an executory one. It was not capable of being specifically enforced for want of mutuality. It is not within the competence of the guardian of a minor to bind the minor or his estate by a contract for the purchase of immoveable property and specific performance of such a contract cannot be decreed even at the instance of the minor for want of mutuality [Mir Sarwarjan v. Fakhruddin Mahomed (7)].

If a deed of conveyance had been executed and registered, it could not have been impeached by the decree-holder for want of sanction under Order XXXII, rule 6. But where no such deed has been completed, a minor for want of mutuality cannot force a decree-holder to accept or give him such a deed, since the decree-holder, in the absence of the sanction of the Court to the agreement, cannot specifically enforce it. This follows from the principle of mutuality laid down in the above case by the Privy Council.

I note that the alleged tender of Rs. 525 has not been followed by a deposit in Court, as it should have been, for the District Judge's view that if the tender is proved the application for execution should be dismissed is erroneous.

There is no allegation of fraud which prevented the guardian from applying under Order XXI, rule 2 (2). The guardian did not take steps within the time allowed by Article 174. The recent Bombay case cited by the lower Appellate Court [Hansa Godhaji v. Bhawa Jegaji (8)] even if correctly decided, is easily distinguishable. There fraud was admitted inasmuch as the money under the decree had been paid out of Court. In this case there is no allegation of payment but only of a tender. A breach of contract is all that has been pleaded. The decree-holder is willing to give credit for Rs. 25 received as earnest money. I can, therefore, see no fraud of the kind contemplated in the Bombay judgment so as to justify the Court in not giving effect to the plain provisions of Order XXI, rule 2 (3).

The result is that the judgment-debtor is not entitled to enforce the contract alleged. The adjustment was not certified to the Court within time and cannot be recognised by the executing Court. Moreover, the facts alleged do not amount to an adjustment or satisfaction of the decree.

The order of the Divisional Judge is set aside and that of the first Court restored. Costs in both the Appellate Courts are to be paid by the respondents. The first Court will now dispose of the application for execution according to law. I fix Rs. 15 as Pleader's fee in this Court.

Order set side.

Probate and Administration Act (V of 1881), s. 5—"Deposited in a Court of competent jurisdiction," meaning of—Properly authenticated copy, what is.

Section 5 of the Probate and Administration Act does not require that the Will should have been deposited once and should have remained in Court for all time. The words in the section "when a Will has been proved and deposited in a Court of competent jurisdiction" do not mean "continues to remain in deposit." It is quite sufficient if the Will had in fact been deposited in a foreign Court of competent jurisdiction and that Court had before it the original Will at the time it made a judicial pronouncement as to the validity of the Will [p. 167, col 2.]

The copy of the Will, which has to be produced in a Court in British India under section 5 of the Probate and Administration Act for the issue of Letters of Administration with a copy of the Will annexed, does not necessarily mean a copy authenticated under the seal of the foreign Court; a copy authenticated by the notarial seal of a notary as provided for by the judicial process of a foreign Court is a properly authenticated copy within the meaning of the section.[p. 167, col. 2.]

JUDGMENT.

FLETCHER, J.—This is an appeal by th

objector from the decision of the learned Additional District Judge of Hooghly dated the 7th October 1915. The proceedings out of which the present appeal arises related to an application by the respondents for the grant of Letters of Administration with a copy of the Will annexed to the estate of one Kali Churn Bhur, who died at Chandernagar—the territory of the French Republic—on the 2nd January 1914. The application was for a grant having regard to the provisions of section 5 of the Probate and Administration Act. Kali Churn Bhur died, as I have stated, on the 2nd January 1914. On the 1st January 19 4, it appears from the proceedings of the Tribunal of first instance at Chandernagar that Kali Churn Bhur had sent for a notary and in his presence and in the presence of six witnesses had made what is called in the French Code a mystic Will. On the 15th January 1914, Indubhushan De, a general legatee under the Will, applied to the Court of first instance at Chandernagar to have the Will deposited. The Will was brought in the Court at Chandernagar by the notary and certain proceedings were taken before the President of the Tribunal and the President judicially recognized the Will and committed it to the care of a French notary Sadhu Churn Mukherjee, with power to give copies to the parties. That appears to have been the procedure before the French Court. The Judge in the lower Court had expert evidence before him. He had before him the notary Sadhu Churn Mukherjee who was a qualified practitioner in these matters and, according to the evidence of Sadhu Churn Mukherjee, this was a proper judicial recognition of the Will of the deceased Kali Churn Bhur. The fact that the Will has been committed to the custody of a notary seems, so far as I can gather from the text books, to be a practice that does obtain in certain foreign Courts. It is mentioned in Mortimer on Probate and a similar case is mentioned, I understand, in Mr. Justice Henderson's book on the Indian Succession Act. The question, therefore, is "does this case come within section 5 of the Probate and Administration Act"? Section 5 of the Probate and Administration Act says, "when a Will has been proved and deposited in a Court of competent jurisdiction." It has been argued that this Will was not deposited because the words "has been deposited" mentioned in section 5 mean continues to remain in deposit. On the other hand, it is said that the fact that the Will was deposited in Court and the Court had before it the original Will at the time it made a judicial pronouncement as to the validity of the Will under the French Law was a sufficient deposit within the meaning of section 5. I think the latter view is correct. The section does not require that the Will should have been deposited once and remain in Court for all time. It is quite sufficient if the Will had, in fact, been deposited in a foreign Court of competent jurisdiction.

The next argument raised on section 5 of the Probate and Administration Act is that the copy of the Will, which has got to be produced in the Court in British India before Letters of Administration with a copy of the Will annexed can be issued, means a copy authenticated under the seal of the foreign Court. Of course, it may be so in many cases but it is not necessarily so in all cases. The books show that copies authenticated by notaries have been accepted not only by this Court but also by the Courts of England, and the judicial process that took place when the French Court at Chandernagar recognized the Will of Kali Churn Bhur expressly provided that Sadhu Churn Mukherjee, the notary who was a witness in this case, was the person who should give notarial copies. I think we must take it that, the Court at Chandernagar having so provided, a copy authenticated by the notarial seal of Sadhu Churn Mukherjee as provided for by the judicial process is a properly authenticated copy within the meaning of section 5, obviously authenticated in the manner directed by the Court at Chandernagar. I think the copy in this case that was produced before the Court was one on which the Court was entitled to act under section 5 of the Probate and Administration Act. That being so, the Court was entitled, if it thought fit, to make the grant of Letters of Administration with the Will annexed without any further evidence at all. It was a Will recognized by the French Court and the lower Court was entitled to act upon it.

Then it is said that this mystic Will executed, no doubt, according to the French Law is not under the terms of the law in Birtish India capable of passing certain immoveable properties that belonged to the deceased in British India. That is not a matter which we need enquire into in the present case. It is quite clear that, in any view, there are considerable assets of moveable property within the limits of British India to which a grant of Letters of Administration with a copy of the Will annexed must be made. Before the executors can get hold of these properties in British India, in any event, a grant of Letters of Administration must be made to them.

In the result, I see no reason to differ from the conclusion arrived at by the learned Judge of the Court below. The present appeal, therefore, fails and must be dismissed with costs, Rs. 250.

SHAMSUL HUDA, J.—I agree.

Provincial Insolvency Act (III of 1907), s. 36—Annulment of transfer—Notice to transferee, form of—Notice to prove debt, whether sufficient.

When a question arises whether a transfer should or should not be annulled under section 36 of the Provincial Insolvency Act, it is requisite that the transferee should have proper notice that proceedings are contemplated under that section and a proper opportunity to put his case before the Court. [p. 169, col. 1.]

The question of proof of a debt under the Provincial Insolvency Act is different from the question of annulling a mortgage under section 36. [p. 169, col. 1.]

Appeal against the order of the District Judge, Burdwan, dated the 4th of September 1915.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Babu Baranasibasi Mukherjee, for the Appellant.—The respondent No. 1 applied to be adjudged an insolvent. His application was granted, and usual notices were given to the creditors mentioned in the list attached to his application. Upon that notice the appellant, who was a secured creditor, filed his mortgage bond and an affidavit in support of it. Subsequently, another creditor Hridoy Nath applied to the District Judge praying for annulment of the mortgage in favour of the appellant. Upon this, the District Judge issued a general order on creditors whose debts had been contested to prove their debts. But no notice as contemplated by section 36 of the Provincial Insolvency Act was given to the appellant requiring him to show cause why his mortgage should not be annulled. The order of the District Judge to prove the contested debts was a general order, and in deciding the question of proof of the debts the learned District Judge lost sight of the distinction between secured and unsecured creditors. So far as the appellant is concerned, the result of the lower Court's decision is the annulment of the mortgage under section 36 of the Provincial Insolvency Act, although the procedure for annulment of a transfer under section 36 was not followed. Consequently the order should be set aside.

Babu Bankim Chandra Mukerjee, for the Respondents.—The appellant had proper notice of the proceedings. He was called upon to prove his debt, and he failed to prove his rights as a secured creditor, consequently the Court below is right in holding that the debt alleged to be due to the appellant has not been proved. Even if there was any irregularity in the service of notice, it was not such a material irregularity as would render the order of the District Judge liable to be set aside.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of an order made in the course of insolvency proceedings. One Ganes Chandra Pal was on his own application adjudged an insolvent on the 10th January 1914. On the 11th May 1915 notices were issued to the creditors to prove their claims within a month. The creditors were those mentioned in the list attached to the insolvent's application. Among the creditors was the appellant Jugalpada Dutta. He claimed to be a secured creditor and it appears that in response to the notice to which I have referred, he filed in proof of his claim the mortgage bond executed by the insolvent.

in his favour together with an affidavit. On the 12th June 1915, another creditor Hridoy Nath Pal presented an application to the District Judge in which he prayed inter alia that the mortgage in favour of the appellant should be annulled under section 36 of the Provincial Insolvency Act, at any rate that is how we understand the prayer in question. Upon that the District Judge appears to have issued a general order upon the creditors whose debts had been contested to prove them. It does not appear from the order-sheet that any special notice was issued to the appellant calling upon him to show cause why his mortgage should not be annulled. Apparently the matter in which the appellant was interested with other matters came before the District Judge on the 28th August 1915. One witness was examined on behalf of the creditor Hridoy Nath Pal. The learned District Judge made his order from which this appeal is preferred on the 4th September 1915. He first dealt with certain other matters and then coming to the appellant's mortgage bond he says:—"In the case of Jugal though there are two witnesses named one is illiterate." Then he adds referring to Jugal's debt and the debt of another creditor: "It is noticeable that the affidavits are written by the insolvent's Pleader or by his clerk. Those debts, therefore, cannot be said to have been proved." It is obvious that the learned Judge regarded the question before him merely as a question of the proof of the debt though, in the result so far as the appellant is concerned, the order has been treated as in effect an order annulling the mortgage under section 36. The distinction which the Act makes between secured and unsecured debts was lost sight of. The materials before the learned Judge were not sufficient to justify him in making an order under section 36; and unless the order is treated as an order under that section, then in relation to a secured debt it has no meaning. We must add that when a question arises whether a transfer should or should not be annulled under section 36, it is requisite that the transferee should have proper notice that proceedings are contemplated under that section and a proper opportunity to put his case before the Court. In the present case the proceedings were of an extremely summary character and no one seems to have realized either at their inception or during their progress that any question under section 36 was involved. In the circumstances and on the materials on this record we are of opinion that this order cannot be allowed to stand.

The result is that the order appealed from will be set aside so far as the appellant is concerned; but at the same time we must leave it open to the District Judge, if occasion should arise for so doing, to deal with the matter according to law under section 36 of the Act. In the meantime it will be open to the appellant to take what steps he may be advised to take in order to realise his security. The appellant himself was in some respects to blame for not bringing before the learned District Judge and not insisting upon his own rights as a secured creditor. We shall, therefore, make no order as to costs.

Order set aside.

PUNJAB CHIEF COURT.

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No. 1621 OF 1914.

May 30, 1917.

Present:—Mr. Shah Din, Chief Judge, and Mr. Justice LeRossignol.

CHOTHA RAM—PLAINTIFF—APPELLANT

versus

Musammat KARMON BAI AND ANOTHER—DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 47, O. XXI, r. 95—Execution—Sale—Suit by auction-purchaser decree-holder for possession, maintainability of.

A decree-holder who purchases at a sale held in execution of his decree property belonging to his judgment-debtor is in the same position as would be any other purchaser at an auction sale held in execution of a decree. If after confirmation of the sale in his favour such an auction-purchaser fails to obtain from the judgment-debtor possession of the property purchased, he may claim possession not only by an application under Order XXI, rule 95 of the Civil Procedure Code, but also by suit. Section 47 of the Code is not a bar to such a suit and does not apply to such an application. The subject-matter of such a suit does not relate to the "execution, discharge or satisfaction of the decree" within the meaning of section 47. [p. 171, col. 2.]

The summary remedy provided for by rule 95 of Order XXI of the Code is concurrent with a remedy by separate suit, and either the one or the other can be availed of by the aggrieved party as the circumstances of a particular case may require It does not follow that because the summary remedy provided for by rule 95 of Order XXI can be given to the decree-holder purchaser by the executing Court, if he fails to avail himself of that remedy or seeks it, but is unsuccessful, he is precluded from seeking the alternative remedy by regular suit which is open to other auction-purchasers, simply because he happened at one time to be the holder of a decree against the opposite party. [p. 173, col. 1.]

Second appeal from the decree of the Additional Divisional Judge, Multan, dated the 2nd April 1914.

The Hon'ble Mr. Muhammad Shafi, for the Appellant.

Mr. Hargopal, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

SHAH DIN, C. J.—The facts of this case as given in the judgment of the Divisional Judge are not disputed. On the 27th June 1891 Chotha Ram obtained a decree for Rs. 9,690-14-0 against Topan Lal and Asu Lal in the Court of the District Judge of Shikarpur in Sindh. The greater part of the decretal amount was realized in Shikarpur, and in respect of the balance Rs. 1,178-9 6, the decree was transferred to the Muzaffargarh District in the Punjab; and as both the judgment-debtors had meanwhile died execution was taken out against their widows, namely, Musammat Karmon Bai and Musammat Lalo Bai, who were duly brought on the record as the legal representatives of their deceased husbands. A residential house which is situate in village Khangarh in the Muzaffargarh District was attached in execution of the decree. The house in question was already mortgaged to certain mortgagees for Rs. 1,200; the mortgagees objected to the attachment, and on the 15th December 1900 their objections were allowed and the house was ordered to be sold in execution of Chotha Ram's decree subject to the mortgage just mentioned. At the auction sale the house was purchased by the decree-holder with the permission of the Court, and the sale was confirmed by the Court on the 11th January 1901. The certificate of sale was granted to the decree-holder on 26th February 1901.

One of the judgment-debtors, Musammat Karmon Bai, filed an objection praying for reservation of her rights in the house in question; but her objection was disallowed on the 16th February 1901. She then brought a regular suit to establish her right of residence in the house, but the suit was dismissed on 19th January 1903 on the ground that it was barred by section 244 of the Civil Procedure Code, Act XIV of 1882. Thereafter on the 31st August 1906 Chotha Ram, decree holder, applied to be put in possession of the house. To this application objections were raised by Musammat Karmon Bai, and Chotha Ram's application was rejected on the 22nd October 1906; he appealed from the order of rejection, but his appeal was dismissed on the 7th March 1907.

On the 16th November 1912 Chotha Ram brought the suit which has given rise to the present appeal, for recovery of possession of the house on the strength of the auction sale dated the 11th January 1901. Musammat Karmon Bai resisted the suit on several grounds, one of which was that since the plaintiff was himself the decree-holder he could seek his remedy only in the executing Court and could not bring a regular suit to recover possession of the house in question. The District Judge held, following the Full Bench decision of the Allahabad High Court in Bhagwati v. Banwari Lal (1), that the plaintiff's suit was maintainable; and he decreed the suit accordingly conditional on plaintiff paying a certain sum of money to Musammat Karmon Bai. On appeal the Divisional Judge was of opinion, in view of certain observations contained in two of the judgments of this Court, Musammat Har Devi v. Ramjiwan (2) and Than Singh v. Kazim Ali (3), that the plaintiff's suit was barred by section 47 of the Civil Procedure Code. He accepted the appeal of Musammat Karmon Bai accordingly, and dismissed the plaintiff's suit.

A second appeal has been preferred to this Court by the plaintiff Chotha Ram; and the question which we have to decide is, as to whether section 47 of the Civil Procedure Code is a bar to the suit brought by him to recover possession of the house which was sold to him in execution of his decree in 1901. We have carefully read all these authorities: but we consider it unnecessary to discuss them in detail, as the question involved in this case has been very carefully considered by the Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court in Bhagwati v. Banwari Lal (1), and our own view entirely coincides with that propounded by the majority of the Full Bench in that case. There it was held by the majority of the learned Judges that a decree-holder, whether holding a decree for sale on a mortgage or a simple money decree, who purchases at a sale held in execution of such decree property belonging to his judgment-debtor is in the same position as would be any other purchaser at an auction sale held in execution of a decree. If after confirmation of the sale in his favour the auction-purchaser fails to obtain from the judgment-debtor possession of the property purchased, he may claim possession not only by an application under section 318 or section 319 of the Code of Civil Procedure (of 1882), but also by suit; section 244 of the Code is not a bar to such suit and does not apply to such an application.

Section 47 (1) of the present Civil Procedure Code, which has been relied on as a bar to the present suit, runs as follows:—"All questions arising between the parties to the suit in which the decree was passed, or their representatives, and relating to the execution, discharge or satisfaction of the decree, shall be determined by the Court executing the decree and not by a separate suit." The question for decision in the present case, therefore, is whether the relief sought by the plaintiff against the defendant, Musammat Karmon Bai, involves a question arising between the parties to the suit in which the decree was passed, or their representatives, and "relating to the execution, discharge or satisfaction of the decree;" for it is obvious that if the question arising between the parties does not relate to the execution, discharge or satisfaction of the decree, the mere circumstance that it arises between the parties to the suit in which the original decree was passed, or their representatives, is not sufficient of itself to bar the present suit under the provisions of section 47 (1) of the Code. A reference to the execution record in this case shows that the house in suit was purchased by the decree-holder, Chotha Ram, with the permission of the executing Court in January 1901, and that on the 16th February 1901 the Court entered up satisfaction of the decree in part and filed the record of the execution proceedings. It also appears from the record that the decree-holder paid into Court Rs. 50, being five per cent. of the purchase-money (which was Rs. 1,000) as commission on the amount of the purchase-money; and that the balance of the purchase-money was set off against the amount due on the decree. This was done under Order XXI, rule 72 (2), Civil Procedure Code, which runs as follows:—"Where a decree-holder purchases with such permission (i. e., the express permission of the Court) the purchase-money and the amount due on the decree may, subject to the provisions of section 73, be set off against one another and the Court executing the decree shall enter up satisfaction of the decree in whole or in part accordingly." In this connection we may also refer to rule 84 (2) of Order XXI which lays down that —"Where the decree-holder is the purchaser and is entitled to set off the purchase-money under rule 72, the Court may dispense with the requirements of this rule," i. e, the auction-purchaser's obligation to pay, immediately after he has been declared purchaser of the property of the judgment-debtor, a deposit of 25 per cent. on the amount of his purchase money to the officer conducting the sale. Under rule 85 the full amount of the purchase-money payable has to be paid by the purchaser into Court within fifteen days from the date of the auction-sale; but if the auction-purchaser is the decree-holder, in calculating the amount to be so paid into Court, he can have the advantage of any set-off to which he may be entitled under rule 72. Rules 72 (2), 84 (2) and 85, when read together, make it clear that the auction-purchaser who happens to be the decree-holder is entitled to certain concessions, as compared with an ordinary auction-purchaser, in so far as he is not required (a) to pay a deposit of 25 per cent. on the amount of his purchase-money under rule 84 (1), and (b) to pay into Court the full amount of the purchase money that remains to be paid under rule 85, and is entitled under rule 72 (2) to set-off the purchase-money against the amount due on his decree. As soon as the set off referred to in rule 72 (2) has been allowed, the Court executing the decree is bound to enter up satisfaction of the decree, in whole or in part, according as the set-off has the effect of wiping off the whole amount of the decree or only a portion of it. It follows from the provisions just referred to that the legal effect of the concessions made by the Code of Civil Procedure in favour of the decree-holder who purchases at a Court sale the property of his judgment-debtor with the express permission of the Court, is precisely the same as if the decree-holder had made to the officer conducting the auction sale a deposit of 25 per cent. on the amount of his purchase-money under rule 84 (1) and thereafter paid into Court, the balance of the purchase-money as required by rule 85, but had subsequently received from the Court the amount due on his decree, in whole or in part, and the Court had entered up satisfaction of the decree accordingly. It is exceedingly difficult to see how the position of a decree-holder who has purchased with the permission of the Court property belonging to the judgment-debtor, which is sold in execution of his decree, is (barring the special concessions above referred to which are made in his favour simply and solely as a matter of convenience) different from the position of an ordinary auction-purchaser, more specially after his decree has been executed in whole or in part and the executing Court has, as required by rule 72 (2), entered up satisfaction of the same accordingly. Where the whole of the decretal amount has been set off against the purchase-money, the decree has been fully discharged or satisfied, and it follows that the execution proceedings have come to an end and the executing Court is functus officio. In such an event the proper procedure is to enter up full satisfaction of the decree and to consign the execution record to the record room. The same procedure must apply to a case in which only a portion of the decretal amount is set off against the purchase-money, for there also the decree being satisfied pro tanto the Court executing the decree must enter up satisfaction of the decree in part and file the execution proceedings so far as they relate to the sale of the judgment-debtor's property in part satisfaction of the decree.

If, therefore, after the Court executing the decree has entered up satisfaction of the decree in whole or in part, a dispute arises between the quondam decree-holder in his new capacity of auction-purchaser and the quondam judgment-debtor, or their representatives, regarding the possession of the property sold at the public auction held in execution of the decree, the dispute cannot properly be said to relate to "the execution, discharge or satisfaction of the decree", which under section 47 of the Civil Procedure Code can only be determined by the executing Court. It is no doubt true that under Order XXI, rule 95, of the Civil Procedure Code the executing Court is empowered, on the application of the auction-purchaser who may also be the decree-holder, to order delivery of possession of the immoveable property of the judgment-debtor which has been sold at a public auction; but this summary power has been conferred on the executing Court in the interests of the auction-purchasers (including the decree-holder purchasers) and the judgment-debtors in order to save expense and trouble incidental to litigation. The summary remedy provided for by rule 95 is concurrent with a remedy by separate suit [Musammat Har Devi v. Ramjiwon (2) and Than Singh v. Kazim Ali (3)] and either the one remedy or the other can be availed of by the aggrieved party as the circumstances of a particular case may require. But it does not by any means follow that because the summary remedy provided for by rule 95 can be given to the decree-holder purchaser by the executing Court, if he fails to avail himself of that remedy or seeks it, but is unsuccessful, he is precluded from seeking the alternative remedy by regular suit, which is clearly open to other auction-purchasers, simply because he happened at one time to be the holder of a decree against the opposite party. There is no reason in principle why his character as decree-holder should persist, even after his decree has been satisfied in full, by reason of his having purchased property belonging to his judgment-debtor, and why the questions arising between him and the quondam judgment-debtor regarding the possession of the property purchased by him should be considered as questions relating to the execution, discharge or satisfaction of his decree.

Turning now to the authorities, we find that the majority of the Judges composing the Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court in Bhagwati v. Banwari Lal (1) have held that, in the circumstances stated above, the decree-holder who purchases at an auction sale with the permission of the executing Court occupies precisely the same position as any other auction-purchaser; that a question arising between him and the judgment-debtor, whose property has been sold, as to the possession thereof, after the confirmation of the sale, is not a question relating to the execution, discharge or satisfaction of the decree; and that the decree-holder is not precluded by the provisions of section 47 of the Civil Procedure Code from bringing a separate suit to recover possession of the property purchased by him. We have carefully read the judgments of the learned Judges who differ from the view of the majority; but with the greatest possible respect to them, we venture to think that the arguments adduced by them in support of their conclusion are less convincing than those advanced by the majority and which have been so lucidly expressed in the judgment of Mr. Justice Banerji. So far as the Calcutta High Court is concerned, there is a conflict of opinion among the learned Judges of that Court On the one hand there are the cases reported as Madhusudan Das v. Gobinda Pria Chowdhurani (8) and Sariatoolla Molla v. Raj Kumar Roy (9), Ram Narain Sahoo v. Bandi Pershad (10) and Hari Charan Dutt v. Mon Mohan Nandy (13), which support the view propounded by the dissentient minority in Bhagwati v. Banwari Lal (1); while, on the other hand, the decision of the majority in the Allahabad Full Bench case receives support from Bhimal Das v. Musammat Ganesha Koer (11) and Mahomed Mosraf v. Habil Mia (12).

The Madras High Court has in a series of recent decisions held the same view as has been held by the dissentient minority in Bhagwati v. Banwari Lal (1); Kasinatha Ayyar v. Uthumansa Rowthan (15), Kattayat Pathumayi v. Raman Menon (16) and Ram Narain Sahoo v. Bandi Pershad (10). But it will be observed that in Kattayat Pathumayi v. Raman Menon (16) the learned Judges in the course of their judgment say:—"The appellant's Vakil contends that this action is barred by section 244, Civil Procedure Code. If the question were not already settled by more decisions than one of this Court, and of the Calcutta High Court, we should entertain considerable doubt as to whether proceedings taken by a purchaser to obtain possession of the property purchased could be regarded as relating to the execution, discharge or satisfaction of the decree within the meaning of section 244, Civil Procedure Code, when such proceedings could not possibly affect the execution, discharge or satisfaction of the decree." This shows that if the matter were res integra, the learned Judges would have taken the same view as has been held by the majority of the Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court. Similarly in Sandhu Taraganar v. Hussain Sahib (17) the learned Judges who decided the case felt bound, in view of a series of previous rulings of their own Court, to hold that proceedings between a decree holder who has purchased at a Court auction and the judgment-debtor are proceedings relating to the execution, discharge or satisfaction of the decree; otherwise they would have supported the view that such proceedings do not fall within the purview of section 47 of the Civil Procedure Code. In Sultan Sahib Marakayar v. Chidambarum Chettiar (18), in which the point actually decided by the Court was one of limitation relating to an application made by the decree-holder auction-purchaser for delivery of possession under section 318 of the Civil Procedure Code of 1882, the learned Judges observed:—

"It is clear that an application by a decree-holder for delivery of possession of property purchased in execution is not in strictness an application for execution of the decree, a direction for delivery of possession being no part of the decree, and though we may be bound by a number of decisions to hold that such an application raises a question relating to the execution of the decree, it does not follow, and we do not think, that it is an application for execution." It will thus be seen that the Madras High Court is disposed to favour the principle enunciated in the Full Bench decision of the Allahabad High Court, but that it has refrained, in accordance with the maxim of stare decisis, from disturbing a series of its own previous decisions in which the opposite view has been propounded.

In Sadashiv Mahadu v. Narayan Vithal (19) it was held by a Division Bench of the Bombay High Court that a decree-holder by becoming a purchaser at a Court sale of property belonging to the judgment-debtor did not cease to be a party to the suit within the meaning of section 47, Civil Procedure Code, and that proceedings for delivery of possession of such property were proceedings in execution of the decree and fell within the scope of the said section. The learned Judges followed Madhusudan Das v. Gobinda Pria Chowdhurani (8), Ram Narain Sahoo v. Bandi Pershad (10), Kasinatha Ayyar v. Uthumansa Rowthan (15) and dissented from the Full Bench decision of the Allahabad High Court in Bhagwati v. Banwari Lal (1). After referring to these decisions the learned Judges say at page 458 * of the report:—

"It is contended that the execution proceedings came to an end when the property was sold and the sale confirmed. This contention does not appear to us to be sound. We are of opinion that proceedings in execution (so far as the decree-holder is concerned) are not completed until the decree-holder obtains the benefit of the sale held in execution of his decree. In Bapuchand Jethiram Gujar v. Mugutrao 22) it was held by this Court that an application by a judgment-creditor for payment to him of money which has been paid into Court on his account in execution of his decree, is an application to take a step in aid of execution of the decree. In that case Farran, C. J., observes that when money is paid into Court in satisfaction of a decree, the execution of the decree with regard to such payment is not fully completed till the money has been actually paid by the Court to the judgment-creditor. That is also the view taken by the Madras and Allahabad High Courts..... If then an application made by a decree-holder to be paid the proceeds of a sale held in execution of his decree is a step-in-aid of execution, we do not see any difference in principle between such an application and an application made by a decree-holder, who is also the auction-purchaser, to be put in possession of that which represents the money which would have been paid into Court, if a third party had purchased the property. We think that the execution of the decree is not complete and final, until in the one case the decree-holder actually receives the sale-proceeds through the Court, and in the other case until he secures possession of the property through the Court."

With all possible respect to the learned Judges we find ourselves unable to accept the reasoning employed in the above passage. The weakness of the argument will be clear from a simple illustration. Suppose A obtains a decree for Rs. 500 against B; A takes out execution of the decree and in due course purchases at an auction sale, with the permission of the Court, a house belonging to B for Rs. 1,000. The sale is confirmed by the Court and a sale certificate is thereafter duly granted to A. Suppose further that A does not take advantage of the special concessions given him, as has been explained in the earlier part of this judgment, by Order XXI, rules 72 (2), 84 (2) and 85, Civil Procedure Code, and pays into Court the full amount of the purchase-money, Rs. 1,000, within the time fixed. A few days after, he makes an application to the Court to be paid the amount of the decree due to him, and the money is paid over to him and the balance is handed over to the judgment-debtor. Thereupon the Court enters up full satisfaction of the decree and consigns the execution case to the record room. Here up to a certain point the decree-holder has acted as if he were a third party; i. e., he has paid the purchase money into Court like any other auction-purchaser; but thereafter he has applied for payment to him of part of the money paid into Court in full satisfaction of his decree; and on the money being paid to him by the Court, the execution is complete and final even according to the view of the learned Judges of the Bombay High Court. Now, suppose that B does not deliver possession of the house sold to A, and A applies under Order XXI, rule 95, Civil Procedure Code, to the executing Court for delivery of possession of the house. Is his application one "relating to the execution, discharge or satisfaction of the decree?" It clearly is not, for the simple reason that A having received the sale-proceeds through the Court in full satisfaction of his decree, the execution proceedings came to an end; and, therefore, in the case suppose A stands on precisely the same footing as would any other auction-purchaser who has had nothing whatever to do with the execution of the decree against B. Or suppose that A does not make an application to be put in possession of the house summarily under rule 95 aforesaid; but that after the lapse of a few years he brings a regular suit for possession of the house against B, can it be said that the dispute between A and B regarding the liability of B to deliver possession of the house to A relates to the execution, discharge or satisfaction of the decree which had originally been passed in favour of A? There can be but one answer to this question, for upon no reasonable grounds can it be argued that A, having received the sale-proceeds of the house through the executing Court and having thus had his decree fully satisfied, is still entitled to secure possession of the house through that Court although that Court became functus officio, so far as the execution of A's decree was concerned, many years before the institution of the suit in question. It seems to us that the mistake in applying the provisions of section 47, Civil Procedure Code, to a case of this kind has arisen mainly from the fact that some of the Courts have lost sight of the special provisions enacted in the Civil Procedure Code for the benefit of the decree-holder who purchases property belonging to the judgment debtor with the permission of the executing Court. But for those special provisions the decree-holder who purchases the property of his judgment-debtor at a Court sale would in all respects be treated as any other auction-purchaser, and in that event the reasoning employed by the learned Judges of the Bombay High Court in Sadashiv Mahadu v. Narayan Vithal (19) would be entirely out of place.

Coming now to the decisions of our own Court, the one directly in point is Bhaga Shah v. Bura Shah (20). There it was held by a Division Bench that the mere circumstance that a decree-holder who had purchased his judgment-debtor's property at an auction sale sued as an auction-purchaser did not get over the fact that he was a decree-holder who had brought the property in suit to sale; and that as the suit was brought against the judgment-debtor in the execution proceedings and the question involved related to the execution of the decree in which both the plaintiff and the defendant were parties, the suit was barred by the provisions of section 244, Civil Procedure Code of 1882. No authorities in support of this view are discussed in the judgment; but reference is made to Sodhi Hukam Singh v. Sardar Arjan Singh (23) and Kashi Ram v. Harnam Das (24), where all the authorities are stated to have been collected. On turning to Sodhi Hukam Singh v. Sardar Arjan Singh (23) and Kashi Ram v. Harnam Das (24), we find that those decisions do not directly relate to the question now under consideration, but that they only indirectly lend support to the view held in Bhaga Shah v, Bura Shah (20). In Musammat Har Devi v. Ramjiwan (2) and Than Singh v. Kazim Ali (3), there are certain obiter dicta to the effect that where a decree-holder has purchased property belonging to his judgment-debtor and has then brought a suit to recover possession of the property purchased, the provisions of section 244, Civil Procedure Code of 1882, operate to bar the suit because the opposing parties are the decree-holder and the judgment-debtor, who were parties to the suit in which the decree was passed (see pages 91 and 368 of the report*). But the question was not directly before the Court for decision; nor were the learned Judges called upon to consider whether a suit of the above description could be said to involve a question relating to the execution, discharge or satisfaction of the decree within the meaning of section 244, Civil Procedure Code of 1882. The two decisions of 1893 are, therefore, of very little value in the present case and with all possible deference to the learned Judges who were parties to Bhaga Shah v. Bura Shah (20), we are of opinion that the decision in that case is unsound and we dissent from it

Lastly, it was pointed out by the Pleader for the respondent, Musammat Karmon Bai, that when in 1901 she brought a regular suit to establish her right of residence in the house now in dispute, it was contended in the Divisional Judge's Court by the present appellant, Chotha Ram, that the suit was barred under section 244, Civil Procedure Code of 1882, and that that contention was accepted by the Divisional Judge and the respondent's suit was dismissed on that ground alone. Such being the case, it was argued, the present appellant is estopped from urging in this suit that section 47 of the new Code is not applicable to it, because execution proceedings came to an end when the certificate of sale relating to the house was granted to the appellant in February 1901. In support of this contention reliance was placed on the case of Jagannadha Rao v. Katreddi Kurmayya (25). But that decision is not at all applicable to the facts of the present litigation. There it was held that the defendants to the suit who pleaded, inter alia, that the plaintiff could not proceed in execution of a prior decree for delivery of possession of properties and had a prior application dismissed on the ground could not in defence to a suit instituted on the strength of the order plead section 244, Civil Procedure Code, as a bar. The doctrine of estoppel by pleadings enunciated in the Madras case clearly does not help the respondent in the present case, inasmuch as the present suit which is brought by the appellant against the respondent has nothing whatever to do with the pleadings in the suit of 1901 brought by the respondent against the appellant or with the final order passed by the Court in that suit.

For the foregoing reasons we hold that the suit brought by the appellant, Chotha Ram, is not barred by section 47, Civil Procedure Code. We accordingly accept this appeal, set aside the judgment and decree of the Divisional Judge and remand the case under Order XLI, rule 23, Civil Procedure Code, to the District Judge, Multan, for decision of the appeal with reference to the merits of the case.

Appeal accepted; Case remanded.

CALCUTTA HIGH COURT.

CRIMINAL REVISION PETITION No. 707 OF 1917.

August 10, 1917.

Present:—Mr. Justice Chitty and Mr. Justice Richardson.

CHANDI CHARAN GIRI AND OTHERS—PETITIONERS

versus

GADADHAR PRODHAN AND ANOTHER—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 195, cls. (6) and (7)—Sanction for prosecution—Bengal Tenancy Act (VIII of 1885), ss. 69, 70, Collector acting under, whether Court subordinate to District Court.

A Collector acting under sections 69 and 70 of the Bengal Tenancy Act is a Court within the meaning of section 195, Criminal Procedure Code. [p. 177, col. 2; p. 178, col. 2.]

Proceedings under sections 69 and 70 of the Bengal Tenancy Act are of a civil nature and the Collector's Court trying such proceedings must be deemed to be subordinate for the purpose of section 195, Criminal Procedure Code, to the principal Court of original civil jurisdiction in the District, i.e., the Court of the District Judge. [p. 178, col. 1; p. 179, col. 1.]

Per Chitty, J. (Richardson, J, hesitating).—The principal Court of original jurisdiction within the meaning of section 195, clause 7, does not necessarily refer to a Court of any particular class. It is a Civil or Criminal or Revenue Court as the case may be. [p. 178, col. 1.]

Per Richardson, J.—The words "where no appeal lies" in clause 7, section 195, Criminal Procedure Code, are wide enough to include both a particular case or class of cases in which no appeal lies as well a Court from which no appeal lies in any case, e.g., a Small Cause Court. [p. 178, col. 2.]

Per Chitty, J.—Although these words in clause 7, section 195, Criminal Procedure Code, are capable of such a wide meaning, yet the Legislature referred to Courts whose decisions are made final by law, e.g., Small Cause Courts [p. 178, col. 1.]

Rule against the order of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, Contai, dated the 3rd January 1917.

JUDGMENT.

CHITTY, J.—In this case the petitioners Chandi Charan Giri and Gajendra Barik applied to the Sub-Divisional Officer of Contai, exercising the powers of a Collector, for appraisement of produce under section 69 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. In those proceedings the officer deputed to hold a local enquiry reported that the petitioners had made use of forged receipts. On this report the Sub-Divisional Officer refused their application, and at the instance of their opponents granted sanction for their prosecution under sections 471 and 209, Indian Penal Code. From that order the petitioners appealed to the Commissioner of the Burdwan Division. The Commissioner held that he had no jurisdiction and that the Court to which the Sub-Divisional Officer's Court was subordinate was that of the District Judge of Midnapore under section 195 (7) (c) of the Criminal Procedure Code. The petitioners then applied to the District Judge, but he threw out their application on the ground that he had no jurisdiction to entertain it. He was of opinion that the Commissioner's Court had jurisdiction, as the Court to which appeals from the decisions of a Collector or officer exercising the powers of a Collector under the Bengal Tenancy Act would ordinarily lie. Against the District Judge's order the petitioners applied to this Court to exercise its revisional powers, and this Rule was issued. It should be noted that in proceedings under section 69 of the Bengal Tenancy Act by section 70 (5) "the Collector may, if he thinks fit, refer any question in dispute between the parties for the decision of a Civil Court, but subject as aforesaid his order shall be final and shall on application to a Civil Court by the landlord or the tenant be enforceable as a decree." There is consequently no appeal from an order of the Collector under section 70.

The Collector acting under sections 69 and 70 is a "Court" within the meaning of section 195, Criminal Procedure Code [see Raghoobuns Sahoy v. Kokil Singh (1)]. The question is to what authority he is to be regarded as subordinate for the purposes of section 195 (6). Section 195 (7) purports to supply the answer, but it is so unfortunately worded as to leave the enquirer in much the same doubt and uncertainty as he was before. The difficulty of interpretation will be apparent if clauses (a) and (b) be omitted. Section 195 (7) will then read: "For the purposes of this section every Court shall be deemed to be subordinate only to the Court, to which appeals from the former Court ordinarily lie, that is to say, (c) where no appeal lies such Court shall be deemed to be subordinate to the principal Court of original jurisdiction within the local limits of whose jurisdiction such first mentioned Court is situate." The difficulty seems to have arisen from the attempt to provide in one clause for cases where an appeal lies as well as for those where no appeal lies.

No doubt the words "where no appeal lies" are wide enough to cover cases, where all decisions of a particular Court are made final by law, e. g., a Small Cause Court, and also cases where a particular order is non-appealable, e. g, the case before us. I am inclined to think that the former class of cases only was referred to by the Legislature in this section 195 (7). If it were not so, the word "ordinarily" in the earlier part of the sub-section would be meaningless. Further, there does not seem to be any good reason for possibly transferring jurisdiction from a Court of one class to a Court of another, simply because an appeal from the particular order in question is forbidden. Nor am I prepared to say that the principal Court of original jurisdiction must necessarily refer to a Court of any particular class. It is a Civil or Criminal or Revenue Court, as the case may be.

In this particular case, however, I think that the difficulty may be surmounted. I cannot agree with the learned District Judge when he says that appeals from the decisions of the Collector under the Bengal Tenancy Act ordinarily lie to the Commissioner of the Division. A perusal of the Act will show that while in some cases an appeal is allowed to the Commissioner, e. g., under section 40 (5), in other cases an appeal lies to the Special Judge i. e., to a Civil Court. If that be so, then under section 195 (7) (b) the nature of the case has to be considered. Proceedings under sections 69 and 70 are clearly of a civil nature. The Collector may state a case for the decision of a Civil Court and his order may be enforced as a decree of a Civil Court. The Collector's Court may, therefore, be deemed to be subordinate to the Civil Court. i. e., the Court of the District Judge, for the purposes of section 195. This is on the assumption that the words "where no appeal lies" refer only to the case where all decisions of a particular Court are not appealable.

If they also refer to a case like the present, where a particular order is not appealable, we arrive at the same result. In that view, it being a matter of a civil nature, the Collector's Court must be regarded as subordinate to the principal Court of original civil jurisdiction, that is, to the Court of the District Judge.

The matter is by no means free from doubt, but this is the conclusion to which I have come after giving the matter my best consideration. I would accordingly make the Rule absolute, set aside the order of the District Judge, and remand the application of the petitioners to his Court to be disposed of on the merits.

RICHARDSON, J.—The opening words of clause (7) of section 195 were apparently intended as a general definition or explanation of the term 'subordinate,' as applied in the previous clauses to a Court.

The sub-clauses of clause (7) were meant, I think, to indicate the result of applying the opening words of the clause to the particular cases dealt with in the sub clauses The words "that is to say" at the end of the opening paragraph refer to the preceding words as a whole, with the sense "which means" or "the result being." The language is not very happy but that seems to me to be its effect.

This Court has held in Raghoobuns Sahoy v. Kokil Singh (1) that a Collector acting in appraisement proceedings under sections 69 and 70 of the Bengal Tenancy Act is a 'Court' within the meaning of section 195 of the Criminal Procedure Code. Reference may also be made to Abdullah Khan v. Emperor (2).

Under clause (5) of section 70 of the Bengal Tenancy Act, the Collector's order is final, There is, therefore, no appeal and the case would seem to fall within clause (7), sub-clause (c) of section 195. The words "where no appeal lies" in that sub-clause are wide enough to include both a particular case or class of cases in which no appeal lies and a Court from which no appeal lies in any case, such as, Small Cause Court [Nibaran Chandra v. Akshoy Kumar Banerjee (3)].

EMPEROR v. JAWAI.

As to the expression "principal Court of original jurisdiction" in sub-clause (c) it has been held in Ajodhia Parshad v. Ram Lal (4) that it means the principal Court of civil, criminal or revenue jurisdiction according to the nature of the case in which the question of sanction arises. I am not aware of any express decision on the point in this Court and I am not sure that it has not been generally assumed in this Province that under the clause, as it stands, "the principal Court of original jurisdiction" is in a District the Court of the District Judge who is also in the great majority of cases the Sessions Judge. However that may be, it is unnecessary in the present case to carry the discussion further. I agree that proceedings before the Collector under sections 69 and 70 of the Bengal Tenancy Act are in their nature civil proceedings and I concur in the order proposed by my learned brother.

Rule made absolute.

Criminal Procedure Code, Act V of 1898, s. 417—Appeal against acquittal—Appellate Court, interference by, when justified—Confession, retracted, use of, against person making it and against co-accused—Corroboration.

Where the findings of fact of a Trial Court are in favour of the accused's innocence, a Court of Appeal will not in an appeal against the order of acquittal interfere with the verdict unless the indications of mistake in the judgment of the lower Court are obvious or the evidence as to the accused's guilt is too strong to be rejected. It is immaterial that the Appellate Court might have arrived at a different conclusion had it been trying the accused as a Court of original jurisdiction. [p. 181, col. 1; p. 183, col. 1.]

A confessing prisoner should not be condemned upon a retracted confession unless it is corroborated in material particulars. [p. 182, col 1.]

Where it is a question of using a confession against a co-accused and the Court is not prepared to accept the confession per se as sufficient, the corroboration ought to be of the kind that not only confirms the general story of the crime but also unmistakably connects the co-accused with the crime. [p. 182, col. 1.]

Appeal from the order of the Additional Sessions Judge, Shahpur at Mianwali, dated the 9th July 1917, acquitting the respondents.

The Government Advocate, for the Appellant.

Mr. Beechey, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The Sessions Judge of the Shahpur Division has acquitted Musammat Jawai of the murder of her husband Gullu, and her co-accused Faujdar of the abetment of the murder. Against the order of acquittal the Local Government has preferred an appeal to this Court under section 417, Criminal Procedure Code, and we have heard the case argued at length by Mr. Petman for the appellant and Mr. Beechey for the accused, and given our anxious and careful consideration to the arguments advanced by the learned Counsel and to the findings arrived at by the learned Sessions Judge.

The deceased Gullu, who was a Machhi of Khushab in the Shahpur District, died on the 13th March 1917 after an illness lasting for about a fortnight, and as his death did not excite any suspicion, his body was buried on that very day. Two days later the Sub-Divisional Magistrate received an anonymous letter charging Musammat Jawai with having killed her husband by administering arsenic to him at the instance of her paramour Faujdar, and it was on the strength of this letter that the corpse was disinterred on the 22nd March and some parts of the viscera were sent to the Chemical Examiner, who detected arsenic, mercury and opium therein. It appears that certain allegations, for which there was no foundation, were made that the exhibits despatched to the Chemical Examiner had been tampered with, and it was consequently considered advisable to exhume the body again, which operation was performed on the 9th May in the presence of the Superintendent of Police with the result that the Chemical Examiner again found arsenic in the remains sent to him for examination.

In the meanwhile the Inspector, who had been conducting the investigation, was superseded by a C. I. D Inspector from Lahore, and this officer in consequence of information received by him from Musammat Jawai's father Karm Ali arrested on the 20th May 1917 both the accused. It is alleged that after a week, namely, on the 27th May, Musammat Jawai threw up the sponge, made a clean breast of the whole affair, and took the Police to her house from which she produced a rag upon which the Chemical Examiner found traces of arsenic. The woman also gave information which led to the removal on the succeeding day of a waistcoat from the person of Faujdar, the right hand pocket of which was found by the Chemical Examiner to contain white arsenic.

On the 29th May she was produced before a Magistrate and made a confession which was retracted on the 7th June, the date on which enquiry into the case commenced before Mr. Blacker, who finally committed the case to the Sessions. On that day she also made an application in writing complaining of torture by the Police and demanding a medical examination. This request was granted, and the Civil Surgeon found three contusions on her right thigh, left thigh and left knee respectively and also a black mark of the size of a rupee on the outer surface of the right shoulder. To this retraction she adhered before the Sessions Judge and denied the commission of the crime.

These are, in brief, the salient features of the case, and it now remains only to set out the motive for the crime. There is ample evidence upon the record, and indeed, it is not seriously contested on behalf of the accused, that the woman had a liaison with Faujdar, that she eloped twice with him, and that the illicit intimacy led the husband and his brother to make reports at the Police station and even to institute criminal complaints which, however, proved abortive, as the woman declined to depose against her paramour. All this took place prior to 1916, and it was argued in the Sessions Court, and the matter has again been pressed in this Court, that the intrigue came to an end more than a year before the occurrence, and that there was consequently no motive for committing the murder. Now, it is true that neither Musammat Jawai in her confession nor the relatives of the deceased in their evidence before the Court referred to any recent incident which could be regarded as an indication of the continuance of the intrigue, and a perusal of their statements shows that they did not make any definite allegation that the liaison continued up to the death of Gullu in March 1917. The learned Sessions Judge is, however, wrong in thinking that Musammat Jawai's confession "is absolutely silent on this point." Though she does not mention any outward indication of the amour during the year preceding her husband's death, she states in clear terms that her intense feeling of love for her paramour was the cause of all "what happened to him (the husband)". The confession does not expressly state either that the intimacy continued up to that event, or that it came to an end; but it certainly conveys an impression that the lapse of time did not produce any appreciable difference and that the two were in love with each other up to the last moment.

While we are not prepared to endorse the remarks of the learned Sessions Judge on the question of the cessation of the intimacy between the two accused, we do not think that there are any clear indications of error on any other matter discussed in his judgment. The learned Government Advocate has cited the well-known judgment of this Court in King-Emperor v. Chattar Singh (1), which enunciates the principle governing appeals against orders of acquittal, and has asked us to apply the test laid down therein to the present case. Now, that very judgment points out that "the finding of fact of a Court, which has the evidence before itself, is ordinarily entitled to great weight and should be set aside by the Court of Appeal only when the indications of mistake are clear, and this is specially true in cases where the finding is in favour of the accused's innocence. If in such a case the evidence is all oral and its credibility is a mere matter of opinion without involving other considerations, the opinion of the Court which heard the witnesses must be treated as almost conclusive. Again, if the evidence is such that opinions may reasonably vary as to its worth, the Court of Appeal will hardly adopt the view adverse to the accused and believe the evidence as to his guilt, which the lower Court has disbelieved, and take upon itself to set aside the verdict of acquittal. The indications of mistake must be obvious, or the evidence too strong to be rejected, before the Court will interfere."

Now the assessors were unanimously of opinion that the guilt of the accused had not been established and the learned Sessions Judge upon an examination of the entire material before him has returned the verdict of acquittal. His remarks showing that the intrigue between the couple had come to an end are probably wrong, though it can hardly be said that the error is a clear one; but we are unable to discover any other clear error which would warrant the reversal of the verdict in favour of the accused. Indeed, we are by no means certain that arsenic was the cause, or at any rate, the sole cause of the death. Now, the first report of the Chemical Examiner shows that not only arsenic, but also mercury was discovered in the stomach, kidney, spleen, liver and intestines, and though the medical witness, who conducted the post mortem examination, says in his examination-in-chief that the Chemical Examiner's reports combined with symptoms such as discolouration of mouth, pharynx and gullet, perforation of stomach and detection of arsenic in the bone show that the cause of death was most probably arsenic, his cross-examination indicates that discolouration of the mouth, etc., and the perforation of the stomach could be produced by other causes, and that mercury as well as arsenic is both irritant and corrosive. So far as the symptoms observed by the medical witness are concerned, they are compatible with mercurial poisoning just as they are with arsenical poisoning, and there is no reliable evidence to show how mercury got into the body. The woman in her confession says: "Faujdar told me that he had instructed Sultan Ahmad that whenever I needed some medicine, he would fetch it for me. My husband's mind sickened on the third day. I went to Sultan Ahmad. He fetched me some draught and a pill. My husband took the pill and the draught on the 3rd day and died of it" Now, it is possible that the pill and the draught contained mercury as well as opium which was found in the stomach and intestines; but it would be unsafe to offer any definite opinion on the subject. The testimony of Gullu's relatives shows that he did not vomit at all, and though Karam Ali tried to improve upon the version related by him before the Committing Magistrate by stating in the Sessions Court that he had seen the deceased vomit once or twice, there can be no manner of doubt that this addition is a subsequent invention and does not represent the truth. It is thus clear that arsenic must have been administered in very small doses, and it cannot be said with any certainty that the death was due to arsenic or to mercury, or to both.

Karam Ali deposes that his daughter informed him that Faujdar had given her poison in a packet, and that she had given that poison to the deceased; and that she asked the witness to hush up the matter. The learned Counsel for the respondents impeaches the veracity of this witness and points out that he is anxious to get hold of the property of the deceased, which he cannot do unless he gets rid of the latter's widow and that this greed is, inter alia, a reason for his falsely implicating his own daughter. The learned Counsel has also referred to other reasons summarised in the judgment of the Sessions Judge at page 56, lines 30 36, which the learned Judge considers to be fairly good reasons for his giving evidence against his daughter. Karam Ali's conduct as father does, no doubt, appear to be unnatural, and it cannot be supposed that it is his regard for truth that has impelled him to give the most damning evidence against his own daughter. It is manifest that on one matter at least, namely, the deceased having vomited prior to his death, he has perjured himself.

In view of all the circumstances we think that Karam Ali is not a person whose word can be implicitly relied upon.

Musammat Jawai's confession recorded by the Magistrate on 29th May contains a long and circumstantial narrative of the long standing intrigue between her and her paramour, and of the various events prior to and after the death of her husband, and we agree with the learned Sessions Judge that this confession was not the result of torture, and that the simple injuries discovered by the Civil Surgeon on her person were probably self-inflicted. At the same time it is obvious that for full one week, namely, from 20th May, when she was arrested, up to the 27th May, when she is alleged to have made an incriminating statement to the Police, she remained firm and we cannot, therefore, say that the learned Sessions Judge has committed a mistake in drawing the inference that "she was very closely pressed to make a confession" during the period. It would be idle to contend that she was overtaken by repentence and consequently made a clean breast of the whole affair.

One thing is, however, beyond question that at a very early opportunity, indeed on the first day when the Committing Magistrate commenced to record the evidence for the prosecution, she retracted her confession; and the principle of law is firmly established that a confessing prisoner should not be condemned upon such a confession, unless it is corroborated in material particulars. As laid down in Jawan v. Emperor (2), "experience and common sense show that in the absence of corroboration in material particulars it is not safe to convict on a confession unless from the peculiar circumstances in which it was made, and judging from the reasons, alleged or apparent, of the retraction, there remains a high degree of certainty that the confession, notwithstanding its having been resiled from, is genuine." Further, when it is a question of using a confession against a co-accused and the Court would not be prepared to accept the confession per se as sufficient, the corroboration ought to be of the kind that not only confirms the general story of the crime but also unmistakably connects the co-accused with the crime.

Now, the learned Sessions Judge holds that the production of the arsenic infected rag from her house by Musammat Jawai is not a sufficient corroboration to warrant her conviction for murder. It appears strange, as the learned Counsel argues, that while the murder was carefully planned and carried out, and all reasonable precautions to divert suspicion were adopted, the rag which originally contained the packet of arsenic was allowed to remain in the house for ten weeks. Per contra it can be argued that Musammat Jawai had no sort of idea that there was any arsenic sticking to the rag, and did not, therefore, consider it necessary to destroy it. Be that as it may, the matter has been duly considered by the lower Court and we do not think we would be justified in upsetting its conclusion on the ground of the quantum of evidence required to corroborate the confession.

As against Faujdar, the only corroborating evidence, apart from the motive, is the discovery of arsenic in his waistcoat pocket in pursuance of the information supplied by the woman. Now, it is common ground that this accused was in possession of arsenic, having purchased from Kishen Chand (P. W. No. 9) two tolas in March 1916 and two and a half tolas on 8th March 1917. Both these purchases are admitted by Faujdar, who, however, explains that he bought arsenic for medical purposes, namely, for preparing tonic and kushta. Now, the Sub-Inspector Jawahar Singh deposes that Faujdar delivered to him on 20th March 1917 two and a half tolas of arsenic, which, he said, he had purchased from Kishen Chand, and the learned Sessions Judge thinks that the arsenic handed over to the witness was that purchased on the 8th March 1917. Mr. Petman, however, retorts that Faujdar was in possession of other arsenic which could be used for poisoning the deceased, but assuming that this contention is correct, it is obvious that the accused did not stand in need of making a purchase in March 1917 in order to administer poison to Gullu. Considering that Faujdar was ex hypothesi in possession of arsenic on 20th March 1917, the discovery in May of the traces of the poison on the waistcoat pocket cannot per se be regarded as an incriminating circumstance. It was contended on behalf of the accused in the lower Court that the packet of arsenic purchased in March 1917 might have been placed by Faujdar in the pocket of his waistcoat and might have left traces of the poison therein, and this contention was considered by the Sessions Judge as "perfectly possible". It is to be observed that the Sub-Inspector does not depose to anything which would negative the contention. The matter so far is capable of explanation. Mr. Petman, however, points out that it was Musammat Jawai who supplied the information which led to the discovery, and this circumstance lends support to the case for the prosecution. But it is to be remembered that ex concesso the couple were on very intimate terms, and that Musammat Jawai's knowledge of her lover having arsenic in his pocket may, therefore, be ascribed to more causes than one, and it cannot be laid down positively that the poison alleged to have been used in the commission of the crime came from the pocket of Faujdar.

The above discussion contains practically all that can be urged on both sides, and after viewing the case as a whole in the light of the conclusions reached by the learned Sessions Judge and giving due consideration to the question of the motive, we are not prepared to hold that the test prescribed by King-Emperor v. Chattar Singh (1) has been satisfied. We consider that there is a good deal to be said in favour of the case for the prosecution; but as pointed out in a Division Bench judgment of this Court in Criminal Appeal No. 1013 of 1913 [Emperor v. Bishen Singh (3)], it is immaterial that we might ourselves have arrived at a different conclusion, had we been trying the accused persons as a Court of original jurisdiction.

Accordingly we dismiss the appeal, and direct that the respondents, who were arrested in pursuance of an order of this Court passed under section 427, be released forthwith.

Appeal dismissed.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 369—Trial for theft—Conviction and sentence—Subsequent sentence on account of previous conviction, validity of—Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), ss. 75, 379.

Accused was tried, convicted and sentenced under section 379 of the Penal Code. There was also a charge against the accused under section 75 of the Code read with section 379, which was not proceeded with until after the sentence in respect of the offence under section 379 had been passed:

Held, that the trial came to an end when sentence was pronounced in respect of the offence under section 379 and that having regard to the provisions of section 369 of the Criminal Procedure Code the Judge had no power to proceed with the trial of the charge under section 75 of the Penal Code and sentence the accused to enhanced punishment. [p. 184, col. 1.]

Criminal appeal from conviction and sentence passed by the Assistant Sessions Judge, Thana.

Mr. S. S. Patkar, Government Pleader, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

SHAH, J.—In this case the accused was charged under section 379 of the Indian Penal Code and tried by the Assistant Sessions Judge of Thana and a Jury. The Jury found the accused guilty. The Judge accepted the verdict and proceeded to pass a sentence in respect of that charge, and sentenced the accused to three years' rigorous imprisonment on the 23rd August. There was, however, a charge against the accused under section 75 read with section 379 of the Indian Penal Code, which, for reasons not material for our present purposes, was not proceeded with before passing the sentence on the charge under section 379, Indian Penal Code. The trial practically ended when the sentence was passed in respect of the offence under section 379. The learned Judge, however, proceeded thereafter to try the accused, and to record evidence, with respect to the charge of previous convictions. The Jury found the accused guilty on that charge on the 31st of August and the learned Judge sentenced the accused to seven years' rigorous imprisonment. It is against this order of conviction and sentence that the present appeal is preferred.

The point that arises in appeal is whether the subsequent proceedings with reference to the charge under section 75 are valid. In my opinion they are not valid, because under section 369 of the Criminal Procedure Code after the judgment including the sentence was pronounced in the trial on the 23rd of August, there was no power to alter or review the same. It seems to me that after the verdict of the Jury was accepted and the sentence passed on the 23rd of August on the charge under section 379, the trial came to an end. Whatever may have been the reasons for sentencing the accused under section 379, Indian Penal Code, in the first instance, and thereafter proceeding with the charge under section 75, the subsequent proceedings cannot be treated as valid.

I would, therefore, set aside the order made by the Assistant Sessions Judge on the 31st of August and restore that made on the 23rd of August. The result will be that the accused will have to suffer rigorous imprisonment for three years.

HEATON, J.—I concur.

EMPEROR—RESPONDENT.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 342—Accused, duty of Court to question, after examination of prosecution witnesses.

The term "shall" in section 342 of the Code of Criminal Procedure makes the duty imposed on the Court to question the accused generally on the case, after the witnesses for the prosecution have been examined and before he is called for the defence, mandatory and not discretionary and having regard to the object of the examination specified in the section, namely, that it is intended to enable the accused to explain any circumstances in the evidence against him, the omission by a Court to perform this duty must be presumed to seriously prejudice the accused. [p. 184, col 2; p. 185, col. 1.]

Appeal from the order of the District Magistrate, Montgomery, dated the 21st March 1917.

Mr. Sadiq Jilani, for the Appellants.

Mr. Sewa Ram Singh, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal from the order of the District Magistrate of Montgomery convicting Ghulla and Shera, appellants, of theft under section 380, Indian Penal Code, and sentencing each of them to five years' rigorous imprisonment.

The first objection raised by Counsel for the appellants is that the Magistrate has disregarded the provisions of section 342, Criminal Procedure Code, as to the examination of the accused person at the conclusion of the case for the prosecution. The section in question lays down that "for the purpose of enabling the accused to explain any circumstances appearing in the evidence against him, the Court may, at any stage of any inquiry or trial, put such questions to him as the Court considers necessary, and shall, for the purpose aforesaid, question him generally on the case after the witnesses for the prosecution have been examined and before he is called on for his defence." In the present case, after the evidence of only one witness for the prosecution, viz., Gulsher, had been recorded the Magistrate examined Ghulla accused, but he did not examine either of the accused after the witnesses for the prosecution had been examined. In fact, Shera was never examined at any stage of the case at all. It is contended that the appellants have been prejudiced by the omission of the Court to examine him in accordance with law. It was held by a Division Bench of the Bombay High Court in Emperor v. Savalya Atma Pastya (1) that the term "shall" in section 342, Criminal Procedure Code, makes the duty imposed on the Court to question the accused generally on the case, after the witnesses for the prosecution have been examined and before he is called for the defence, mandatory not discretionary, and having regard to the object of the examination specified in the section, namely, that it is intended to enable the accused to explain any circumstances in the evidence against him, it is clear that the omission by the Court to perform such a duty in a Criminal trial must be presumed to have seriously prejudiced the accused.

The same view was taken by the same High Court in a subsequent case reported as Bas pa Ningapa v. Emperor (2). In both these reported cases the High Court ordered a re-trial. I see no reason to differ from the view expressed in these rulings, and I hold that the District Magistrate's disobedience to the direct provision of the law contained in section 342, Criminal Procedure Code, is prejudicial to the accused and has vitiated the trial. I, therefore, accept the appeal and setting aside the convictions and sentences, direct that the appellants be re-tried from the point where the evidence for the prosecution was closed. Pending the decision of the case the accused persons should be transferred to the judicial lock-up.

Appeal accepted; Retrial ordered.

Councils Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. C. 67), s 22—High Courts Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. C. 104), s. 9—Defence of India (Criminal Law Amendment) Act (IV of 1915), s. 4—Governor-General, power of, to create Courts—Jurisdiction—High Court, power of, to declare an Act ultra vires.

Section 22 of the Indian Councils Act, 1861, read with section 9 of the Indian High Courts Act, 1861, is in terms amply wide to give the Governor-General of India in Council power to create new tribunals such as those contemplated in section 4 of the Defence of India (Criminal Law Amendment) Act, 1915. [p. 201, col. 1.]

Empress v. Burah, 4 C. 172 at p. 180; 5 I. A. 178; 3 C. L. R. 197; 3 Sar. P. C. J. 834; 3 Suth. P. C. J. 556; 2 Ind. Jur. 618; 2 Shome L. R. 63; 2 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 110 (P. C.), followed.

If an enactment of the Indian Legislature is outside the scope of the powers conferred upon the Governor-General in Council by Act of Parliament, the High Court has power in a proper proceeding to declare such an enactment ultra vires and of no force and effect, with all the consequences that may result therefrom. [p. 195, col. 2.]

Per Chapman, J.,—A Court cannot be constituted otherwise than in the name of the Sovereign, and before it can be held that the Indian Legislature can create a Court it must be clear beyond doubt that the power to create a Court has been properly delegated. [p. 201, col. 2.]

The power conferred on the Governor-General in Council by section 22 of the Councils Act of 1861 included the power to make laws and regulations for all persons and all Courts of justice whatever and for all places and things whatever This delegation of plenary power was designed for the benefit of public interests of the greatest magnitude and whatever may fairly be regarded as incidental to or consequential to the main purpose ought not, unless judicially prohibited, to be held by judicial construction to be ultra vires. [p. 202, col. 2.]

FACTS.—This was an application made on behalf of Parmeshwar Ahir, convicted of dacoity at Peru in the Shahbad District by the Special Tribunal at Arrah, for a writ of habeas corpus on the ground that the Government of India had no power to constitute the Court which convicted him.

Mr. P. R. Das, (with him Messrs. A. Sen and S. M. Mullick), for the Petitioner, said the petition was very short and raised no question of fact. It raised only one question, namely, whether the tribunal as constituted by the Defence of India Act was legal.

[MILLER, C. J.—You are asking for the issue of a writ of habeas corpus. How can we issue it without any evidence?]

Because there is no denial of facts. The only question before Your Lordships is whether the tribunal is a legal tribunal or not

[MILLER, C. J.—There is no affidavit verifying the facts stated in the petition.]

[The Advocate General, Bengal, for the Crown.—Strictly speaking, they must make an affidavit, but I am not here to take any technical objection. The facts in the petition are admitted.]

Mr. Das said he desired to make it perfectly clear that this application was not under the Code of Criminal Procedure.

PARMESHWAR AHIR v. EMPEROR.

His submission was that their Lordships had power to issue a prerogative writ of habeas corpus, and that they could issue it in spite of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The application, therefore, raised only two questions—first, whether the detention of the petitioner was illegal, and, second, if so, whether their Lordships had power to issue a prerogative writ of habeas corpus. With regard to the first point he submitted that it was beyond the power of the Governor-General in Council to create a tribunal and invest that tribunal with jurisdiction such as was conferred on it by the Defence Act. Their Lordships would find from relevant sections of the Act that the Governor General in Council purported to create a supreme Court to try certain offences, with power to sentence persons to death, and not requiring confirmation by their Lordships. Their Lordships would find that their power, appellate as well as revisional, was completely taken away, and even the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was powerless to interfere. The first proposition he, therefore, wished to advance was that the power of Parliament was supreme. The Indian Legislature was in no sense a sovereign Legislature and had none of the attributes of a sovereign body. His next point was that the creation of tribunals was a thing which stood distinct and apart from the power to make laws and regulations. It was an attribute of sovereignty and was claimed at one time as the prerogative of the Crown, and it was now vested in Parliament. His submission was that it was an attribute of sovereignty and could only be exercised by a body exercising sovereign authority. Their Lordships would find that the power of the Indian Legislature was expressly limited by an Act which brought into existence that body, and they would not find in that Act any power given to the Governor-General to establish a tribunal. There was a distinction between the power to make laws and the power to establish a tribunal which would enforce that law. Counsel then cited passages from Halsbury's Laws of England to show that power to establish Courts of law belonged to Parliament, and said that historically it could be shown that at one time the King claimed the sole prerogative to establish Courts of law, and that gradually that power was taken away by Parliament. Still something remained to the Crown, and the King could establish Courts to administer the common law but he could not establish Courts to administer any other law. Counsel also relied on a passage in Blackstone's Commentaries to show that a Court of law must derive its authority mediately or immediately from the Crown.

[MILLER, C. J.—Could the King create Courts in India?]

The King in Council could create a Court to administer the common law but not to administer statutory law.

[MILLER, C. J.—Is not statutory law part of the law of the land?]

Yes. But there is a distinction between common law and statutory law.

[MILLER, C. J.—What distinction do you draw between common law and the law of the land?]

The difference is that common law is law that has existed from time immemorial. It was not enacted by Statute.

[CHAPMAN, J.—The last Court created by the Crown was the Privy Council.]

Yes.

[CHAPMAN, J.—And that Court administers all laws.]

The Privy Council has existed for a very long time and this Court was created long before Parliament took away this power.

[MILLER, C. J.—If the King in Council has powers to create Courts to administer the law of the land, do you say the Governor General in Council would be infringing on the Royal prerogative?]

He would be: But there is a section in the Act which says such laws would not be void. My point, however, is that the King could not constitute Courts to administer any but common law.

[MULLICK, J.—You say the King in Council cannot create Courts except to administer common law. What about Prize Courts? They are created by the King in Council.]

What jurisdiction does a Prize Court exercise? That is a question you have to consider. I say their jurisdiction is to administer common law. Prize Courts had always been established by the King in Council. That is a power the King already possessed.

Continuing, Counsel said he strongly relied upon the provision in the Government of India Act which empowered the King to issue Letters Patent. It showed that the King had got no power beyond such as was conferred at the time. If the King had power to constitute a High Court, where was the necessity of a special provision in the Act giving him power to do so? If there had been no section 113 in the Act, His Majesty could not have established the Patna High Court. Their Lordships would find that whenever High Courts were established they had been established in virtue of an Act of Parliament.

[MILLER, C. J.—What do you mean when you say the King could constitute Courts in India to administer the law of the land?]

Common law of the land, which was Muhammadan Law. Before India was transferred to the Crown, the only law the Company's Courts could administer was Muhammadan Law and that is the law of the land.

[MILLER, C. J.—Now-a-days there is very little distinction between common law and statutory law.]

The Privy Council ruling makes that distinction.

[MILLER, C. J.—The distinction there was between ecclesiastical law and common law.]

So far as I remember statutory law is expressly stated there.

[MILLER, C. J.—Punishment of crime is the law of the land.]

There are various offences made offences by Statutes. They may not be offences under the common law

Continuing, Counsel said his submission was that all authorities established clearly that power to constitute Courts of Judicature vested in Parliament unless that power has been given to the Indian Legislature.

[MULLICK, J.—The result of your argument will be that a Court like the Chief Court of the Punjab will be ultra vires.]

No, all these were conquered and ceded provinces, and, therefore, were non-regulation provinces. The King had absolute power to do anything, and the Governor-General in Council has the same powers.

[MULLICK, J.—The Act of 1874 says the Governor-General in Council may remove trials from the jurisdiction of the High Court and create separate Courts.]

There is no power to create separate Courts. I shall come to that later.

Continuing, Counsel said that regarding the powers of the Indian Legislature he would draw their Lordships' attention to a leading case known as Burah's case, reported as Empress v. Burah (1). That case defined precisely the powers of the Indian Legislature. The Privy Council there held that the Legislature must act within the powers expressly conferred by Acts of Parliament.

[MILLER, C. J.—That case did decide that the Governor-General had power to take away the jurisdiction of a High Court from tracts and establish other Courts in those tracts.]

It did not decide that the Governor-General could take away the jurisdiction of a High Court and for that purpose could delegate their authority to a Local Government, but I shall fully deal with this case later.

Counsel then referred to section 22 of the Indian Councils Act of 1861, under which the Defence Act was enacted, and said the last clause of that section was extremely important. It laid down that the Legislature could not pass any Act which might affect the authority of Parliament or any part of the unwritten laws of the United Kingdom whereon might depend the allegiance of any subject of the Crown.

[ATKINSON, J.—Had the East India Company power to constitute Courts?]

Yes. But they created those Courts as a sovereign power in pursuance of a document obtained by Clive in 1765. Your Lordships will find that although from 1600 the Company had power to make laws and regulations, they never attempted to constitute Courts before they got the document of 1765. Your Lordships will have to consider why it was that they never attempted to constitute a single Court.

(1) 4 C. 172 at p. 180, 5 I. A. 178; 3 C. L. R. 197; 3 Sar. P. C. J. 834; 3 Suth. P. C. J. 556; 2 Ind. Jur. 618; 2 Shome L. R. 63; 2 Ind. Dec. (N. s.) 110 (P. C.).

Continuing, Counsel said the words under which the Governor-General in Council purported to act in constituting this Court were to make laws and regulations and he would satisfy their Lordships that there was a wide distinction between creating a law and creating a jurisdiction. The whole point was that the Legislature was one thing and the Judicature another. If the Legislature had such power, why was no High Court created by the Governor-General in Council?

[ATKINSON, J.—As regards High Courts powers were expressly reserved by Parliament by the Act of 1861.]

Mr. Das said, section 9 of the Indian High Courts Act was most important, and was a complete answer to Burah's case (1). It implied that there was no power in the Indian Legislature or in His Majesty to establish a High Court.

[MILLER, C. J.—A section saves the powers of the Governor-General in Council whatever they may be.]

My point is that reading the section in its ordinary sense the power of the Governor-Generel is limited to inherited jurisdiction and not to conferred jurisdiction.

[MILLER, C. J.—If you turn to section 131 of the Government of India Act and then to the 5th Schedule, how can you say the Governor-General has no power to interfere with jurisdiction?]

It emphasises my point. Parliament gives them special power to interfere with the jurisdiction of four High Courts, but interfering with the jurisdiction of four High Courts is not the same thing as creating a new tribunal.

Counsel submitted that the section made it perfectly clear that, apart from the sanction of Parliament, the Legislature had no right under the terms of section 22 of the Councils Act of 1861. Section 113 under which the Patna High Court was constituted was not in the Schedule referred to in section 131.

[MULLICK, J.—Does this High Court stand on a different footing from other High Courts?]

No power is given to the Governor-General to interfere with this High Court which is constituted under section 113. There is no power in the Governor-General in Council to repeal, alter or amend section 113.

[MULLICK, J.—Section 113 is controlled by section 106, which refers to all existing High Courts and those to be constituted hereafter.]

No. The same jurisdiction may not have been conferred on this High Court.

[The Advocate-General.—If your Lordships will turn to section 101, in the first few lines you will find that section 106 controls section 113.]

To further questions put from the Bench, Mr. Das said his only point was that the Court that tried the petitioner was an illegal Court, the ground being that it could not be established by the Government of India.

[CHAPMAN, J.— A Court was created in Burah's case (1).]

I will come to that. The latter point was never raised nor argued before their Lordships. Counsel said that their Lordships would find a remarkable statement in Burah's case (1). Their Lordships said that the Indian Legislature could not have brought into existence another Legislature unless that power was expressly given by Act of Parliament. If the Governor-General could not create a new Legislature, how could he create a new Judicature? Counsel then dealt with the history of the East India Company to show that although they had powers to make laws and regulations from 1600, they never attempted to create a Court until after 1765. He further inquired, where was the necessity of the Validating Act of 1781 if the Company had power to constitute Courts?

In course of his argument Counsel admitted to Mr. Justice Chapman that there was no recognition by any Act of Parliament of Criminal Courts in India other than High Courts.

Continuing his arguments the following morning, Mr. Das said he had pointed out that the East India Company never established Courts of law, though they had power to make laws and regulations, until they got their patent from the Nawab and thus became virtual sovereigns. Therefore, if any question were propounded to him that all these Courts were illegal because they were not established by Parliament but by the Company, his answer would be, No, because they were established by a sovereign power. The question, therefore, the Court had to consider was what was the effect after 1858.

[MILLER, C. J.—The question is whether this power was transferred to Parliament or to the Governor-General in Council.]

My reading is that the power of the Company came to an end in 1858 and was transferred.

[CHAPMAN, J.—Transferred to whom?]

The Act said: "India shall be governed in the name of the Crown through Act of Parliament"—21 and 22 Victoria, Chapter 56. Your Lordships will find that Parliament took control of Indian affairs, and that the sovereignty of the Company came to an end and became vested in the Crown, in Parliament. Counsel then cited authorities in support of his proposition, and observed that the Government of India did not realise that their power had gone out in 1858 and had become vested in Parliament.

[The Advocate-General.—If my learned friend's argument is correct, then the following Courts are also illegal: the Chief Court of Burma, the Chief Court of the Punjab, the Courts in Sind, Oudh, Madras, and the Central Provinces, and Courts created under the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act and Provincial Small Causes Courts Act.]

Mr. Das said that with regard to Chief Courts the Government had power. These were conquered and ceded provinces and the Goverment's power was supreme, but he was concerned only with provinces included in the Dewani.

[After some further arguments Miller, C.J., asked: "If the Privy Council said the Governor-General in Council had power to take away the jurisdiction of the High Court and transfer it to another Court, was that not important?"]

Mr. Das said his Lordship was thinking of Burah's case (1) and he would presently come to it.

[ROE, J., pointed out that under section 39 of the Councils Act of 1833 all power vested in the Board of Directors of the Company was given to the Governor-General in Council.]

Mr. Das said this section did not give power to the Governor-General in Council for the first time or at all to establish Courts. It gave powers of superintendence, direction and control of civil and military administration. What he asked respectfully was, was in section 39 authority given to the Governor General in Council to establish Courts of law? All authorities went to show that the Company did not establish Courts of law because of authority derived from Parliament but because of their sovereign power.

[MILLER, C. J., drew the attention of Counsel to section 43 of the same Act which empowered the Governor-General in Council to make laws and regulations for all Courts of Justice, whether established by Charter or otherwise.]

Mr. Das said all that the section meant was that all laws and regulations should be enforced, not only by Courts established by the Company but also by Courts established by Charter. Counsel then dealt with Burah's case (1).

He discussed the judgment in the case at some length and said he relied on it very strongly. First of all the case restricted the powers of the Governor-General in Council, and, secondly, it laid down that the Governor-General in Council could not create a new legislative power. Counsel contended if they could not create a new Legislature they could not create a new Judicature because both stood on the same footing.

[ROE, J., pointed out that section 5 of the Act of 1869 created a new jurisdiction, because power could be given to any person whomsoever the Lieutenant-Governor may appoint.]

Mr. Das said that as that power was not exercised nobody could complain.

[ROE, J.—But nobody complained before the Judicial Committee that section 5 was in excess of the power of the Governor-General in Council.]

Mr. Das said his submission was that there was no decision of the Privy Council on the point. Continuing he said it was conquered and ceded territory, and, therefore, it was important to see what powers the Governor-General in Council possessed in respect of conquered and ceded territories.

Summing up his arguments on this branch of the case Mr. Das said authorities clearly established that the right to establish Courts of law for Indian subjects belonged exclusively to the East India Company after they acquired virtual sovereignty of Bengal, Bihar and Orissa, and they exercised that authority as a sovereign power and not as agents of the Crown. Secondly, after 1858, the territories belonging to the Company became vested in the Crown, and Parliament became the supreme authority so far as India was concerned. Thirdly, the powers of the Governor-General were defined in the Councils Act and the High Courts Act, and these Acts did not give any power to the Indian Legislature to establish Courts of law. Fourthly, they had, therefore, no power to create this tribunal, and if this tribunal was not legally constituted the detention of the petitioner was illegal.

Counsel then addressed the Court on their powers to issue a prerogative writ of habeas corpus. A lengthy argument took place on this question, Mr. Das submitting in conclusion that the Court had power to issue a writ of habeas corpus.

Mr. T. C. Gubbins, Advocate-General, Bengal (with him the Government Advocate, Bihar and Orissa) for the Crown, said that in a case of this importance the second point raised by his learned friend was of little value, and he asked their Lordships to decide the main issue if they could see their way to do so. With regard to the main question, then, he said that since the Act of 1861 had been passed, in his experience this was the first time that anybody had dared to put forward that argument. It had taken nearly sixty years to find Mr. Das to argue this point.

Counsel said he did not propose to go into the earlier history as his learned friend had done, and he would deal with only two Acts of Parliament, namely, the Indian Councils Act of 1861 and section 9 of the Indian High Courts Act, from which the Governor-General in Council derived his power. His submission with regard to section 22 of the Indian Councils Act was that one could conceive of no wider words. It laid down that the Governor-General in Council might legislate on any subject for anybody. It laid down, within the limitations of what it had said, that the Governor General in Council might do anything he liked. When one went to look to decided cases he would find how these powers were exercised and how those powers were upheld, and how everything done by the Governor-General in Council had remained absolutely unchallenged. If the Governor-General in Council was exercising a power he had no right to do, how was it that the Parliament in England had never raised any objection? They were presumed to know what the Governor-General in Council was doing. The Advocate-General referred to section 9 of the High Courts Act, and, continuing the main argument, said it was not suggested here as in other cases that the Governor-General in Council had done anything which had affected any of the Acts of Parliament which he could not affect. He also relied on the fact that since 1861 no Act of the Government of India had been declared ultra vires. There was one thing clear from decided cases, that the Government of India had been allowed to add to the jurisdiction of the High Court, they had been allowed to withdraw certain clauses of suits from the High Court, and they had been allowed to withdraw certain classes of persons from the High Court.

The Advocate-General then gave a list of what the Government of India had actually done since the passing of the Act of 1861. He first took the case of Burma. He said the Government of India first conferred jurisdiction on the High Court in Calcutta. Burma was not even mentioned in the Letters Patent of the Calcutta High Court. The Government went outside Bengal altogether and conferred on the High Court power over Burma. The Government gave powers to Criminal Courts in Calcutta for review of the decisions of Recorders' Courts in Rangoon. That existed from 1863 to 1890 and was never challenged. Then there was the case of Darjeeling. By Act XIX of 1367 the Governor-General in Council conferred power on the High Court as regards Darjeeling which it did not possess before. Then there was the Indian Divorce Act. Oudh was a non-regulation province. It had no Chief Court. For the purposes of divorce the Government brought it into the jurisdiction of the Allahabad High Court, which then had only extraordinary Criminal jurisdiction over European British subjects in Oudh. Then by the Criminal Law Amendment Act of 1908 power was given to the Governor-General to transfer proceedings from a Magistrate to a Special Tribunal and a Special Tribunal consisting of three Judges of the High Court. There was to be no trial by Jury, and, as he understood, ordinarily there could be no trial in the High Court without a Jury. That was setting up a new tribunal.

[At this stage the Court rose for the day.]

On the hearing being resumed on the following day, the Advocate-General said that last night (January 22) he was endeavouring to show that the words of a Statute gave the Government the powers they purported to exercise in reference to the Defence of India Act, and he had also shown that, having got these powers by the Act of 1861, they had purported to exercise and had exercised those powers. From 1861 to 1915 the attention of Parliament must have been drawn to the Indian Legislature and to what they were doing. In addition to that he would show in greater detail that the Government had purported under the Act of 1861 to create not one Chief Court but a number of Chief Courts, and not one class but several classes of Courts. It would be extraordinary that, having power to make laws and say what was right and what was wrong, they would have no power to enforce the doing of right and the preventing of wrong. He submitted that the probable thing would be that the authority that had power to make laws and regulations had authority to create tribunals to enforce those laws and regulations. It was auxiliary to the right to make laws. The Government had the power to make laws and regulations and the words "to make laws and regulations" were in his submission wide enough, having regard to the words coming after, to cover the creation of Courts. "Regulations" was a word well understood in 1861 and Courts had been constituted under "regulations."

With regard to the High Court's power to issue a writ of habeas corpus, the Advocate-General's submission was that though the Calcutta High Court might have power to issue that writ within the precincts of Calcutta, he did not admit, in fact he contended to the contrary, that the Calcutta High Court had no power to issue a writ in the Mofussil. But even assuming that the Calcutta High Court had power to issue a writ in the Mofussil, that was not a power transferred in the only way in which it could be transferred by the Patna Charter to the Patna High Court.

The Advocate General then drew their Lordships' attention to what happened after Mr. Justice Norman's judgment in the celebrated Wahabi case [In the matter of Ameer Khan (2)] in which the learned Judge held that a writ issued in Calcutta ran into the Mofussil. He said that Act X of 1872, which was an Act of Parliament and which was something in the nature of a Criminal Procedure Act for the Mofussil, contained this provision: "Neither the High Court nor any Judge of such High Court shall issue any writ of habeas corpus nor any writ of a like nature beyond presidency towns." This Act, the Advocate-General said, continued to exist for ten years, after having been modified in 1875. From 1882 in the Criminal Procedure Act habeas corpus seems to be dropped and there was provision for what they called a writ in the nature of habeas corpus. From this it was quite clear that the Legislature had from time to time interfered with this right and that interference by the Governor-General in Council continued for a considerable time. The Advocate-General also drew the attention of their Lordships to a section in the Acts of 1861 and 1915 which provided that no Act of the Governor-General in Council shall be invalidated by reason of its infringing on the prerogative of the Crown. He further observed that one must remember that in this respect there had been numerous cases in which the Government had detained people, and this action had been held to be within their powers.

Continuing the Advocate-General said that the first point he wanted to make, more as a matter of protest than as an assertion of right, was this. The proceedings by which the Government had been brought there were not usual and not proper proceedings. Habeas corpus was a proceeding which lay against the person who actually detained, and the proceedings in this case should have been taken against the jailor. After some discussion on the subject with their Lordships the Advocate-General proceeded to argue the main question, and in support of his argument that the Government had added to the jurisdiction of the High Court, cited two cases, including a case decided in Bombay in which power was given to the High Court to hear appeals from a tribunal set up under the Bombay Improvement Trust Act. Authorities were then cited to show the power of the Government to withdraw certain classes of suits from the High Courts. He further cited a case reported as Premshankar Raghunathji v. Government of Bombay (3), to show that a local Legislature could constitute a Court in the Mofussil without any jurisdiction to the High Court to interfere.

[ATKINSON, J., pointed out a case decided by a Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court, reported as Abdulla v. Mohan Gir (4), to show that new Courts were created in Jhansi.]

A discussion then took place with regard to the Defence Act between Atkinson, J., and the Advocate-General on the latter mentioning a remark made by a learned Judge that if this Act had not been passed, there would have been enormous delay in the trial of cases which would amount to a denial of justice to many accused persons.

[ATKINSON, J., wanted to know of a single case where a man was transported for life with forfeiture of his property without an appeal.]

The Advocate-General said the Act had been passed for a particular class of crime, at a particular time, under particular circumstances, and it was an Act which experience had shown was absolutely necessary for the administration of justice. One of the objects of Criminal justice was that it should not be delayed, as delay meant denial of justice. The trial before the tribunal was conducted properly and with due decorum, and though this Court had no jurisdiction these were tribunals such as might well be created. The same thing, he said, was done in Act XI of 1857. By that Act the jurisdiction of the High Court could be taken away altogether. All that the Executive Government had to say was that a particular locality was in a state of rebellion and a commission could go forthwith. The Advocate General then gave the dates of the establishment of various Courts which he said were all done soon after 1861. He said that since the passing by Parliament of the Act of 1861 there had been the India Councils Acts of 1890, 1891, 1892 and 1909, when the very matter of the creation of these Courts must have been brought specifically to the notice of Parliament. Parliament had the very matter under their consideration.

[ATKINSON, J., said that the case of Damodar Gordhan v. Deoram Kanji (5) showed that Mr. Das's argument about the sovereign powers of the East India Company was more imaginary than real.]

The Advocate-General then referred to sections 6 and 9 of the Criminal Procedure Code and relied on the words "besides the High Court and Courts constituted under any law other than this Code" in the former section, and the words "the Local Government shall establish a Court of Session for every Sessions division" in the latter section. Concluding this point he said it would seem going a long way to say that if the Government had power to abolish a High Court they had no power to create something to take its place. The only point he wished to draw their Lordships' attention to was that if there were any doubts about the Government's power to create Courts, that would have appeared in section 25 of the Act of 1861, which dealt with doubts, remembering that Courts were constituted under regulations before 1861.

The Advocate-General then dealt with Burah's case (1) on which he strongly relied, and on the authority of this case he said that what the Government had done had received judicial sanction of the greatest possible kind.

With regard to the argument that the business of Court making was an attribute of sovereignty and that sovereignty lay with the East India Company and had now passed to the Crown, he said that the facts as stated were not correct. Parliament had asserted itself as a sovereign power in 1813, and by the language they employed in the Act of 1813 they gave retrospective effect to that sovereignty.

To sum up, the Advocate-General said he had shown that the Governor General in Council had power to create Courts. He had that power before 1861 and continued to exercise it since that. There had been no objection taken to it, and there had been no legislation of Parliament putting him right if he had gone wrong. Counsel had given at least one instance, if not more, of the power which had been exercised, which was still in force, and which might be exercised to day or to-morrow. The Advocate General reminded their Lordships that this Act was in the nature of emergency legislation for obtaining speedy trial under particular circumstances.

The Advocate General then dealt with the point relating to habeas corpus, but in doing so said it was quite a side issue and he most respectfully asked their Lordships to give a decision on the main point, whatever their decision on the subsidiary point might be.

Mr. Sultan Ahmed, Government Advocate, Bihar and Orissa, put in the notification creating the tribunals and extending certain provisions of the Defence Act to the District of Shahabad. He then briefly referred to a few points raised by Mr. Das in his argument. He said there were certain Courts created before and after 1858 by the Governor-General in Council in territories which were not conquered or ceded territories. The first Act was Act XXXVII of 1855, which created Courts in the Sonthal Parganas. This Act took away the jurisdiction of Courts which had jurisdiction over those territories and vested jurisdiction in new Courts established under that regulation. The same thing was done in Chota Nagpur in 1834. So far as the Chittagong Hill Tracts went, there Courts were created between 1834 and 1860. All these Courts were created, not because the East India Company had sovereign authority, but because the Governor General in Council by powers under the Act of 1733 could constitute Courts everywhere.

Mr. Das, in reply. Dealing with the question of habeas corpus first, he said the Act of 1872 could not take away the power of the High Court to issue writs of habeas corpus, and his authority for saying so was section 22 of the Indian Councils Act of 1861, which by its last clause imposed restrictions on the Indian Legislature not to affect any part of the unwritten laws or constitution of the United Kingdom whereon might depend the allegiance of a subject of the Crown. With regard to the powers of the Government of India to create Courts, he said the learned Advocate-General's argument came to this: that if an illegal act or illegal conduct was persisted in for a sufficient number of years it gave them a prescriptive title to commit illegalities. If, Counsel said, the power to make laws and regulations included the power to create Courts there was an end of the matter. With regard to the creation of Courts his proposition was that in fact there was no creation of new Courts after 1861, but merely a consolidation of all existing Courts; and, secondly, that if in fact there was creation of new Courts, those Courts being in non-regulation provinces, it was an invasion of the royal prerogative and as such protected by the Indian Councils Act. He contested the proposition that the East India Company created Courts as trustees on behalf of the Crown, and observed that the authorities all showed that they established Courts on the strength of the Diwani obtained from the Nawabs. The point was in what capacity the Company purported to act, and the authorities established that they purported to act as Diwan of the Muhammadan Rulers.

JUDGMENT.

MILLER, C. J.—This matter comes before us on the application of one Parmeshwar Ahir, an Indian subject of His Majesty, praying that a writ of hub-as corpus may issue to the jailor of Buxar Jail, where he is now imprisoned, to produce him before this Court with a view to enquire into the legality of his detention.

The application came originally before a single Judge of this Court and as the case involved questions of constitutional importance affecting the legislative powers of the Governor-General of India in Council, he ordered that notice should issue in the first instance to shew cause why a writ of habeas corpus should not issue on the jailor of Buxar Jail to produce the body of Parmeshwar Ahir with a view to consider whether or not his conviction was valid, and it was directed that the notice should be served on the Crown. By this procedure the Government of India was given an opportunity of appearing by Counsel and the matter was referred to a Full Bench.

The facts of the case which were not in dispute appear from the petition and from documentary evidence put in on behalf of the Government of India, who instructed the Advocate-General to appear at the hearing to shew cause against the Rule. The petitioner was arrested in connection with what are known as the Bakr-Id riots, which occurred in different parts of this province in the months of September and October last resulting in considerable loss of life, personal injury and destruction of property. He was tried and convicted of dacoity, rioting and offences under section 295, Indian Penal Code, and sentenced to 5 years' rigorous imprisonment. The legality of the whole proceedings, which terminated in the conviction and imprisonment of the petitioner, is called in question on the ground that the tribunal which tried the case had no jurisdiction to act. The tribunal in question consisted of three Commissioners specially appointed by the Local Government of Bihar and Orissa under powers granted by the Defence of India (Criminal Law Amendment) Act, 1915 (Act IV of 1915), for the trial of persons under the said Act in the District of Shahabad. It is not disputed that the tribunal was properly constituted in accordance with the provisions of the Defence of India Act and it is not necessary to refer to the rules and notifications contained in the copies of the Gazette which have been handed in and which shew that the proper formalities were complied with, but it is contended that the Act itself in so far as it granted the powers mentioned is ultra vires the Imperial Council, on the ground that it was beyond the power of the Governor-General in Council to constitute a Court of justice or to authorise any other person to constitute such a Court.

The Defence of India Act as the preamble shews is in the nature of emergency legislation passed owing to the existing state of war and is entitled: "An Act to provide for special measures to secure the public safety and the defence of British India and for the more speedy trial of certain offences". It is a temporary measure only and by section 1 (4) its operation is to cease six months after the termination of the war. It received the assent of the Governor-General on the 19th March 1915 and sections 1 and 2 came into immediate operation. The rest of the Act was to come into operation in any province or part thereof by notification in the Gazette of India by the Governor-General in Council. By section 2 (1): "The Governor-General in Council may make rules for the purpose of securing the public safety and the defence of British India and as to the powers and duties of public servants and other persons in furtherance of that purpose." Then follow certain particular purposes for which rules may be made without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing power. These relate to precautions necessitated directly by reason of the war and are not material in the present case. The rest of section 2 limits the punishment to be imposed by the rules for contravention of any order issued under the authority of the same, and provides for publication of the rules in the Gazette of India whereupon they shall have effect as if enacted in the Act. By section 3 (1)—"The Local Government may by order in writing direct that any person accused of anything which is an offence in virtue of any rule made under section 2, or accused of any offence punishable with death, transportation or imprisonment for a term which may extend to seven years, or of Criminal conspiracy to commit, or of abetting, or of attempting to commit or abet any such offence, shall be tried by Commissioners appointed under this Act." By section 3 (2) orders under sub-section (1) may be made in respect of all persons or any class of persons accused of any offence or any class of offences referred to in that sub section. By section 4 all trials under the Act shall be held by three Commissioners of whom two at least must have certain legal qualifications and such Commissioners are to be appointed by the Local Government for the whole or any part of the province or for the trial of particular persons or classes of persons.

Sections 5, 7 and 9 provide that the existing procedure in Criminal cases and the rules of evidence shall in certain respects be modified for the purposes of trials under the Act, and section 6 provides that any sentence authorised by law may be imposed and the judgment of the Commissioners shall be final and conclusive and no order of confirmation shall be necessary. Section 10 gives the Local Government power by notification in the local official Gazette to make rules regulating the procedure to be adopted at the trials by the Commissioners and the execution of sentences passed by them.

Sections 8 and 11 are important. They are as follows:—

"8. (1) Notwithstanding the provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, or of any other law for the time being in force, or of anything having the force of law by whatsoever authority made or done, there shall be no appeal from any order or sentence of Commissioners appointed under this Act and no Court shall have authority to revise any such order or sentence or to transfer any case from such Commissioners, or to make any order under section 491 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, or have any jurisdiction of any kind in respect of any proceedings under this Act.

"(2) Nothing in sub-section (1) shall be deemed to affect the power of the Governor-General in Council or the Local Government to make orders under section 401 or 402 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, in respect of persons sentenced by Commissioners under this Act."

"11. No order under this Act shall be called in question in any Court and no suit, prosecution or other legal proceeding shall lie against any person for anything which is in good faith done or intended to be done under this Act."

It should be observed that the Act is designed not only to carry into effect the precautions enumerated in the second paragraph of section 2 (1), which may be regarded as precautions directly necessitated by reason of a state of war, but also to provide special measures for dealing speedily with offences affecting the public safety, which though not directly arising through a state of war are particularly undesirable in times of great stress and emergency. We are not concerned, however, with the wisdom of the policy underlying the enactment in question. If the Act itself is outside the scope of the powers conferred upon the Governor-General in Council by Act of Parliament, I conceive that this Court has power in a proper proceeding to declare such an enactment ultra vires and of no force and effect with all the consequences that may result therefrom.

When the Defence of India Act was passed the Government of India Act, 1915 (5 and 6 Geo V, C. 61), which consolidated and re-enacted existing Statutes relating to the Government of India and the functions of the High Courts, had not come into operation. It is, therefore, necessary to consider the Defence of India Act in the light of the powers conferred upon the Governor-General in Council by earlier Statutes and in particular the Indian Councils Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. C. 67) and the Indian High Courts Act passed in the same year (24 and 25 Vict., C. 104). Before doing so it would be convenient to deal shortly with the learned and elaborate argument of Mr. Das on behalf of the petitioner in which he surveyed the whole history of the powers conferred upon or exercised by the East India Company from its earliest infancy when a Charter was granted by Queen Elizabeth in the year 1600 to certain merchants trading in the East Indies. It is sufficient for our purpose to say that the Company, under whatever name it was from time to time called, in the course of its development gradually acquired by successive charters certain legislative and administrative powers and certain rights and prerogatives appertaining to the sovereign which they at first exercised in delegation of the powers so granted. Having established themselves in territories extending from Madras northwards into Bengal, Bihar and Orissa, and other parts of India, the Company undoubtedly in exercise of powers conferred or assumed not only made their own laws but also constituted Courts for the administration of the laws which they sought to enforce. Whether this was done by virtue of the prerogative of the British sovereign or whether after the Dewani was obtained by Lord Clive from Shah Alum in 1765, it was done by virtue of the sovereign rights of the Moghul Emperor or whether it was done by reason of an assumed power devoid of legal sanction, does not appear to me to be of vital consequence in the view I take of this case. Mr. Das's argument on behalf of the petitioner, however, was largely directed to the point that the powers of the Company to establish Courts were derived either from the sovereign powers of the Moghul Emperor or in virtue of the prerogative of the Crown up to the period between 1858 and 1861 when by the enactments passed in those years, he contends, those powers ceased to exist in the Government of India and were transferred to the Crown in Parliament. The question we must consider is whether the power which was undoubtedly exercised before 1858 was continued in the Governor-General in Council after 1861 by the enactments of that year, and for this purpose a short survey of the earlier legislation becomes necessary in order to see how far Parliament has recognized that power either expressly or by implication and whether if it was so recognised, there is anything to indicate that a different policy was intended to be followed by the two enactments of 1861. It was not until the so-called Regulation Act of 1773 (13 Geo. III, C. 63) and the Charter of George III establishing the Supreme Court in the following year came into force, that the executive and legislative powers of the Company then exercised by the Governer-General in Council, came to be questioned. The acute conflict which then arose between the Governor-General in Council on the one hand and the Supreme Court on the other led to the passing of the East India Company Act of 1781 (21 Geo. III, C. 70). That enactment provided that the Governor-General in Council should not be subject jointly or severally to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court when acting in their public capacity and that persons impleaded in the Supreme Court for acts done by written order of the Governor-General in Council might plead the general issue and proof of such order should amount to a complete justification of such acts except in cases affecting the rights of British subjects over which the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court was recognised. All matters concerning the revenue were also declared beyond the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. The conflict although not so acute continued thereafter to some extent until 1858, when the territories and government of India were transferred to and exercised in the name of the Crown. In the meantime, however, new Courts were established by the Company in the conquered or ceded territories. In 1793 (33 Geo. III, C. 52) "the whole Civil and Military Government of the Presidency of Fort William in Bengal and also the ordering, management and government of all the territorial acquisitions and revenues of the Kingdoms and Provinces of Bengal, Bihar and Orissa were vested in the Governor-General in Council subject to the restrictions of unrepealed enactments and the control of the Board of Directors in matters relating to the declaration of war and treaties guaranteeing possessions."

In 1833 the Government of India Act of that year (3 & 4 William IV, C. 85) was passed. It provided that the government of the British territories in India should remain in the Company until 1854 (subsequently continued by an Act of 1853 "until Parliament shall otherwise provide") and that all the real and personal property of the Company should be held in trust for the Crown for the service of India. Section 39 vested the Government in the Governor-General in Council and section 45 provided that all laws and regulations made by the Governor-General in Council should be of the same force and effect throughout the Indian territories as any Act of Parliament and "shall be taken notice of by all Courts of justice whatsoever within the same territories in the same manner as any public Act of Parliament would and ought to be taken notice of." Section 46 provided that it should not be lawful for the Governor General in Council without the sanction of the Court of Directors to make any law or regulation which should empower any Courts of justice other than those established by Royal Charter to sentence to death any of His Majesty's natural born subjects born in Europe or their children or which should abolish any of the Courts established by Royal Charter. Section 51 expressly reserved the right of Parliament to legislate for India and provided that the laws and regulations made by the Governor-General in Council should be transmitted to England and laid before both Houses of Parliament "the better to enable Parliament to exercise at all times such right and power."

No other Act of importance was passed until 1858, but it should be observed that although the enactments of the Indian Council were from 1833 brought directly under the notice and control of Parliament, no question seems to have been raised therein as to the powers of the former body to constitute, as they did, new Courts or to interfere with the jurisdiction of existing Courts. Indeed it is conceded by Mr. Das that the power of the Indian Legislature to interfere with the jurisdiction of any existing Court cannot be contested and in view of the ruling of the Judicial Committee in the case of Empress v. Burah (1), it is difficult to see how such a contention could be urged with any hope of success even by Counsel of Mr. Das's undoubted courage and ability. He does contend, however, that there is no power in the Governor-General in Council to constitute a new Court. The power of destruction except as expressly limited by the Act of 1861 is conceded, the power of construction is denied. It is not necessary to refer in detail to the Government of India Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vic., C. 106). It marked the end of the activities of the old East India Company, although the Company was not formally dissolved until 1874, and it directed that henceforward India should be governed by and in the name of Her Majesty. The Secretary of Sate for India was clothed with the powers formerly exercised by the Company or the Court of Directors or Court of Proprietors. A new Council was to be established which together with and under the direction of the Secretary of State was to form the Secretary of State in Council and conduct the business transacted in the United Kingdom in relation to the Government of India in place of the old Court of Directors and Court of Proprietors. The Council in India was to remain under the style of the Council of the Governor-General in India and all existing establishments and all laws and provisions then in force were to continue subject to the provisions of the Act pending further changes. The next few years were pregnant with legislation relating to India and in 1861 the Indian Councils Act and the Indian High Courts Act were passed. By section 22 of the former Act the Governor-General in Council was given power, subject to the provisions of the Act, to make laws and regulations "for repealing, amending or altering any laws or regulations whatever now in force or hereafter to be in force in the Indian territories now [or hereafter (see 55 & 56 Vic., C. 14, section 3)] under the dominion of Her Majesty and to make laws and regulations for all persons whether British or native foreigners or others and for all Courts of justice whatever and for all places and things whatever within the said territories." Certain restrictions on the wide powers given above are set out in the section. Those material to the present case are that the said laws and regulations shall not repeal or in any way affect any of the provisions of this Act or the unrepealed sections of the Acts of 1833, 1853 and 1854, or any of the provisions of the Acts of 1858 and 1859 "or any provisions of any Act passed in this present session of Parliament or hereafter to be passed in anywise affecting Her Majesty's Indian territories or the inhabitants thereof: or which may affect the authority of Parliament or the constitution and rights of the East India Company or any part of the unwritten laws of the constitution of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland whereon may depend in any degree the allegiance of any person to the Crown of the United Kingdom or the sovereignty or dominion of the Crown over any part of the said territories."

By the Indian High Courts Act, 1861, the Supreme Court and the Sudder Courts were established and by section 9 the jurisdiction of the High Courts to be established thereunder is defined. Such jurisdiction was twofold, (i) that which should be expressly granted by Letters Patent, and (ii) save as otherwise directed by the Letters Patent "and without prejudice to the legislative powers in relation to the matters aforesaid of the Governor-General of India in Council" such jurisdiction as was exercised in the same presidency by any of the Courts abolished under the Act.

The Letters Patent dated the 9th February 1916, under which the High Court at Patna was constituted, provide by clause 41 as follows: "And we do further ordain and declare that all the provisions of these our Letters Patent are subject to the legislative powers of the Governor-General in Legislative Council and also of the Governor-General in Council under section 71 of the Government of India Act, 1915, and also of the Governor-General in cases of emergency under section 72 of that Act and may be in all respects amended and altered thereby." It is clear, therefore, that whatever jurisdiction this Court has, whether derived from the Letters Patent or whether as the successor to the jurisdiction which the High Court at Calcutta formerly exercised in this Province, in either case such jurisdiction is subject to the legislative powers of the Governor-General in Council and the only question for determination is, assuming this Court has power to issue a writ of habeas corpus, is this a case in which the Governor-General in Council has acted outside the scope of his powers. It is contended that the words "laws and regulations" are synonymous and that the power granted to make laws should be confined to declaring the law as defined by Blackstone at page 44, Volume 1, section 2, of his Commentaries where he says: "Municipal Law is properly defined to be a rule of civil conduct prescribed by the supreme power in a state commanding what is right and prohibiting what is wrong," and that the power to make laws does not carry with it the power of creating the machinery by which the laws shall be enforced. The power of creating Courts, it is said, is an attribute of sovereignty exercised either by virtue of the royal prerogative or possibly now-a-days by a Sovereign Legislature and in either case is outside the scope of the powers of the Governor General in Council since 1858. Whatever may have been the extent of the royal prerogative in respect of creating Courts in former times, it is probably accurate to say that at the present day that power would not ordinarily be exercised without the consent of Parliament. If then this power must now be regarded as a function of the Legislature in England it is difficult to see why the same power, which had previously been exercised by the Governor General in Council, should be regarded as excluded by the Act of 1861 or the Act of 1858 from the functions of the Legislative Council in India which is empowered to make laws and regulations for all Courts and all persons. In Damodar Gordhan v. Deorom Kanji (5) Lord Selborne in delivering the judgment of their Lordships described the combined effect of the Acts of 1833 and 1861 in these words: "By the Imperial Statute 3rd and 4th William, cap 85, section 43 a general power of legislation with certain exceptions not material for this purpose was given to the Governor-General in Council as to (among other things) 'all Courts of Justice whether established by Her Majesty's Charters or otherwise and the jurisdiction thereof.' This power is in substance continued by 24 & 25 Vic., cap. 67, section 22, though the particular clause of the former Statute is thereby repealed." And the same noble Lord in Burah's case (1), to which I shall refer again presently, is reported as saying [Empress v. Burah (1)]: "The Indian Legislature has powers expressly limited by the Act of the Imperial Parliament which created it, and it can, of course, do nothing beyond the limits which circumscribe these powers. But when acting within these limits, it is not in any sense an agent or delegate of the Imperial Parliament, but has, and was intended to have, plenary powers of legislation, as large, and of the same nature, as those of Parliament itself." But if on the other hand the power is to be regarded as part of the prerogative of the Crown section 24 of the Indian Councils Act, 1861, provides that no law or regulation shall be deemed invalid by reason only that it affects the prerogative of the Crown. Moreover, at the time when the Act of 1861 was passed the words "laws and regulations" had received a recognised significance and included, in my view, the power of making laws and enforcing their observance by the creation of Courts of justice. Many new Courts have been created by Acts of the Indian Council since 1861 and our attention was drawn to a list of such Courts by the learned Advocate-General in the course of the argument. Some of them may be mentioned as typical. The Recorders' Courts at Rangoon and Moulmein were created by Act XXI of 1863; the Chief Court of Lower Burma by Act VI of 1900; the Punjab Chief Court by Act XIX of 1865; the Central Provinces Courts by Act XIV of 1865. Other Courts were created by the Criminal Law Procedure Code, 1898. It is also worthy of notice that in 1857, acting under the powers conferred by the Act of 1833 already referred to, Act XI of 1857 was passed by the Governor-General in Council entitled: "An Act for the prevention, trial and punishment of offences against the State." It was in pari materia with the Defence of India Act, 1915. It gave the executive Government of any presidency or place power to establish a Special Court to try certain offences, including murder, arson and robbery, within proclaimed areas and the decisions of such Court were declared to be final and not subject to the Sudder Courts. There can be no doubt that many persons were tried and convicted by such Courts. It has never so far as I am aware, been suggested that the Act in question was illegal. So also in 1860 by Act XXII of that year the Chittagong Hill Tracts were entirely excluded from the jurisdiction of the Civil and Criminal Courts and from the revenue laws and officers, and power was given to the Local Government to appoint what Courts and officers it thought fit and to issue what instructions it pleased for the guidance of such officers and Courts. None of these Acts has been challenged or impeached. The decrees of the Courts so constituted have issued far and wide and have affected many persons. The Acts constituting them were within the knowledge of Parliament but in no case has the power to create such Courts been called in question. And with full knowledge of the manner in which the powers conferred by previous Statutes had been exercised by the Governor-General in Council, the Imperial Legislature on successive occasions extending over a number of years has re-enacted those powers in almost identical phraseology. In the case, above referred to, of Empress v. Burah (1) the Court had to consider the powers conferred on the Indian Council by the Acts of 1833 and 1851. By an Act of the Governor-General in Council passed in 1869 certain districts were removed from the jurisdiction of the existing Courts and placed under the jurisdiction of officers to be appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, who was also empowered to extend the provisions of the Act to the Cassyah and Jynteeah Hills. This the Lieutenant-Governor did in 1871 by notification in the Gazette and constituted a Court to exercise the powers of revision and appeal formerly exercised by the High Court of Calcutta. It was objected that the Act was ultra vires on the grounds, (i) that the Governor General in Council had no power to interfere with the jurisdiction of the High Court, and (ii) that he had no power to delegate his legislative functions to the Lieutenant-Governor, as, it was contended, had been done by the Act. A Full Bench of the High Court of Calcutta were unanimous in holding that the Governor General in Council had power to remove the district in question from the jurisdiction of the High Court and this view was affirmed on appeal to His Majesty in Council. The Court differed as to the power to delegate authority to the Local Government and their Lordships overruling the majority of the Court decided that such power was also intra vires. In dealing with the proper inference to be drawn from the fact that the disputed powers had been regularly exercised by the Governor General in Council under the provisions of the earlier Act, which had been re-enacted in similar language in the Act of 1861, Sir Richard Garth, C. J., in the Court below [Empress v. Burah (6)] is reported as saying: "Has then the Legislature of this country been proceeding all these years upon a principle unwarranted by law? Has it been abdicating its proper functions and transferring powers which it had no right to transfer. The answer to this question will be found in the Councils Act of 1861. That Act has put a construction upon the meaning of the Indian Charter of 1833 which it seems to me almost impossible to misunderstand." This view was approved on appeal. Lord Selbourne in delivering the judgment of the Board said: "If their Lordships were to adopt the view of the majority of the High Court they would be casting doubt upon the validity of a long course of legislation appropriate as far as they can judge to the peculiar circumstances of India; great part of which belongs to the period antecedent to the year 1861 and must, therefore, (as Sir Richard Garth well observed) be presumed to have been known to and in view of the Imperial Parliament when the Councils Act of that year was passed." The Indian Councils Act, 1915, afforded another opportunity for Parliament to correct, if it required correction, the manner in which the Indian Council had for so long been exercising the powers which they conceived to have been conferred by the existing Acts, but the Government of India Act, 1915, which was passed after the Defence of India Act came into operation, re-enacted the former Statutes in practically identical language and must in my view have been intended to recognise the correctness of the interpretation placed upon the former enactments by the Indian Council. The same canon of construction, which was enunciated by Sir Richard Garth and approved by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Burah's case (1), was followed by Sir John Edge, C. J., and four other Judges of the High Court at Allahabad in Abdulla v. Mohan Gir (4) in 1899 and Lord Macnagten in the case of Commissioners for Special Purposes of Income Tax v. Pemsel (7) expressed similar views in a case dealing with the construction of words occurring in the Income Tax Acts.

It was contended that Burah's case (1) was no authority for the proposition that the Indian Legislature could constitute new Courts, as this point was not urged in argument before the Court which tried that case and was not specifically dealt with by the judgments. On page 181 of the report in the Indian Law Reports, 4 Calcutta series, Lord Selborne in dealing with the question of the Indian Legislative Council's powers of delegation says: "What was done is this. The Governor-General in Council has determined in due and ordinary course of legislation to remove a particular district from the jurisdiction of the ordinary Courts and offices and to place it under new Courts and offices to be appointed by and responsible to the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal." There can be no question, therefore, that the fact that new Courts had been created was a matter which was brought before the notice of their Lordships and admitting that it is accurate to say that the question was not specifically dealt with, it is highly improbable that the point could have been lost sight of.

It seems reasonable to suppose that once it was determined that power to interfere with the jurisdiction of the High Court existed, the power to substitute a new Court to act in place of that whose jurisdiction had been determined was regarded as a matter which could not well be challenged. That case is at the least a light for our guidance in the present case, but I do not consider the matter as at all concluded by reason of that decision where the point was not specifically dealt with. I prefer to rest my decision upon the construction of the Act of 1861 viewed in the light of previous enactments and the powers consistently exercised thereunder. It was contended on behalf of the petitioner that in so far as new Courts were constituted by the East India Company before 1858 this was done in the ceded or conquered provinces in exercise of the royal prerogative or in the regulation provinces in exercise of the sovereign powers of the Moghul Emperor, both of which powers it is said were taken away from the Governor General in Council in 1858 and vested in the Crown or in the Secretary of State in Council and in so far as they were constituted after 1861, it was merely a rearrangement of existing Courts created under earlier powers. As to the first part of this contention, even if it is conceded that the assumption of the powers exercised in the earlier period was justified on the constitutional grounds stated, it can hardly be disputed that Parliament recognised and acquiesced in what was done and I find nothing in the enactments of 1858 or 1861 to lead to the supposition that a different policy towards the Indian Legislature was at that time contemplated. It appears to me that section 22 of the Indian Councils Act of 1861, read with section 9 of the High Courts Act, is in terms amply wide enough to cover the powers now in question and had it been intended to deprive the Governor-General in Council of the powers so long exercised by his predecessors, such intention would have been expressed in clear and unambiguous language. Having regard to the opinion just expressed, it is not necessary to deal with the second part of the argument just mentioned. It would appear, however, to be based upon a false assumption. Some of the Courts mentioned in an earlier part of this judgment were entirely new Courts and some were in newly acquired territory. No question has so far been raised as to the validity of their constitution. Indeed apart from the High Courts it would be difficult at the present day to find any Court in British India which does not owe its existence to an Act of the Indian Legislature. Were we to decide that such Acts are ultra vires practically the whole administration of justice in British India would cease to exist. I think the petitioner's application should be rejected and the rule will be discharged.

The decision arrived at makes it unnecessary to consider the question which was raised as ancillary to the main question, namely, whether this Court has jurisdiction to issue a writ of habeas corpus and that point I leave undecided.

CHAPMAN, J.—The petitioner is confined under sentence from a tribunal constituted under the Defence of India Act, 1915. He has moved this Court for a writ of habeas corpus on one ground only, namely, that so far as the Defence of India Act authorised the creation of the tribunal, the Act is void inasmuch as it is beyond the power of the Governor-General of India in Council to constitute a Court or to authorise any other person or persons to constitute a Court.

It is contended that the Indian Legislature is not sovereign inasmuch as it derives its powers from Act of Parliament, that the power to create a Court of justice rests in some special manner in the sovereign and that this power cannot be delegated otherwise than by an express enactment or proceeding to which the sovereign is a party.

It is not necessary for the purposes of this decision to deal elaborately with the latter part of this contention. The argument was mainly concerned with the authorities which deal with the prerogative to create Courts in England. But the sovereign power in respect of Courts outside Great Britain has histories and rests upon foundations of its own [Campbell v. Hall (8) and In the matter of the States of Jersey (9)]. It is sufficient to say that a Court cannot be properly constituted otherwise than in the name of the sovereign and that, therefore, before I can hold that the Indian Legislature can create a Court it must be clear beyond doubt that the power to create a Court has been properly delegated.

The powers of the Governor-General of India in Council, so far as the Defence of India Act is concerned, are derived from the Government of India Act of 1858 and India Councils Act of 1861 (21 & 22 Vic., C. 106, and 24 & 25 Vic., C. 67). The former Act recited that the government of the territories then in the possession of or under the Government of the East India Company and all powers in relation to Government vested in or exercised by the said Company, and all rights vested in or which if the Act had not been passed might have been exercised by the said Company in relation to any territories, shall become vested in Her Majesty and be exercised in her name. It was enacted that India shall be governed by and in the name of Her Majesty and all the rights referred to may be exercised by and in the name of Her Majesty as rights incidental to the Government of India; that the existing Council in India should be styled;

(8) 20 St. Tr. 239.
(9) 8 St Tr (N. S.) 286.

"The Council of the Governor-General in India." The Indian Councils Act of 1861 provided for the addition to this existing Council of further members for the better exercise of powers to make laws and regulations and that at meetings of the enlarged Council so constituted the Governor General of India in Council should have power to make laws and regulations for repealing, amending or altering any law and any regulation whatever now in force or hereafter to be in force in the Indian territories now under the dominion of Her Majesty and make laws and regulations for all Courts of Justice whatever and for all places or things whatever within the said territories. This power was subject to certain provisos and control, with which it is not necessary now to deal. These Statutes in terms recognised and were expressly founded upon the facts then existing. Section 7 of the Government of India Act of 1858 refers to the Council in India then bearing that name. It is necessary, therefore, to refer shortly to the constitution of the Council in India existing at the time of the enactment of the Government of India Act of 1858. The East India Company was originally a corporation with a trade monopoly created by charter from the Crown. It soon became necessary for the Company's officers to exercise powers of Government over the members of the Company who were engaged in trade in India. Such powers were accordingly conferred upon the Governor in Council in each of the Company's factories and were extended over all persons residing within factory limits. In 1765 the Company obtained the Dawani or right to conduct the revenue and civil administration on behalf of the Moghul Emperor in the Provinces of Bengal, Bihar and Orissa. In view of this expansion of power and responsibility the East India Company Act of 1772 was enacted and it was directed that for the Government of the Presidency of Fort William in Bengal the Company should appoint a Governor-General and Councillors and that the whole Civil and Military Government of the Presidency, the ordering, management and government of all the territorial acquisitions and revenues in the Provinces of Bengal, Bihar and Orissa should be vested in the said Governor-General in Council. Thereupon the creation of Courts for the proper administration of civil justice was immediately undertaken and proceedings called regulations were issued creating these Courts. As instances of these regulations the Regulations of 1780 and 1793 may be referred to. This form of government in India was continued from time to time by successive Acts of Parliament and the recognition was not thought inconsistent with the sovereignty of the Crown. In the recital to the Act of 1813 (53 Geo. III., C. 155) reference was made to the undoubted sovereignty of the Crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in and for territorial acquisitions in India. In 1833 the powers of the Governor-General of India in Council were again revised and it was enacted that the superintendence, direction and control of the whole of the civil Government should be thereby vested in the Governor-General of of India in Council. At the time the Government of India Act of 1858 was passed this Council had created an elaborate system of administration of Civil and Criminal justice. What then can be the meaning of section 22 of the Indian Councils Act of 1861, which enables this Council which had been entrusted with the government of India at meetings to which additional persons had been summoned to make laws and regulations repealing, amending or altering any law or regulation whatever now in force in the Indian territories? Several of the regulations then in force were regulations creating Courts. The power included the powers to make laws and regulations for all persons and all Courts of justice whatever and for all places or things whatever. This delegation of plenary power was designed for the benefit of public interests of the greatest magnitude and whatever may fairly be regarded as incidental to or consequential to the main purpose ought not (unless expressly prohibited) to be held by judicial construction to be ultra vires [Attorney-General v. Great Eastern Railway Company (10)].

(10) (1880) 5 A. C. 473; 49 L. J. Ch. 545; 42 L. T. 810; 28 W. R. 769.

This principle has been applied by the Privy Council to the interpretation of the Acts of the Imperial Parliament creating the Indian Legislature in the case, Empress v. Burah (1). Their Lordships say that when the question is raised whether the limits of the powers of the Indian Legislature have been exceeded if the act done lies within the general scope of the affirmative words conferring the power and if there is no express condition or restriction by which that power is limited, it is not for any Court of Justice to enquire further or to enlarge constructively those conditions or restrictions. Now it is clear that the creation of a Court is within the general scope of the affirmative words which confer powers upon the Governor General of India in Council, for it cannot be denied that the creation of Courts is an essential function of Government. It is also clear that there is no express condition or restriction in the Statute which would apply. Their Lordships' judgment also sanctions the principle that where there has been a long course of legislation appropriate to the peculiar circumstances of India prior to the year 1861 it must be presumed to have been known to the Imperial Parliament when the Indian Councils Act of 1861 was passed and that the inference may be drawn that the Imperial Parliament intended to sanction the continuance of the exercise of legislative powers of the same kind. By the application of these principles the Imperial Parliament must be held to have, in 1861, sanctioned the continuance of legislation for the creation of Courts. So far as it may be said to be necessary that the King in person should take a part in the delegation of power such as this, it is sufficient to say that these Statutes received the assent of the Crown—an assent which was not merely formal but which was affirmed so far as the Government of India Act of 1858 is concerned, in a historic proclamation.

The petitioner's Counsel has endeavoured to combat this manifest conclusion by contending that whenever the East India Company, prior to 1861, desired to create a Court, they never ventured to do so without either obtaining a Charter from the sovereign or a special Act of Parliament or authority from the Emperor of Delhi. I am not satisfied that the proposition is true even for the period prior to 1772, for the first Charter creating Mayors' Courts for Madras, Calcutta and Bombay in 1726 refers to the reputation already made for strict and equal distribution of justice. The Act of 1772 creating the Supreme Court in Calcutta as first enacted appears to have enabled cases to be brought before that Court by way of appeal from the Provincial Courts and thus recognised the existence of Courts which were or might be created irrespective of the Act (see concluding portion of section 16, East India Company Act of 1772). The creation of the Provincial Court of Final Civil Appeal; (The Saddar Dewani Adaulat) was, it is true, subsequently validated by Act of Parliament in 1781 but this was done merely in order to obviate conflict with the Supreme Court. The Court of Final Criminal Appeal and the entire system of Criminal Courts created in 1793 received no such validation and can be ascribed to no special express authority either from the sovereign or Parliament in England or from the Emperor at Delhi or to the sovereign prerogative in ceded and conquered territory. It can be referred only to the Act of 1772. Since the enactment of the Government of India Act of 1858 there have been repeated instances of the creation of new Courts by the Governor General of India in Council without any authority other than that derived from the Government of India Act of 1858 and the Indian Councils Act of 1861. The Acts creating these Courts were subject to disallowance by the Crown by order conveyed through the Secretary of State for India, who is representative of the Crown so far as India is concerned. None of these Acts were ever disallowed. The Indian Councils Act came before Parliament for amendment in 1890, 1891, 1892, and 1909 and the Statute of the law on the subject of the Government of India was consolidated by an Act of 1915. Yet the continuous course of legislation for the creation of Courts was never at any time questioned.

The creation of the Court under whose warrant the petitioner is held in custody has not been attacked upon any special ground. It was not, for instance, contended that the Defence of India Act is invalid on the ground that it involves the abrogation of a function essential to the operative existence of this Court I is clear that the Governor-General in the Legislative Council has power to create Courts. I agree that the ground upon which the petitioner asks for our interference fails on the merits.

It is not, therefore, necessary for me to consider whether this Court has power to issue a writ of habeas corpus and I leave the question undetermined.

MULLICK, J.—I entirely concur in the judgment of the learned Chief Justice. In the view I take it is unnecessary to discuss the limits of the authority of the Crown to erect Courts of Justice in India by executive order. In my opinion the authority conferred by section 22 of the Indian Councils Act of 1861 was sufficient to justify the Governor-General in Council in constituting by means of Act IV of 1915 the tribunal by which the petitioner before us has been convicted ROE, J.—I concur in the order proposed. The passages quoted in the judgment of the learned Chief Justice from the judgment of the Judicial Committee in the case of Empress v. Burah (1) furnish in my view a complete answer to the petitioner's case.

ATKINSON, J.—Having had the opportunity of reading and considering the judgment of the learned Chief Justice I desire to express my entire concurrence therewith.

Application rejected.

CRIMINAL REVISION No 665 OF 1917.

RODA SINGH—CONVICT—PETITIONER

v rsus

EMPEROR—RESPONDENT.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 199—Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 498—Accused charged with theft, whether can be convicted under s. 498.

The provision in section 199 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, that no Court shall take cognizance of an offence under section 498 of the Indian Penal Code except upon a complaint made by the husband of the woman, refers to a complaint by the husband of an offence under section 498, not to any complaint made by the husband. [p 205, col. 1.]

Where the complainant charged the accused with theft and neither in the complaint nor in his statement did he allege facts that constituted an offence under section 498 of the Penal Code, nor did he ever ask that the accused should be dealt with under that section:

Held, that having regard to the provisions of section 199 of the Code of Criminal Procedure the accused could not be convicted of an offence under section 498 of the Penal Code, there being no complaint against him by the husband that he had committed such an offence. [p. 205, col. 1.]

Criminal revision from the order of the District Magistrate, Ludhiana, dated the 22nd March 1917.

Mr. Jai Gopal Sethi, for the Petitioner.

JUDGMENT.—The case out of which the present application for revision arises was started upon a complaint made by Rattan Singh against his wife Musammat Chhoto, Musammat Atri and Rodu, present petitioner, charging them with an offence under section 381, Indian Penal Code. The Magistrate remarks, "upon a perusal of the Police papers it appears that the case is under section 498 of the Indian Penal Code," and started to try under that section Musammat Atri and Rodu, and eventually convicted them of offences under that section. The District Magistrate dismissed the appeal to his Court and Rodu Singh has now come up on the revision side.

The contention on his behalf is that there was no complaint by the husband of an offence under section 498, Indian Penal Code, and that the conviction is illegal having regard to section 199 of the Criminal Procedure Code. The District Magistrate has referred to Tara Prosad Laha v Emperor (1), in which it was held that the word complaint in section 199, Criminal Procedure Code, means a complaint as defined by section 4 of the Code, and that the complaint filed by Rattan Singh and his statement of 16th October 1906 constituted a complaint under section 498, Indian Penal Code.

Neither in his original complaint nor in his statement did Rattan Singh allege facts that constituted an offence under section 498, Indian Penal Code, nor did he ever ask that the petitioner should be dealt with under that section. He charged the accused persons with theft and with theft only. In Jatra Shekh v. Reazat Shekh (2) when the complainant charged the accused with an offence under section 366 of the Indian Penal Code in respect of his wife, it was held that the Magistrate was authorised to convict him of an offence under section 498 of the Penal Code. The facts are hardly on all fours with the present case, because the offences described in sections 366 and 498 of the Indian Penal Code are cognate ones, that under section 498 being a minor offence included in one under section 366. In Bangaru Asari v. Emperor (3) it was held that the provision in section 199 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, that no Court shall take cognizance of an offence under section 493 of the Indian Penal Code except upon a complaint made by the husband of the woman, refers to a complaint by the husband of an offence under section 498, not to any complaint made by the husband. In that case Empress of India v. Kallu (4) was followed and approved.

(1) 30 C. 910; 8 C. W. N. 17.
(2) 20 C. 483; 10 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 327.

The case referred to by the District Magistrate reported as Tara Prosad Laha v. Emperor (1) only dealt with the meaning of the word "complaint" referred to in section 199 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The question for decision in the present case was not before the Court in that case. In Chemon Garo v. Emperor (5) it was held that, before a criminal charge of adultery can be preferred, a formal complaint of that offence must be instituted in the manner provided by section 199 of the Criminal Procedure Code. Therefore, when an accused person was committed to the Sessions to stand his trial on a charge preferred by a husband under section 376 of the Penal Code, and the Sessions Judge at the trial added a charge of adultery under section 497 and acquitted the accused under section 376, but convicted him under section 497, it was held that the Sessions Judge had acted without jurisdiction.

Following these decisions and the one reported as Bangaru Asari v. Emperor (3), I am clearly of opinion that petitioner cannot be convicted in the present case of an offence under section 498, Indian Penal Code, as there was no complaint preferred by the husband that he had committed such an offence. I, therefore, allow the revision, and setting aside the conviction of Rodu Singh acquit him and order him to be discharged from his bail.

Revision allowed.

Madras Town Nuisances Act (Mad. Act III of 1889), s. 3—Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 517—Gambling, conviction for—Money tied in gambler's cloth, whether used for 'commission of offence'—Confiscation, legality of—'Used for gaming', meaning of—Discretion of Court—Jurisdiction—'Make such order as it thinks fit' in s. 517 of Act V of 1898, meaning of.

Money or coins can be said to be used for the purpose of gaming under section 3 of the Madras Town Nuisances Act III of 1889 only if they are actually staked. To justify their confiscation the money or coins should have been actually used or displayed in the act of gambling. [p. 206, col. 2.]

Section 517, clause 1, Criminal Procedure Code, authorises the confiscation only of property which has been used for the commission of an offence. [p. 206, col. 1.]

The words 'may make such order as it thinks fit' in the section do not confer on a Court absolute power of disposition over property which is produced before it but regarding which no offence has been committed and which has not been used for the commission of an offence [p 207, col. 1; p. 208 col. 1.]

In re Ponnuswamy Pillay, 1 Ind Cas. 79; 19 M. L. J. 254; 5 M. L. T. 256; 9 Cr. L. J. 149, not approved.

Where some sovereigns were found tied up in the waist cloth of one accused and some others concealed in the mouth of another accused who were convicted under the Madras Town Nuisances Act and the Magistrate ordered confiscation of the sovereigns:

Held, that the order so far as it related to the sovereigns found in the mouth of one of the accused was legal, as it could be reasonably inferred that they were intentionally secreted to avoid exposure but that the confiscation of the coins tied in the waist cloth was illegal. [p 207, col. 1; p. 208, col. 1.]

Per Phillips, J—The powers under section 517, Criminal Procedure Code, are very large and the Magistrate's discretion under it is wide, but such discretion must be exercised judicially and, if so exercised, the High Court should not interfere with it in revision. [p. 207, col. 2.]

If there are circumstances from which an inference can be drawn that money has been used for gaming, a Magistrate can order its forfeiture and it is not necessary that he should hold an enquiry for that purpose. [p. 208, col. 1.]

APPAJI IYER v. EMPEROR.

Petition, under sections 435 and 439 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, praying the High Court to revise the judgment of the Court of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, Gopichettipalayam, in Appeal No. 26 of 19 7, preferred against that of the Court of the 3rd Class Magistrate, Satyamangalam, in Calendar Case No. 84 of 1917.

Mr. J. C. Adam, for the Petitioners.

Mr. C. Narasimha Chariar, for the Public Prosecutor, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

AYLING, J.—I can see no reason for interfering with the conviction in this case or with the order directing the destruction of the cards. The real difficulty is in determining whether the Magistrate had jurisdiction to pass the order confiscating the money (12 sovereigns) found on the person of accused Nos. 2 and 3.

The order admittedly cannot be brought under the last paragraph of section 3 of Act III of 1889, inasmuch as the conviction was not under clause 10 of the same section: and it can only be upheld if it is covered by section 517, Criminal Procedure Code, clause 1 of which runs as follows:—

"When an enquiry or a trial in any Criminal Court is concluded, the Court may make such order as it thinks fit for the disposal of the property or document produced before it or in its custody or regarding which any offence appears to have been committed, or which has been used for the commission of any offence."

Mr. C. Narasimha Chariar who appeared for the Public Prosecutor has endeavoured to support it on two grounds:—

(1) That the money was property "which has been used for the commission of an offence", i. e., gaming in a common gaming house (section 7 of Act III of 1889);

(2) that, even if it were not, the Court had jurisdiction to dispose of it by confiscation under the earlier part of the clause as property produced before it.

I have no doubt that the section authorises the confiscation of property "which has been used for the commission of an offence" [vide Ramasami Aiyar v. Venkateswara Aiyar (1)] but are the sovereigns such property? The Sub-Magistrate who passed the order merely speaks of them as property 'concerned in the case'. The Sub Divisional Magistrate in upholding it calls them "sovereigns used for gaming"; but he does not refer to, much less discuss, the evidence to show that they were used for gaming, or consider the difference between the sovereigns found in 3rd accused's mouth and the sovereigns found in 2nd accused's pocket. I take it the coins can only be said to have been used for gaming if they had been actually staked.

Now, as regards the 8 sovereigns found in 3rd accused's mouth I think this can be legitimately inferred from the evidence. The place of concealment tends to indicate a guilty knowledge and P. W. No. 1 deposes that, when the Police party entered, 7 or 8 sovereigns were lying on the mat with the cards. This disappeared somehow and it may be fairly inferred that 3rd accused, who was one of the gamblers, snatched them up and put them in his mouth. I think the order of confiscation of the 8 sovereigns found in 3rd accused's mouth can be upheld on this ground.

The other four were found, three tied in 3rd accused's waist cloth and one in 2nd accused's pocket. There is nothing to indicate that these coins had been staked; and it cannot be inferred from the fact they were found in the pocket or cloth of a person engaged in gambling. Emperor v. Walli Mussaji (2) and Emperor v. Tota (3) are cases in which orders for confiscation of money in similar circumstances were set aside, because they were not covered by the terms of the Gambling Acts in force; there was apparently no suggestion in either case that any portion of section 517, Criminal Procedure Code, could be invoked in aid of the order.

Mr. Narasimha Chariar, however, seeks to fall back on the first portion of the section and argues that the coins were produced before the Court, and that the Court is authorised to dispose of them 'as it thinks fit', which words would, he says, include even confiscation. The section was altered in 1898 and its present wording is, no doubt, startlingly wide; but I cannot believe that it was

As regards eight of them the inference is very strong; but the inference as regards the other four is much weaker, and while I am doubtful whether it can be said that the Magistrates have exercised their discretion in an arbitrary manner as regards these four sovereigns and that, I take, would be the only ground for interference by this Court in a case of revision, I am not prepared to differ from my learned brother's opinion and agree in the order proposed.

Order partly set aside.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 421—Appeal, summary dismissal of, without giving reason, legality of—Procedure.

In dismissing appeals under section 421 of the Code of Criminal Procedure some reason should be given and without such reason the summary dismissal would involve either a remand of the appeal to be admitted and heard or an examination of the evidence by the High Court.

Criminal revision from an order of the District Magistrate, Shahabad.

Mr. Rajendra Prasad, for the Petitioner.

JUDGMENT.—The order of the learned District Magistrate of Shahabad dismissing the appeal of Ram Kant Pandit is composed of one line. "This appeal is summarily dismissed." This order of the learned Magistrate is ultra vires of the Code of Criminal Procedure and the point is concluded by authority. It was held in Gurubari Behera v. Emperor (1) that in dismissing appeals under section 421 of the Code some reason should be given and that without such reason the summary dismissal would involve either a remand of the appeal to be admitted and heard or an examination of the evidence by this Court. The learned Magistrate of Shahabad has not acted in accordance with the principle laid down in this ruling. His order of summary dismissal of the appeal is set aside, and the case is sent back with directions to the District Magistrate to admit the appeal and try it.

Order set aside.

intended thereby to confer on a Court the absolute power of disposition of property regarding which no offence has been committed and which has not been used for the commission of an offence. A reference to the draft bill which ended in the Code of 1898 shows that the original intention was to empower a Court to pass such order as it thought fit for the disposal of any property produced before it "the title to which is doubtful or in dispute"; which seems to indicate a provisional disposal of that property, leaving any party claiming an interest therein to seek his remedy through the usual channels against the holder. In the Select Committee the words 'the title to which is doubtful or in dispute' disappeared, an omission which is not explained in the Committee's report. If the intention had been to confer such wide punitive powers as are now claimed (for confiscation implies nothing less), it is difficult to believe that no explanation would have been offered. We have not been referred to any case in which the section has been construed in such a wide sense. The judgment in Kussul Bibee v. Ahmed Moosajee (4) implies no more than the limited and provisional power above indicated. The two cases already quoted, Emperor v. Walli Mussaji (2) and Emperor v. Tota (3), are both indirectly against such a view; for in each case the order set aside could apparently have been supported in view of the law contended for on behalf of the Court. With these may be read the order in Ponnusawmy Pillay, In re (5), which is indeed an authority to the contrary though no doubt of an obiter nature and unsupported by reasons. I may also refer to the view taken by the learned Judges in Abinash Chandra Battacharjee v. Emperor (6) regarding the proper interpretation of the earlier portion of the section, although I am unable to follow them as regards the limitation of forfeiture of property connected with an offence.

I would set aside the order of confiscation of these four sovereigns as not warranted by section 517, Criminal Procedure Code, and direct their return to the persons from whom they were seized.

PHILLIPS, J.—The first point taken is that the finding that the house is a gaming house is based on the uncorrobrated testimony of an accomplice. In the first place P. W. No. 2 is hardly an accomplice in the offence charged, although he may have frequented the house for gambling on previous occasion and, secondly, the evidence of P. W. No. 1 is corroborative in that it shows that some nine persons of different castes were gambling together. Our interference in the concurrent finding of the two Courts is not called for on this ground.

The second point is that the order to confiscate the cards and sovereigns is not legal. The Sub-Magistrate does not state under what provision of law he passed the order, but inasmuch as the convictions were under sections 6 and 7 of Act III of 1889 the order cannot have been passed under section 3 of that Act and the presumption being that the Sub-Magistrate acted according to law, the order must have been passed under section 517, Criminal Procedure Code, the section relied on by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate. The question then is whether the order is a legal order; and the cases quoted for petitioners, i. e., Emperor v. Walli Mussaji (2) and Emperor v. Tota (3), are not very much to the point as they relate to the provisions of special Acts, and not to section 517, Criminal Procedure Code. The powers under the section are very large and the Magistrate's discretion under it is wide, for he can make such order as he thinks fit' for the disposal of any property produced before him [vide Kussul Bibee v. Ahmed Moosajee (4)]. Such discretion must, I take it, be exercised judicially, and if it has been so exercised, I do not think that we should interfere in revision, especially when the order has been confirmed by an Appellate Court. In the present case, P. W. No. 1 says that he saw sovereigns being used for gambling, and when accused Nos. 1 to 3 were arrested 8 sovereigns were found in 3rd accused's mouth, three in a towel or handkerchief tucked into his waist and one in 2nd accused's pocket. Under section 3 of Act III of 1889 money employed or displayed for the purpose of gaming is liable to forfeiture, and consequently an Hindu Law—Will, construction of—Life-estate to daughter-in-law, with reversion to her male issue—Son, whether can alienate property during lifetime of devisee.

The single rule of construction in a Hindu as in an English Will is to try to find out the meaning of the testator taking the whole of the document together and to give effect to this meaning. [p. 210, col. 1.]

Plaintiff sued for a declaration that the alienation of certain property effected by her son was null and void, on the ground that under the Will of her late father-in-law she was the sole owner of the property during her lifetime and that the defendant had no interest in it The Will gave a life-estate to the plaintiff and provided that her husband "should receive one-half of the income accruing from the property during his lifetime", that after his death "the right to income accruing from immoveable property shall devolve upon his male issue, if any," and that after the plaintiff's death the property shall devolve upon the male issue, if any, of the plaintiff and her husband:

Held, (1) that the testator intended that his estate should vest in his daughter-in-law for her lifetime and that his son (plaintiff's husband) and, after his death, his male issue should receive a moiety of the income accruing therefrom; [p. 210, col. 1.]

(2) that during the lifetime of the plaintiff her son had no right whatsoever in the estate and was not consequently entitled to dispose of it either temporarily or permanently. [p. 210, col. 1.]

First appeal from the order of the Sub-Judge, 1st Class, Lahore, dated the 27th October 1914.

The Hon'ble Mr. Fazl-i-Husain and Pandit Ram Bhaj Dutta Chaudhri, for the Appellant.

Lala Moti Sagar, R. S., for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—On the 13th November 1881 one Punjab Singh, the father in-law of the present plaintiff, made a Will disposing of certain moveable and immoveable property in the manner described therein, and the dispute between the parties to this litigation depends upon the interpretation to be placed upon the provisions relating to the disposition made by the testator. It may be stated at once that there is no longer any contest as to the factum of the Will; and Mr. Moti Sagar for the respondents also admits the validity thereof in so far as the testator's power of disposal over the property is concerned. The following brief pedigree-table explains the relation[illegible] different persons affected by the [illegible]ons of the Will :—

Devi Dial=Musammat Jasodhan (plaintiff)
Bishan Singh.

Punjab Singh died in 1882, and his son Devi Dial died 18 years afterwards in 1900. Bishen Singh, who was born in 1890, mortgaged on the 19th December 1912 one-half share in certain house property to the defendants Bulaki Ram and Ram Lal, and the action out of which the present appeal arises was brought by Musammat Jasodhan on the allegation that under the Will she was the sole owner of the property during her lifetime and that Bishan Singh had no interest in the property during that period ; and she accordingly prayed for a declaration that the alienation effected by him was null and void. The Subordinate Judge, while holding that a life-estate was created in favour of Masammat Jasodhan, has dismissed the suit on the ground that " Bishan Singh was not born at the time of its execution, its provisions so far as they postpone the vesting of the property in him are thus not binding on him. " He then by a curious process of reasoning, which we are unable to follow, has reached the conclusion that the Will is "ineffectual to restrain the rights of the grandson who was not born at the time and who would be entitled to succeed in the ordinary course of succession under the Hindu law. " The result is that the Sub-Judge has dismissed the suit, presumably on the ground that the life estate in favour of the plaintiff is rendered invalid by reason of the restriction on the rights of the grandson.

It is clear that this judgment is wholly wrong and cannot be sustained. If the estate in favour of the plaintiff was validly created and came into operation on the death of the testator, we fail to understand how the alleged invalid restriction imposed upon the estate in favour of the grandson, which estate could in no case take effect prior to his birth, would have the effect of putting an end to the prior estate. It is, however, unnecessary to consider this matter at length, because Mr. Moti Sagar for the respondents frankly admits that he is unable to support the judgment of the lower Court. He, however, contends that Musammat Jasodhan is, under the Will, entitled only to one-half of the income of the estate ; that she has no other interest in the property ; and that consequently she has no locus standi to contest the alienation.

Now, it has been repeatedly laid down that the single rule of construction in a Hindu as in an English Will is to try to find out the meaning of the testator, taking the whole of the document together, and to give effect to this meaning. We have given our careful consideration to the language of the document as a whole, and arrived at the conclusion that the testator intended that his estate should vest in Musammat Jasodhan for her lifetime; and that Devi Dial and after his death, his male issue should receive only a moiety of the income accruing therefrom. As regards Devi Dial the testator says in the clearest possible language that he "should receive one-half of the income accruing from the property during his lifetime." The Will further provides that "after the death of Devi Dial the right to income accruing from immoveable property shall devolve upon his male issue, if any", and it is only after the death of Masammat Jasodhan that the property shall devolve upon the male issue, if any, of Musammat Jasodhan and Devi Dial.

There can, therefore, be no manner of doubt that during the lifetime of Musammat Jasodhan, Bishan Singh has no right whatsoever in the estate, and is not consequently entitled to dispose of it either temporarily or permanently. But Mr. Moti Sagar contends that even if the alienation is unauthorized, the plaintiff upon whom the onus rests, has failed to show that she is entitled to contest it. The learned Pleader argues that the only right, she possesses, is to receive one half of the income, and that that right is not prejudicially affected by the alienation in question, which deals only with a moiety of the property. This contention would place Musammat Jasodhan upon the same footing as her husband Devi Dial, but on a perusal of the different clauses of the testament we are of opinion that the testator drew a distinction between her and the male devisee, and that he conferred the estate upon her for her lifetime. In paragraph 6 after providing for the payment of his debts and for certain legacies the testator says that the remaining property shall devolve upon Musammat Jasodhan. It is clear that there is no such provision in favour of her husband or her son. Then paragraph 7 prescribes that "after the death of Musammat Jasodhan the property shall devolve" upon her male issue by Devi Dial, and the only thing, which Mr. Moti Sagar urges in this connection, is that the word "property" means one-half of the property. There is, however, no foundation for this contention. Apart from the clear language used by the testator it is to be observed that if the word "property" was intended to refer to half the estate, there would have been some provision dealing with the remaining half ; but no such provision is to be found anywhere.

It is true that Musammat Jasodhan was not allowed to alienate any part of the property but this must be construed in a reasonable manner and what the testator probably intended was that she must have the usual life-estate recognized by the Hindu Law. It appears that ordinarily she was to enjoy half the income of the property, the other half going to her husband and upon his death to his male issue, if any. But even this second half she was entitled to receive in the event of there being no issue of Devi Dial.

For the foregoing reasons we hold that Bishan Singh has no right to the property during the lifetime of the plaintiff, and that the latter is entitled to impeach the alienation which affects her prejudicially. Upon the question of estoppel, which has not been determined by the lower Court, there is no evidence worth the name which would show that the plaintiff led the alienees to believe that Bishan Singh was the owner of the property alienated by him, or that they acted upon such belief. Accordingly we accept the appeal, and setting aside the decree of the lower Court, pass a decree in plaintiff's favour declaring that she is the owner of the property during her lifetime, that Bishan Singh has no right to that property during that period, and that the mortgage effected by him in favour of defendants Nos. 2 and 3 is null and void. The alienees must pay the costs incurred by the plaintiff in both the Courts.

Where immoveable property is hypothecated the fixtures pass to the mortgagee. The rule in this respect as between landlord and tenant does not apply as between mortgagor and mortgagee. [p. 211, col. 2.]

The method provided by section 172 of the Contract Act for the hypothecation of loose chattels is not the only method for creating security thereon. They may be hypothecated without transferring their possession. In such cases the only question that arises is whether there was an intention to create a security and if there was an intention to create a security, equity gives effect to it. [p. 211, col. 2.]

JUDGMENT.

FLETCHER, J.—This is an appeal by the defendant No. 2 against the decision of the learned Subordinate Judge of Howrah dated the 6th May 1915. The action was brought by the plaintiff for the purpose of enforcing an equitable mortgage on certain moveable and immoveable properties comprised in an indenture of conveyance executed in favour of the Defendant No. 1. The Defendant No. 2 is an attaching creditor of the defendant No. 1, and he says that the property in suit is not subject to any equitable mortgage as stated by the plaintiff. The learned Judge in the Court below decreed the suit in favour of the plaintiff and hence the present appeal.

The learned Judge in the Court below has found that the deposit as mentioned by the plaintiff was, in fact, made. It was evidenced by a letter, dated the 20th November 1913, signed by the first defendant and it is not denied that the deposit did, in fact, take place within the limit of the Presidency town. Therefore, as regards the immoveable property, the security could be created in that manner as provided by section 59 of the Transfer of Property Act. This appeal has been argued solely with regard to the moveable property that is mentioned in the conveyance to the defendant No. 1. The moveable property consists of plant and machinery, both fixed and unfixed. As regards the fixed machinery, the law is well established that between the mortgagor and the mortgagee that passes by the mortgage. The rule as between landlord and tenant does not apply between the mortgagor and mortgagee and the fixtures pass to the mortgagee. That rule has been established for many years. As regards the loose chattels, the case stands differently. It has been argued in the present appeal that the law in British India does not permit of a hypothecation of loose chattels except in the method provided by section 172 of the Indian Contract Act; that is, the only security that is permitted on loose chattels is the contract of pawn where the possession of the goods is transferred to the pawnee. That is clearly not so. The Indian Contract Act does not state that the whole of the law of contract in British India is comprised in the Act. In fact, the preamble of the Act shows clearly that the Act only contains a portion of the law of contract applicable in British India and there is nothing to prevent a person from hypothecating his goods to another person for security. The ordinary principles of equity apply in such cases, namely, the question becomes whether there was an intention to create a security and if there was an intention to create a security, equity gives effect to it. It is quite clear that in a case like this, it is impossible to hold, where a large body of the community is engaged in commercial pursuits—say, where a thousand tons of coal or a large parcel of goods is concerned; that the banker is bound to take actual possession of the property. That contention obviously has no force. That is the first point that has been raised. It is quite clear that there is nothing to prevent a security of this nature.

The second point is that the letter, dated the 20th November 1913, is a document of title requiring registration under the provisions of the Indian Registration Act. Quite clearly, it is not a document of title. It does not profess to be a document of title, it professes to be a letter addressed by the defendant No. 1 to the plaintiff showing for what purpose he had deposited the document with the plaintiff. That is merely evidentiary to the purposes for which the deposit was made. That clearly is not a document requiring registration under the provisions of the Indian Registration Act as being a mortgage.

The next point is, as I have already stated, that no security is recognised on chattels except as provided by section 172 of the Indian Contract Act. That is not so, as already remarked.

The last point is as to the form of the decree. It is agreed between the parties that the decree made herein does not cast any personal liability on the defendant No. 2 to pay the money found due on the mortgage.

The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Berar Land Revenue Code, s. 79 (2)—Annual tenancy, whether includes tenancy for a year—Notice to quit, whether necessary—Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), s. 111 d.

The expression "annual tenancy" as used in section 79 of the Berar Land Revenue Code is meant to cover a tenancy from year to year only and not a tenancy lasting for a year only. No notice by either party to a contract of tenancy for one year is therefore, necessary to determine the tenancy. [p. 213, col. 1.]

Appeal from the decree of the Court of the Additional District Judge, East Berar, dated the 5th of January 1917, in Appeal No. 304 of 1916.

Mr. V. D. Sathaye, for the Appellant.

Mr. A. C. Roy, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff, an ijardar of a village in Berar, filed this suit on the 25th April 1916 to eject the defendant from two fields, on the ground that they had been leased to him in writing for one year from the 1st April 1915 to the 31st March 19 6, and the defendant has refused to vacate the fields on the expiry of the term. The defendant admitted that he had held on lease the above fields in 1915-1916 but he pleaded that the lease was an oral one. He further alleged that he was holding the same fields then on another lease for one year, viz., 1916-17, and the plaintiff had, therefore, no right to eject him.

Both the lower Courts have found that the defendant held the fields in 1915-16 on an oral lease and that the alleged lease for 1916-17 is not proved. The first Court decreed the plaintiff's claim, but the lower Appellate Court has dismissed it on the plea raised by the defendant in appeal that the plaintiff was bound to give notice to quit under section 79 (2) of the Berar Land Revenue Code before he could be ejected. It has overruled the plaintiff's contention that the lease in suit is not an annual tenancy such as is contemplated by section 79 of the Berar Land Revenue Code. The point, therefore, for determination is whether the expression "annual tenancy" used in that section applies to a lease for a single year.

The term "annual tenancy" may have two meanings, viz., "tenancy from year to year," and if you give the word "annual" one of its dictionary meanings, viz., lasting for a year (as an annual plant or annual ticket), "a tenancy for a single year."

I think there are strong reasons against holding that the expression "annual tenancy" in section 79 (2) was meant to cover a tenancy for one year only. Apart from the fact that it is a somewhat unusual use of legal language to speak of tenancy for one year only as an annual tenancy, the general rule of law with regard to notice to quit in connection with tenancies is that no such notice is necessary to determine a tenancy for a fixed period as a demise for a year (see Woodfall's Law of Landlord and Tenant, 19th Edition, page 403, and cases cited therein, and the Transfer of Property Act, IV of 1882, section 111 A). If, therefore, the expression "annual tenancy" is held to include a tenancy for a year, it would be attributing to the Legislature an intention of derogating from the general law and of interfering with the freedom of contract, for a notice to quit cannot be taken to have been contemplated by the parties to a tenancy for a year as the contract itself virtually provides for its determination. In such a case it would be unreasonable and unjust to one of the parties to allow the other to insist upon a notice before the tenancy can be determined. Any construction which leads to such unreasonableness or injustice should be avoided (see Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes, 5th edition, page 372).

I hold that section 79 (2) of the Berar Land Revenue Code does not apply to a tenancy for a year and no notice by either party to the contract is necessary to be given to the other before the tenancy can be determined in such a case. The appeal is allowed with costs.

Appeal allowed.

Limitation Act (IX of 1908), s. 20—Mortgage without possession—Sub-mortgagee, rights of—Payment made by mortgagor to sub-mortgagee, whether saves limitation against sub-mortgagor.

A sub-mortgage comprises amongst other things the personal covenant of the sub-mortgagor and under that covenant his position in relation to the sub-mortgagee is closely analogous to that of a surety and he is thus entitled to recover the debt from the original debtor, though he is bound to pay it over to the sub-mortgagee in discharge of the sub-mortgage. [p 215, col. 2.]

There is no essential distinction between his position and that of an acknowledged surety. [p. 216, col. 1.]

If the mortgagor, therefore, makes a payment to the sub mortgagee, it operates to save limitation also as against the sub-mortgagor. [p. 216, col. 1.]

(Case-law discussed.)

Second appeal from the decree of the Additional Divisional Judge, Multan, at Muzaffargarh, dated the 1st April 1914.

Dr. Gokal Chand Narang, for the Appellant.

Messrs. Shah Nawaz and Hargopal, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—In 1896 Sultan mortgaged his own land and that of his younger brother Ahmad to Ram Chand for Rs. 1,500. The mortgage was without possession but the mortgagor agreed to pay one-fourth of the produce as interest.

In 1898 Ram Chand sub-mortgaged half of his rights to certain relatives who are now represented by Mewa Ram alone.

On the 28th April 1904 Sultan having died Ram Chand sued Musammat Rahiman, the widow of Sultan and Ahmad, for one-fourth of the produce of the whole area mortgaged. He obtained a decree on 23rd July 1904 for the produce of one-half of the land only, it being held that the mortgage by Sultan of Ahmad's land was invalid.

On 19th August 1904 the property of Musammat Rahiman was bought by Khuda Bakhsh and Imam Bakhsh, defendants Nos. 2 and 3 in this case. They admittedly paid off the half of the debt due to Ram Chand and they contend that they paid off the whole debt. According, however, both to Mewa Ram and Ram Chand, only Ram Chand's share of the debt was redeemed.

The present suit was instituted on 7th March 1912 by Mewa Ram, the real defendants being Khuda Bakhsh and Imam Bakhsh, defendants Nos 2 and 3, and Ram Chand, defendant No. 4. The plaintiff asked for a decree for the principal and the value of the produce for three years estimated at Rs. 350, total Rs. 1,100, against the defendants personally and against the property mortgaged.

The District Judge, who was of the opinion that Ram Chand had committed some fraud, found himself unable to hold that defendants Nos. 2 and 3 were still liable for the debt and as against them he dismissed the suit; but he found that Ram Chand was personally liable to the plaintiff and that the plaintiff had been getting his share of the produce through Ram Chand up to within six years of the institution of the suit which was, therefore, within time. He accordingly granted the plaintiff a decree for Rs. 1,100 against Ram Chand alone.

With this decree the plaintiff was satisfied, but Ram Chand appealed to the Additional Divisional Judge who referred to the finding that the plaintiff had been receiving produce through Ram Chand. He may have intended to endorse it, though he did not do so expressly remarking merely that the plaintiff had certainly been receiving the produce up to 1906. That, however, does not appear to have been his reason for holding that the suit was within time as against Ram Chand. His view was that as Ram Chand had not informed Mewa Ram of the suit for produce brought in 1904, he had committed a fraud upon Mewa Ram. The line of argument adopted by him was that as Ram Chand had sued for the whole produce including the share of Mewa Ram (though that fact was not disclosed in the suit), Mewa Ram was debarred under Order II, rule 2, from recovering his money from defendants Nos. 2 and 3 and that time began to run against Mewa Ram for the recovery of his money from Ram Chand only when this fraud on the part of Ram Chand came to the knowledge of the plaintiff. The Additional Divisional Judge agreed with the first Court that Ram Chand was personally liable and he, therefore, dismissed the appeal.

Ram Chand has now preferred a second appeal to this Court.

It is not now seriously contended that section 18 of the Limitation Act is of any application in the present case. A suit of Mewa Ram against defendants Nos. 2 and 3 would not be barred by Order II, rule 2, because a sub-mortgagee is not in any way bound by the result of any suit brought by the original mortgagee (see Gour's Law of Transfer, 4th Edition, Volume II, page 1482), and it cannot be said that the right of the plaintiff to institute the present suit has been kept from his knowledge by any fraud on the part of Ram Chand.

The appeal is, however, defended on another ground, that the suit as against Ram Chand is within time by virtue of the provisions of section 20 of the Limitation Act.

Counsel for the respondent relies first on the finding of the first Court that Mewa Ram continued to receive his share of the produce through Ram Chand. As already explained, it is uncertain whether the Additional Divisional Judge intended to concur in that finding, but even if he did so it is one which cannot stand. The only evidence on the point which has been believed is contained in the books of the plaintiff Mewa Ram, and from this it would appear that he was getting his share of the produce first from Sultan and afterwards from Khuda Bakhsh up to November 1906, that being the date of the last entry. Moreover, the plaintiff himself never alleged that he had got his share of the produce through Ram Chand. The finding in question, therefore, must be regarded as a finding that Mewa Ram continued to get his produce up to November 1906 from defendants Nos. 2 and 3. That is a finding which cannot be attacked on second appeal and it is not attacked. Indeed when Ram Chand was examined by the first Court he admitted that Mewa Ram had continued to get his share of the produce from defendants Nos. 2 and 3 as alleged by him.

Accordingly as between Mewa Ram and Ram Chand whose personal liability is not denied, the only question now remaining in issue is whether limitation is saved as against Ram Chand by the payment of produce by Khuda Bakhsh and Imam Bakhsh to Mewa Ram up to November 1906.

This being a mortgage without possession, the law applicable is that contained in section 20 (1) of the Limitation Act. The contention of Counsel for the appellant is that limitation is saved only as against Khuda Bakhsh and Imam Bakhsh and in support of this contention he has cited Narayana Ayyar v. Venkataramana Ayyar (1) and Gopal Daji Sathe v. Gopal (2). Narayana Ayyar v. Venkata- ramana Ayyar (1) was a case in which a mortgage had been acknowledged by only one of several co-mortgagors and the High Court of Madras held that the suit was saved from being barred by limitation as against him only. The view taken was that one of several joint contractors cannot be chargeable by a written acknowledgment under section 19 of Act XV of 1877 by reason only that such acknowledgment is made by another joint contractor. As a matter of fact co-mortgagors are not expressly mentioned in section 21 (2) of Act IX of 1908 but granting that they are included in the term "joint contractors" the ruling in question does not appear to us to assist the appellant. Khuda Bakhsh and Imam Bakhsh were admittedly both liable to pay the produce to Mewa Ram and they were the only persons liable in the first instance, the personal liability of Ram Chand only arising on their default.

(1) 25 M. 220 (F. B.).

In Gopal Daji Sathe v. Gopal (2) it was held that part payment of a debt by a principal debtor would not prevent limitation running against the surety. Both the principal and the surety seemed to have agreed to pay by the same contract and it may be that they were regarded as joint contractors. Jenkins, C. J., however, had observed that the principal's debt was distinct from that of the surety and that the principal was not the person liable to pay the debt of the surety, and this dictum was criticised in Velayudam Pillai v. Vaithyalingam Pillai (3), a decision of a Division Bench of the Madras High Court where it was remarked that the view taken was hardly in accordance with Allison v. Frisby (4). We have not been able to find any reported case in which the exact point now under our consideration has arisen. The debt under discussion in Velayudam Pillai v. Vaithyalingam Pillai (3) was one due on a promissory note, but it was held that section 20 of the Limitation Act requires that "the payer should be one liable to pay debts and provides that the result of the payment would be to give the creditor a fresh period of limitation from the date of payment; it does not restrict the benefit accruing to the creditor with respect to his debt to his remedy against the payer alone. According to the language of the section, the debt being kept alive the result must be to make it enforceable against any one liable for it."

Again in Pears v. Laing (5) it was held that the payment of interest by one person liable on a mortgage was binding upon all persons interested in the mortgaged property. In this ruling reference was made to the case of Roddam v. Morley (6), in which it has been held that the payment of interest by a tenant for life of a devised estate keeps a specialty alive against the persons entitled in remainder. Lold Cranworth in discussing the words of the Statute of Limitation said: "It does not in terms confine his right to a right of action against the persons who made the payment, and we have no right to introduce words for the purpose of so confirming it." Allison v. Frisby (4) was a case in which the mortgagor and his surety jointly and severally covenanted for the payment of the mortgage-debt. The mortgagor paid the interest up to a certain date, but the surety never made any payment or gave any acknowledgment. It was held that the payment of interest by the mortgagor prevented the Statute from running in favour of the surety. Lord Justice Fry remarked as follows:—"If we were to confine 'payment' to a payment by the person against whom or his representatives the action is brought, I think we should be doing great injustice. It is usual for the mortgagor, not the surety, to pay the interest, and it would be contrary to good sense and the common understanding of mankind that while he is doing so, the Statute should run in favour of the surety unless he makes a payment or gives an acknowledgment."

A sub-mortgage comprises amongst other things the personal covenant of the sub-mortgagor and under that covenant his position in relation to the sub-mortgagee is closely analogous to that of a surety and he is thus entitled to recover the debt from the original debtor, though he is bound to pay it over to the sub-mortgagee in discharge of the sub-mortgage (see Gour's Law of Transfer, 4th edition, Volume II, page 823) and we can see no essential distinction between his position and that of an acknowledged surety. If again the mortgagor makes a payment to the sub-mortgagee the action is kept alive for the sub-mortgagor and if he is entitled to take the benefit he must surely accept the burden. A sub-mortgagee, while he is still receiving payment from the mortgagor, is led to believe that he will not lose his rights against the sub-mortgagor and if this is not so, he would in the case of a mortgage without possession always lose his rights against the sub-mortgagor at the expiry of six years from the date of the mortgage unless he obtained some separate acknowledgment from the sub-mortgagor also. Section 20 of the Limitation Act does not say that limitation is saved only against the person who makes the payment and we do not think that it should be so interpreted, especially when in our opinion such an interpretation would be repugnant to a sense of common justice.

We hold then that the suit as against Ram Chand is within time and as his liability is not disputed on any other ground, we dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Co-owners, rights of—Adverse possession by co-owner, requisites of—Partition, suit for, by co-owner out of possession, form of—Court-fee payable—Suit financed by third person, effect of.

The possession of one co-owner is prima facie the possession of the other co-owners and in order to make the possession of one co-owner adverse to the other co-owners there must be an actual ouster of the latter. Where one co-owner has been in uninterrupted possession for a large number of years, the Court may presume that there has been an ouster of the other co-owners without any express evidence of the fact of such ouster [p. 217, cols. 1 & 2.]

In a partition suit ordinarily it is not very material as to whether the plaintiff is or is not actually in possession of his share. But in this country in the Mofussil Courts it is important, because a person who sues for partition and is out of possession must ask, first of all, to be restored to possession of his share and pay additional ad valorem fee upon his plaint, whereas in a case where the plaintiff is in possession he simply sues for partition and separation of his share on a plaint bearing a stamp of Rs. 10 only. If the case of a plaintiff is a genuine one it does not matter much who found the money to finance the suit. [p. 219, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.

FLETCHER, J.—This is an appeal by the defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3 from the decision of the learned second Subordinate Judge of Comilla, dated the 24th March 1917. The appeal is preferred against a preliminary decree passed in a suit for partition. The parties are Mahomedans. They had a common ancestor, that is, the grandfather of the first three defendants one Fazil Mahomed. Fazil Mahomed had two sons, Jamiruddi and Maniruddi. Jamiruddi married Tilakjan, the defendant No. 4, and of that marriage there were two daughters only, namely, Atardan and Nabojan. Jamiruddi then died and Maniruddi married his widow Tilakjan. The children that Maniruddi had were, first of all, the defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3, three sons. He had also a daughter named Safarjan. Safarjan married the first plaintiff and had one son and no more, namely, the plaintiff No. 2. The share sought to be recovered in this suit was the share that Safarjan took under the Muhammadan Law as one of the heirs of her deceased father Maniruddi. The question in this case, therefore, is whether the plaintiffs have the right to recover that share. The learned Judge of the Court below has found that the plaintiffs have got the right that Safarjan had and, as regards the property sued for, the learned Judge has decreed in favour of the plaintiffs a 1/8th share in one of the plots mentioned in the plaint, namely, plot No. 13, and 17/192 share of the other plots. This appeal has been preferred against that finding and the points that have been urged in this appeal have been urged, if I may say so without disrespect, at great length and with considerable particularity and they are these:—

The first point is that the case of the defendants was that after the death of Maniruddi, Safarjan had relinquished in consideration of a payment of Rs. 50 all interest which she had taken in the property as one of the heirs of Maniruddi. That case of payment depended solely on consideration of the oral testimony and the learned Subordinate Judge disbelieved it. It is said that the learned Judge was wrong in disbelieving that, because he accepted the story put forward by these defendants that the two daughters of the defendant Tilakjan by her first marriage with Jamiruddi had, in fact, relinquished their shares in favour either of the defendants or of Maniruddi. I do not think that that is so. Those payments do not stand or fall together because the daughters of Tilakjan by her first marriage came forward and gave evidence and stated that they made no claim to the property; and after such statement, it was immaterial for the Judge to enquire whether the statment as to the time and mode of the payment of Rs. 50 was or was not correct. I do not see that that in any way can affect the truth of the story as to the payment of Rs. 50 to Safarjan. So far as I have seen the evidence, I am of opinion that the story of this alleged payment was a wholly improbable and untrue story.

The next question that is raised is a question which the learned Vakil for the appellants has placed considerable stress on, and that is the issue of limitation. It is stated that the plaintiffs never having been in possession of the property, their suit is barred by the law of limitation; and the learned Vakil cited a great number of cases in support of that argument. The principles applicable to cases of this nature are perfectly simple. They have been laid down in numerous authorities and they are these. That the possession of one co-owner is prima facie the possession of the other co-owners and that in order to make the possession adverse there must have been ouster of the plaintiff, although there are cases that where the possession of the defendant has been long and uninterrupted for a large number of years, the Court has come to the conclusion that the evidence in the circumstances of the case does warrant the finding that there has been an ouster of the plaintiff, without any express evidence of the fact of such ouster. These are the short principles that can be deduced from those cases. Judgments have been cited where a particular set of facts brought the case within those rules. But the rules are stated shortly and clearly in the judgment of the Privy Council in the appeal from the Colony of Ceylon reported as Corea v. Appuhamy (1). Now, what is the evidence in this case on which either it is proved that there was an actual ouster or it may be said that the Court ought to infer that there was an ouster of the plaintiffs? The actual ouster is really not set up by anybody. The case was not a case of actual ouster as presented in the written statement but it was a case of the acquisition of the interest of Safarjan by the payment of Rs. 50 and this case of ouster was not set up at all. The learned Judge was much impressed by the evidence of the fact of the occasional visits paid by Safarjan to her mother Tilakjan and also of the fact that the infant plaintiff was on his mother's death nursed and brought up at Tilakjan's house. Personally, I feel no doubt, even apart from that evidence of the infant plaintiff having lived in the premises of Tilakjan, that there was no ouster of the plaintiffs. The case set up in the written statement does not, in any way, support an actual ouster which is necessary to prove that the possession of the defendants had become adverse as against the plaintiffs.

The next point urged is a point that is closely allied to the question of limitation and that is whether at the institution of the suit the plaintiffs were or were not in possession of the property. In a partition suit ordinarily it is not very material as to whether the plaintiff is or is not actually in possession of his share. But in this country in the Mofussil Courts it is important, because on the rulings of the High Courts of India including this High Court a person who sues for partition and is out of possession must ask, first of all, to be restored to possession of his share and pay additional ad valorem fee upon his plaint, whereas in the case where the plaintiff is in possession he simply sues for partition and separation of his share. In this case, accepting that rule that this suit, if the plaintiffs were out of possession, would require an additional Court-fee as being a suit to restore the plaintiffs to possession, I think the evidence on the issue of limitation shows clearly that the plaintiffs had never been ousted from their shares as the possession of the defendants was the possession of the plaintiffs. Therefore, agreeing with the learned Judge on this issue, I am of opinion that the plaintiffs were in possession of their shares and were entitled to maintain the suit on a plaint bearing a stamp of Rs. 10 only.

Then, the next point that was urged was as regards defect of parties and the defect of parties, I gather, was this: It is said that the Court having disbelieved the defendants' story as to the relinquishment by Safarjan, the wife and mother of the two plaintiffs respectively, ought to have disbelieved the story of relinquishment by Atarjan and Nabojan, the two daughters of Jamiruddi, and that, therefore, the Court ought to have held that there was a defect of parties as the said two daughters of Jamiruddi were not made parties. That seems to me to be a manifest fallacy. The case of these two other persons Atarjan and Nabojan was supported by a statement of theirs that they had ceased to have any interest in the property and if they had ceased to have any interest in the property, clearly they were not necessary parties to a partition suit.

The next point, which is the only point that has any substance in it, is that the learned Judge of the Court below has awarded to the plaintiffs a larger share in the plots other than plot No. 13, which the facts found by him warrant. It is said that the share awarded ought to have been 29/384 instead of 17/192. Although the method of the calculation is not accurate, it seems on the statements made in paragraph 13 of the written statement, that the plaintiffs have not been awarded a larger share because the defendants' case was that Atarjan and Nabojan relinquished within one month after the death of Maniruddi and they stated that at the date of that relinquishment, the claim of Atarjan and Nabojan had long been barred by limitation. If it was long barred by limitation so shortly after the death of Maniruddi then, of course, the relinquishment by Atarjan and Nabojan must have enured for the benefit of Maniruddi and Tilakjan, his wife, she taking her rights as the widow of her first husband Jamiruddi. On that footing, the plaintiffs have not been given a larger share and there is no reason to disturb the finding of the learned Subordinate Judge in that respect.

The other point raised was with regard to plot No. 13, which the learned Judge has found to have belonged solely to Maniruddi and of which the plaintiffs were, therefore, entitled to $\frac{1}{8}$th share. That this property was acquired by Maniruddi originally there seems to have been no controversy in the Court below. The kobala, which has not been printed but the date of which and the boundaries are given in the paper-book, seems to show that it is the same property as is mentioned in the sale-certificate (Exhibit A) and also in the khatian (Exhibit E). What the sale-certificate was, whether it was a decree obtained by a co-sharer-landlord or not, we do not know, and, although the property may be the same the boundaries given in it do not agree with the boundaries given in the kobala in favour of Maniruddi, but some of the boundaries in the khatian (Exhibit E) do seem to agree with the boundaries in the kobala in favour of Maniruddi. Exactly what happened as to this property we do not know; but there is nothing to show that the interest that Maniruddi undoubtedly got under this kobala has been put an end to and I do not think that this certificate of sale the proceedings of which we know nothing about or the statement in the remarks column of the khatian only is sufficient to displace the title that Maniruddi acquired under the kobala Exhibit A. I do not think there is anything in this case. It is quite clear on the findings of fact and the statements made in the judgment of the learned Subordinate Judge that the present plaintiffs have perfectly good title to the share in the properties allotted to them. It may be that they had been urged on to bring this suit or that they have been financed by Neazuddi, the brother of the plaintiff No. 1. But if the case is a genuine one, it does not matter much who found the money to finance the suit. There cannot be, in my opinion, any doubt that these two plaintiffs have got an interest in the property and that they have been rightly given their share. The points raised in the present appeal seem to me to have no force in them and I agree in the conclusion arrived at by the learned Judge of the Primary Court. The present appeal, therefore, fails and must be dismissed with costs. We assess the hearing fee at five gold mohurs.

Muhammadan Law—Minor—Alienation by de facto guardian, validity of—Punjab Redemption of Mortgages Act (II of 1913*), s.* 12*—Mortgages by father and mother of minor—Redemption of only one mortgage—Suit by mortgagee—Principles applicable—He who seeks equity must do equity.*

Where a de facto but not a de jure guardian of a Muhammadan minor alienates the minor's property the alienee cannot enforce the alienation against the minor; but the minor, if he comes into Court to challenge the alienation, must before re-entry restore to the alienee all the benefits that he personally has derived from the alienation—this on the equitable ground that he who seeks equity must do equity. [p. 219, col. 2.]

The proceedings under the Punjab Redemption of Mortgages Act are summary and in a disputed case neither party should be prejudiced by the Collector's action when the matter is later on submitted to the decision of the Civil Courts. [p. 220, col. 1.]

Defendant's father mortgaged some land with possession to the plaintiff for Rs. 193 odd. After the father's death the defendant's mother, as his de facto guardian, created an additional mortgage of Rs. 100 on the land Defendant made an application under the Punjab Redemption of Mortgages Act, and the Collector ordered redemption to take place on payment of Rs. 193 odd only. The plaintiff then instituted a suit under section 12 of the Act:

Held, that the defendant could not redeem the land without redeeming both the mortgages, inasmuch as had the Collector not intervened and the minor had applied to the Civil Courts for entry, he would have obtained a decree conditional on payment of both mortgages and his position could not be allowed to be improved by what turned out to be an erroneous executive order. Mr. Nanak Chand, for the Appellant.

Mr. Mukund Lal Puri, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The facts of this case, which appears to be one of just first impression, are that the father of defendant Sardara mortgaged land with possession to plaintiffs in Rs. 193-8-0. After the father's death, the minor's mother, as de facto guardian of her son, created an additional mortgage of Rs. 160 on the land.

As the result of an application by Sardara under Act II of 1913, which provides a summary procedure for the redemption of mortgages in the Punjab, the Collector ordered redemption to take place on payment of Rs. 193-8-0 only, and Sardara on depositing that sum was duly placed in possession.

This suit was then instituted by the mortgagee under section 12 of Act II of 1913. The law applicable to cases wherein a de facto but not a de jure guardian has dealt with a Muhammadan minor's property has now been settled by a large number of rulings of this Court which are resumed in Ram Jawaya v. Natha (1), and the principle followed is that the alienee of such property cannot enforce the alienation against the minor, but the minor, if he comes into Court to challange the alienation, must before re-entry restore to the alienee all the benefits that he personally has derived from the alienation—this on the equitable ground that he who seeks equity must do equity. The plaintiff in this case is not the minor, but the learned District Subordinate Judge holds that the minor must redeem both mortgages before he can obtain possession, because it is found that the mother's mortgage was for the benefit of the minor and that but for the Collector's action under Act II of 1913, the minor instead of being the defendant would be the plaintiff.

I think the learned Judge has taken the correct view. The proceedings under Act II of 1913 are summary and in a disputed case, neither party should be prejudiced by the Collector's act, when the matter is later on submitted to the decision of the Civil Courts.

The civil suit arises directly out of the Collector's action and is not strictly a suit to enforce the mortgage, but rather one to establish the rights of the mortgagee; it is a continuation of proceedings in which the mortgagor first appeared in the guise of a plaintiff.

Indeed from the language employed in the Act, it would seem that the suit should be of a declaratory character and in any case it is a suit for righting any order incorrectly issued by the Collector.

Now had the Collector not intervened, and the minor had applied to the Civil Courts for entry, he would have obtained a decree conditional on payment of both mortgages and his position cannot be allowed to be improved by what turns out to be an erroneous executive order. In short the position at the time of the issue of the Collector's order must be borne in mind and it should be considered what the order should have been.

My conclusion then is that the plaintiff is entitled to remain in possession till both mortgages have been redeemed and I dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

ISHAN CHANDRA SAMUI—PETITIONER—APPELLANT

versus

DULAL CHANDRA DE—OPPOSITE PARTY—RESPONDENT.

Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 182—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXI, rr. 11, 17 (2)—Execution application rejected for not specifying particulars, whether step-in-aid of execution—Res judicata in execution proceedings—Objection taken against one application, whether can be taken against subsequent application.

An application for execution rejected under Order XXI, rule 17 (2), of the Civil Procedure Code on the ground that it did not specify correctly all the particulars required to be specified therein by rule 11 of that Order, is not an application in accordance with law or a step-in-aid of execution taken in accordance with law within the meaning of Article 182, Schedule I of the Limitation Act. [p. 221, col. 2.]

Joyanuddin Khan v. Jamiruddin Sarkar, 37 Ind. Cas. 916; 21 C. W. N 835, followed.

A decree-holder applied for execution on the 25th March 1916. His previous application made on 12th May 1914 was withdrawn, the order then made by the Court being "the execution case is dismissed for non-prosecution and the objection case of the judgment-debtor is also dismissed for the present." In that objection case the judgment-debtor had pleaded that the application of the 12th May 1914 was out of time, having been made more than three years after the application for execution which preceded it:

Held, that regard being had to the way in which the execution case of 12th May 1914 terminated, it could not be said that the objection of the judgment-debtor on the ground of limitation was adjudicated upon, so that no question of res judicata, constructive or otherwise, could arise and it was open to the judgment-debtor to take the same objection in the present case. [p 221, col. 2.]

Appeal from the order of the Sub-Judge, Hooghly, dated the 4th December 1916, affirming that of the Officiating Munsif, Arambagh, dated the 23rd August 1916.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Babu Hari Narain Roy Chowhury, for the Appellants.—The Courts below were wrong in allowing the execution of the decree, as the present application for execution of the decree is clearly barred by limitation under Article 182 of the First Schedule of the Limitation Act. The proceedings under the first application ended on the 13th January 1911. Then on the 3rd January 1914 an application for execution of the decree was made, but that application was rejected as it did not specify the particulars required by Order XXI, rule 11 of the Civil Procedure Code. Then on the 12th of May 1914 another application was made which was withdrawn on the 22nd August 1914. Thereafter, the present application was made on the 25th March 1916. The application dated 3rd January 1914 was not an application in accordance with law or a step-in-aid of execution taken in accordance with law within the meaning of Article 182. Refers to Order XXI, rule 17, clause (2), and Joyanud- din Khan v. Jamiruddin Sarkar (1). Therefore the period of limitation is to run not from the application of 3rd January 1914 but from the application dated 13th January 1911; therefore the previous application of the 12th May 1914 was out of time, and, therefore, the present application is also out of time.

Babu Gagan Chandra Boral, for the Respondent.—The application dated 3rd March 1914 was one in accordance with law. Even conceding for the sake of argument that it was not in accordance with law, it was certainly a step-in-aid of execution within the meaning of Article 182, and, therefore, the question of limitation does not arise.

Refers to Mathura Prosad v. Anurago Koer (2), Musaraf Ali v. Amir Jan Bibee (3).

Babu Hari Narain Roy Chowdhury in reply.

JUDGMENT.

RICHARDSON, J.—The question in this appeal is whether an application for execution is barred by limitation under the provisions of Article 182 of the First Schedule of the Indian Limitation Act. The application was made on the 25th March 1916. The previous application made on the 12th May 1914 was withdrawn by the decree-holders on the 22nd August 1914, the order then made by the Court being, "the execution case is dismissed for non-prosecution and that the objection case of the judgment-debtor is also dismissed for the present." Now with reference to the application of the 25th March 1916 the judgment debtor pleaded that the previous application of the 12th May 1914 was out of time. It is conceded for the decree-holder that amongst the objections taken to that application there was an objection on the ground of limitation. Regard being had to the way in which the case terminated, it cannot be said that that objection was adjudicated upon. That being so, no question of res judicata, constructive or otherwise, arises and it is open to the judgment-debtor to take the point in the present case. If the point is open, there can be little doubt that the application of the 12th May 1914 was out of time. The application previous to that resulted in proceedings which terminated on the 13th January 1911 and from that date it is more than three years to the 12th May 1914.

For the decree-holder it has been strenuously urged by the learned Pleader who appears for him that the application of the 12th May 1914 was within three years of another application which I have not yet mentioned, which was made on the 3rd January 1914 within three years of termination of the previous case. In my opinion, however, the application made on the 3rd January 1914 is of no avail to the decree-holder, because it was not an application in accordance with law or a step-in aid of execution taken in accordance with law. The application was rejected on the ground that it did not specify correctly all the particulars which rule 11 of Order XXI requires that an applicant for execution should specify. It appears that the amount which had been recovered in the course of some previous proceedings was not correctly stated. No doubt, it was open to the Court dealing with that application either to reject it or to return it for amendment. Apparently the Court was not moved for leave to amend and the course which the Court actually took was to reject the application, which it could only do if the application was not in accordance with law. The terms of clause (2) of rule 17 of Order XXI show that when an application is rejected, it is not an application in accordance with law. The point has been decided in the case of Joyanuddin Khan v. Jamiruddin Sarkar (1). The result is that the objection taken to the present application on the ground of limitation succeeds. The previous application was out of time and this application is also out of time.

The appeal must, therefore, be allowed and the application for execution must be dismissed. In the circumstances we make no order as to costs.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA IN COUNCIL—DEFENDANT—APPELLANT

KAMAL KRISHNA PAL—PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Bengal Tenancy Act (VIII B. C. of 1885), s. 52—Landlord and tenant—Holder of temporary tenure whether can contract himself out of his right to apply for reduction of rent.

A holder of a temporary tenure under a kabuliyat, which provides that diluvion or no diluvion the tenant would remain liable for the full rent payable, is not entitled to claim reduction of rent on the ground of diluvion. [p. 223, cols. 1 & 2.]

Apart from any question of contract section 52 of the Bengal Tenancy Act is applicable both to tenure-holders and to raiyats. But a tenure-holder is at liberty to contract himself out of his right to apply for a reduction of rent under section 52. [p. 223, col. 1.]

In the case of a holder of a temporary tenure, section 52 of the Bengal Tenancy Act must be read subject to the terms of the contract between him and his landlord. [p. 223, col. 2.]

Appeal against the decree of the Subordinate Judge, Chittagong, dated the 23rd May 1914, confirming that of the Munsif, Chittagong, dated the 8th April 1913.

FACTS of the case appear from the judgment.

Babu Ram Charan Mittra (with him Babu Sris Chandra Chaudhuri), for the Appellant.—The appeal arises out of a suit for abatement of rent under section 52 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. The tenure was created by a kabuliyat in the year 1896, and the plaintiff is the purchaser of the tenure at a sale for arrears of revenue. The contract with the original tenant was that he would remain liable for the full rent payable even in case of diluvion of a portion of the tenure. In the face of this contract, the Courts below were wrong in allowing reduction of rent. Section 52 of the Bengal Tenancy Act applies to every tenant. But that section has no application when, as in the present case, there is a contract between the parties. There is nothing in the Bengal Tenancy Act which stands in the way of a tenure-holder's contracting himself out of the Act. The plaintiff, as purchaser of the tenure, is bound by the terms of the kabuliyat creating the tenure. Reading sections 52 and 178 together it is clear that in the case of a holder of a temporary tenure, section 52 must be read subject to the terms of the contract between the landlord and the tenant. Therefore the plaintiff, being bound by the terms of the kabuliyat of 1896 which provides that diluvion or no diluvion the liability of the tenant to the full rent payable should remain, is not entitled to any abatement of rent.

Babu Khitis Chandra Sen, for the Respondent.—The plaintiff is the purchaser of the tenure at a sale for arrears of revenue, and, therefore, he is entitled to the ordinary rights and is subject to the liabilities of a holder of a temporary tenure, and so he is not bound by the terms of the kabuliyat

Section 52 of the Bengal Tenancy Act applies to the case of every tenure-holder holding under a lease which is not a permanent lease within the meaning of section 179. Section 52, which commences with the words "every tenant", is applicable even in a case where the tenant has made a contract contrary to the provisions of the section, otherwise the Legislature would have introduced the words "in the absence of a contract to the contrary" into the provisions of the section.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal is preferred by the Secretary of State from the judgment and decree of the Subordinate Judge of Chittagong, dated the 23rd May 1914, confirming the decree of the Munsif of Chittagong, dated the 8th April 1913. The Secretary of State is the defendant in the suit. The plaintiff is the holder of a temporary tenure within a Noabad estate belonging to the Government. The plaintiff purchased the tenure at a sale for arrears of revenue. The tenure was created in the year 1896 and it was held under a kabuliyat of that year. One of the terms of the contract is that diluvion or no diluvion the liability of the tenant to the full rent payable should remain. The suit was brought by the plaintiff on the ground that more than one-half of the land of the tenure had been diluviated and that he was entitled to abatement under section 52, Bengal Tenancy Act. The Courts below have decided in his favour and made a decree allowing him a proportionate deduction of the rent. For the Secretary of State it is argued that the question whether the rent is liable to abatement on the ground of diluvion does not depend on section 52 alone but depends also on the terms of the contract between the parties. Section 52 begins no doubt with the words "every tenant" and, apart from any question of contract, is applicable both to tenure-holders and to raiyats. On the other hand, the general principle is that an individual may renounce an advantage conferred upon him by a legislative enactment, in the phrase sometimes used, he may contract himself out of the Act. Under the provisions of sub-section (3), clause (f) of section 178, a raiyat is expressly prohibited from contracting himself out of his right to apply for reduction of rent under section 52. There is no corresponding provision, however, in the case of a tenure holder. It would seem, therefore, that the tenure-holder is at liberty to contract himself out of his right to apply for a reduction of his rent on the ground of diluvion. For the plaintiff-respondent it is argued that inasmuch as section 52 expressly applies to every tenant, it must be taken that sections 52 and 179 of the Act cover the whole field, so that section 52 would apply to the case of every tenant under a lease which is not a permanent lease within the meaning of section 179. This argument appears to me unsound. No doubt there is section 179, which expressly provides that nothing in the Act shall be deemed to prevent a proprietor or a holder of a permanent tenure in a permanently settled area from granting a permanent mokarari lease on any terms agreed on between him and his tenant. But obviously that section has no application to the case of the holder of a temporary tenure or the lessee under a lease for a term of years, such as the lease in the present case. Such a lease is not within the section and in order to find out how the Act deals with such a lease we must look elsewhere than in section 179. In my opinion reading sections 52 and 178 together the plaintiff in this case must be taken to be bound by the terms of his contract. The opening words of clause (3) of section 178 are: "Nothing in any contract made between a landlord and a tenant after the passing of this Act shall." Then follow a number of clauses (a) to (h), in which different classes of tenants are referred to. Clause (a) refers to raiyats generally, clause (b) is limited to the case of occupancy raiyats and so on. Clause (g) refers to landlords and tenants and clause (h) is also applicable to landlords and tenants. It seems to follow that if the Legislature had intended to prevent the holder of a temporary tenure from parting with his right to apply for reduction of rent under section 52, express provision would have been made to that effect. That has not been done. In my opinion, in the case of the holder of a temporary tenure section 52 must be read subject to the terms of the contract between him and his landlord. His freedom of contract is bound by some but not by all the restrictions imposed by section 178, in cases within section 179 none of the restrictions are applicable.

The view of the learned Subordinate Judge that the plaintiff, as purchaser of this tenure at a sale for arrears of revenue, is not bound by the terms of the kabuliyat creating the tenure is not supported at the Bar and cannot be accepted.

The result is that, in my opinion, the conclusion arrived at by the Court below is erroneous and this appeal must be allowed and the suit dismissed with costs throughout.

BEACHCROFT, J.—I agree.

Application for revision of the decree of the Judge, Small Cause Court, Nagpur, dated the 10th August 1916.

Mr. S. C. Dutta Chowdhury, for the Applicants.

Mr. W. E. Puranik, for the Respondants.

JUDGMENT.—In this case the consideration for the promissory note was the plaintiff's promise to abstain from bidding at an excise auction. The lower Court has dismissed the plaintiff's suit on the ground that the consideration was against public policy within the meaning of section 23 of the Contract Act. He relies on a case reported as Sit Kauk v. Ah Kun (1). The learned Pleader for the respondents has procured this work for me and I have read the ruling. I cannot regard it as containing a sound statement of the law or to be of greater authority than the cases reported as Hari Balkrishna Joglekar v. Naro Moreshvar Joglekar (2), Doorga Singh v. Sheo Pershad Singh (3) and Gobind Chundra Gangopadhya v. Sherajunnissa Bibi (4) referred to by the learned Judicial Commissioner. The judgment appears to have been based chiefly on old editions of text books which are now obsolete. Besides the cases already referred to, the case for the applicants is supported by Gobind Chundra Gangopadhya v. Sherajunnissa Bibi (4), Gobindo Chandra Jha v. Shyam Lal Jha (5) and Ambika Prasad Singh v. Whitwell (6). The law on the subject has been exceedingly well summed up by Mookerjee, J., in Ambika Prasad Singh v. Whitwell (6). It would be impossible to state the law more fully. In this case the sole allegation is that the consideration was a promise not to bid. There is no allegation of anything more than this or that the price unduly fell down or anything else of the kind. The objection of the defendants fails and the plaintiffs are entitled to a decree for the balance due to them. I agree with the lower Court's view as to the re-payments and I also agree that there should be no interest. The result is that the plaintiffs should be given a decree for Rs. 56-3-0. The parties will bear their own costs throughout.

Order accordingly.

Custom—Alienation—Male proprietor, powers of—Exchange, whether transfer.

An exchange is a transfer of property and its validity must be determined in the same way as that of any other transfer. [p. 224, col. 2.]

A male proprietor cannot be reduced to the level of a widow, and the canon by which a transaction effected by him should be judged is whether it is a fair and bona fide one, such as may be regarded as an act of good management.

An exchange effected by a male proprietor would be binding upon his reversioners, if it is beneficial to the persons interested in the estate.

Second appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Hoshiarpur, dated the 2nd February 1917, affirming that of the Munsif, 1st Class, Hoshiarpur, dated the 20th May 1916, decreeing the claim.

Mr. Nand Lal, for the Appellant.

Mr Sundar Dass, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit brought by the reversioners of one Finu for possession of ancestral land transferred by him to the appellant Nazir in exchange for a plot of land belonging to the latter. Now, there can be no manner of doubt that an exchange is a transfer of property, and that its validity must be determined in the same way as that of any other transfer. The judgment of a Division Bench of this Court in Nihali v. Lehna (1) no doubt lays down that a widow is not authorised by custom to effect an exchange of land held by her on the usual life-tenure except for necessity. The judgment further contains certain observations to the effect that she cannot effect an exchange, even if the transaction is for the benefit of the estate. Now, these observations may be applicable to the case of a widow, but I do not think that it can be laid down that a male proprietor governed by the Customary Law can in no case make an exchange to improve the estate or to benefit the person interested therein. A male proprietor cannot be reduced to the level of a widow, and the canon by which a transaction effected by him should be judged is whether it is a fair and bona fide one, such as may be regarded as an act of good management.

The learned District Judge holds that the argument urged on behalf of the defendant "that the transaction was not made mala fide or to injure the reversioners and that the exchange was beneficial to Finu" is beside the point. I am unable to concur in this view. It seems to me that the transaction would be binding upon the reversioners, if it is beneficial to the person interested in the estate. As regards the beneficial nature or otherwise of the transaction, the learned Judge simply refers to the finding of the Court of first instance, and does not expressly record his own opinion on the subject. I consider that that is the crux of the matter, and a clear finding after a proper consideration of the evidence should be recorded thereon.

I accordingly accept the appeal, and setting aside the decree of the lower Appellate Court remit the case for re-decision with reference to the foregoing remarks. The Court-fee on the memorandum of appeal shall be refunded, and other costs shall abide the event.

Appeal accepted;

Specific performance of contract—Contract embodied in solenamah, whether can be enforced after solenamah set aside by Court.

Held, that there was no contract subsisting which the plaintiff could put before the Court for enforcement. [p. 226, col. 2.]

Held, further, that in such a case the plaintiff could not fall back upon some verbal agreement to grant the lease. [p 226, col. 2.]

Appeal against the decree of the District Judge, Chittagong, dated the 3rd August 1915, reversing that of the Munsif, 1st Court, at that place, dated the 14th September 1914.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Mr. B. C. Mitter (with him Babu Khitish Chandra Sen), for the Appellant.—There was an agreement between the plaintiff and the defendants Nos. 1 to 3 that the la ter would grant a lease to him, and that agreement was embodied in a solenamah filed in Court but subsequently set aside by the Court. The present suit is for enforcement of the contract to grant the lease.

[CHITTY, J.—When the solenamah has been set aside the contract embodied therein is no longer subsisting.]

That view has been taken by the Courts below. But I rely upon a verbal agreement between the plaintiff and the defendants as to the lease which was to be given, and the plaintiff wants specific performance of that agreement.

Babu Jogendra Nath Mukherjee (with him Babu Probodh Kumar Das), for the Respondents.—The judgment of the Courts below is concluded by findings of fact. The contract was embodied in a solenamah which was set aside by the Court and so there was no contract subsisting which the plaintiff could enforce. It has been found by the Courts below that there was no contract existing independently of the solenamah and so the plaintiff cannot fall back upon any verbal agreement to grant a lease. Admittedly the contract is bound up in the solenamah and that solenamah having gone the contract must go with it.

Mr. B. C. Mitter in reply.

JUDGMENT.

CHITTY, J.—In my opinion this appeal should fail on the short ground that the contract on which the plaintiff sued was embodied in the solenamah filed on 14th July 1910, and that that solenamah having been set aside by this Court there was no contract subsisting which the plaintiff could put before the Court. The learned Counsel for the plaintiff-appellant conceded that if the Court held that the solenamah was the contract between the parties he had no case. The plaintiff in seeking specific performance of an agreement to lease as against defendants Nos. 1 to 3 alleged in his plaint that there was an agreement with the plaintiff that defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3 would grant a patta to him in his own name at a jama of Rs. 13 per annum from the date of the execution of the said solenamah. That appears to me to be an obvious device to get out of the difficulty, which arose, of the solenamah being no longer enforceable. It is to be noted that the Munsif, who decided in favour of the plaintiff, stated in his judgment that the solenamah and the solenamah alone was the contract between the parties. He says: "During the pendency of the appeal, the present plaintiff and the defendants came to terms and it was arranged that the plaintiff would hold the land as a kaimidar rayait under the defendants on an annual rental of Rs. 13. The terms were embodied in a solenamah which was filed in Court and according to which the appeal was disposed of and the decree prepared." Later in his judgment he says: "There is no evidence worth the name that there was any other contract besides what was embodied in the solenamah." The learned District Judge appears to have taken the same view. He says: "This contract was embodied in a solenamah filed in Suit No. 467 of 1908 brought by defendants Nos. 1 to 3 for ejectment against Bankim and Pulin, sons and heirs of Sarbanund Barua, the former under-tenant in possession." Later he says: "Admittedly the contract is bound up in the solenamah. There is no contract existing independently of the solenamah. The solenamah has been set aside and the contract must, I think, go with it." That being the case, it seems to me to follow as a matter of course that the solenamah having been set aside by the Court the plaintiff could no longer enforce it as a subsisting contract. Nor do I think that he can fall back, as he now endeavours to fall back, upon some verbal agreement between him and the defendants Nos. 1 to 3 as to the lease which was to be given. In his plaint he says that the lease was to be in his own name, but the contract in writing which he took and accepted was for a lease in the name of his minor clients Bankim and Pulin, who, he now says were his benamidars. This, in my own opinion, is sufficient to dispose of the plaintiff's case. But the learned District Judge has given other reasons which would also prevent the Court from granting the plaintiff the relief which he claims, namely, specific performance of the contract. I do not think that it is necessary for me to go into those matters but I think that I ought to say that, in my opinion, the whole circumstances of the case are altogether discreditable to the plaintiff. He purported to buy the interest of his minor clients from their mother while the suit was going on. He allowed the suit to continue and prosecuted it nominally for them but really for himself. He then procured this solenamah also for his own interest. It will be a matter for further consideration whether his conduct as a Pleader should not be reported to the Full Court for such action as the Full Court may think fit to take against him. I need not go into that at the present time. I am of opinion that the plaintiff certainly cannot be allowed the equitable relief which he claims. It would indeed be unfortunate if the Court were bound in law to grant relief to a man who has behaved as the plaintiff has behaved. I would accordingly dismiss the appeal with costs.

SMITHER, J.—I agree that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Muhammadan Law—Sale—Pre-emption, right of, whether can be defeated—Construction of document.

Where a transaction in its nature is a sale, the vendor and vendee cannot defeat the right of pre-emption arising under the Muhammadan Law by dressing it up in the garb of a lease.

In determining the real nature of the transaction the Court is entitled to take into consideration the sum paid down, the amount of the rent reserved and the value of the property.

Second appeal against the decree of the District Judge, Ghazipore, dated the 4th May 1915.

Mr. Muhammad Ishaq Khan, for the Appellants.

Dr. S. M. Sulaiman (with him Mr. Iqbal Ahmad), for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit brought for pre-emption, under the Muhammadan Law. The property transferred is a small piece of land in the town of Zamania. The transfer was made in the form of a perpetual lease. The amount paid down was the sum of Rs. 250 and a nominal rent of 2 annas per annum was reserved. The Court of first instance decreed the suit, holding that there was a sale and that the plaintiff had a right. The lower Appellate Court held that pre-emption under the Muhammadan Law did not apply to the case of leases, accordingly without deciding the other issues the lower Appellate Court reversed the decree of the Court of first instance and dismissed the suit. We think, reading the judgment of the lower Appellate Court, that the learned District Judge never intended to overrule the finding of the Court of first instance that the transaction though carried out in the form of a lease was in reality a sale. We think that he intended to decide that a Muhammadan could make the transfer in the form of a lease, notwithstanding that the real intention of the parties was a sale and so to defeat pre-emption, in other words, that such devices are not unknown in the Muhammadan Law and are legitimate. In our opinon the Court was entitled and bound on the issue being raised to consider at the instance of the plaintiff claiming pre-emption what was the real nature of the transaction. It was entitled to consider the sum which was paid down, the smallness of the rent and the value of the property, and if after considering all these matters it came to the conclusion that the transaction was in truth and fact a sale, it should hold that the right of pre-emption arose and proceed to consider whether the plaintiff by due observance of the requirements of the Muhammadan Law was entitled to get the property. If the Court came to the conclusion that in truth and substance—and not merely in form—the transaction was a lease, then the suit should be dismissed on the ground that the Muhammadan Law does not apply to transfers by way of leases. It has been more than once decided in this Court that where a custom of pre-emption prevails upon sale, the vendor and vendee cannot defeat the pre-emptor by dressing up the transaction in the garb of a lease. The same thing has been held in the Punjab, where apparently the right of pre-emption is regulated by Act. We can see no good reason why the same principle should not apply to cases where the right is one under the Muhammadan Law. It is clear that the case must go back to the lower Appellate Court. We accordingly allow the appeal, set aside the decree of the lower Appellate Court and remand the case to that Court with directions to re-admit the appeal upon its original number in the file and proceed to hear and determine the same according to law, regard being had to what we have stated. Costs here and heretofore will be costs in the cause.

A document relinquishing rights in immoveable property of the value of Rs. 100 or upwards and indicating a clear intention that the title should pass at once, is a conveyance and not merely an agreement to convey and is compulsorily registrable [p. 229, col. 1.]

Lala Moti Sagar, R. S., for Bakhshi Tek Chand, for the Appellant.

Dr. Gokal Chand Narang, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The question for determination in this second appeal is, whether the deed dated the 16th March 1910, executed by Daya Ram in favour of the plaintiff, Gopi Ram, is a conveyance or merely an agreement to convey. There can be no doubt that it relates to immoveable property of more than Rs. 100 in value; and would require a compulsory registration, if it effected a transfer of the property.

It must be remembered that Daya Ram and his two brothers were the reversioners to the estate of their collateral Teju (the owner of the property in dispute) who had no male issue, and that they had already succeeded in obtaining a decree declaring the adoption by him of his daughter's son as void. This decree was obtained in 1907, and it appears that during the pendency of the suit Teju died in May 1906. The impediment created by the adoption having thus been removed, the reversioners had only to institute a suit for possession of the property; and it appears that, so far as they were concerned, there was no reasonable doubt as to the success of their suit. It was at this stage that Daya Ram executed the instrument in question; the consideration being the payment by Gopi Ram of one-third of the costs already incurred in the declaratory suit relating to adoption, and one-third of the costs to be incurred in the contemplated suit for possession.

Now, it is a cardinal principle of interpretation that in determining the nature of a transaction the document evidencing it should be considered as a whole, and the intention of the parties should be gathered not from isolated sentences but from the whole of the instrument. This canon we have observed in ascertaining the meaning of the parties, and upon a careful examination of all the terms of the deed in the light of the comments made by the learned Counsel, we have reached the conclusion that Daya Ram intended to transfer at once his entire interest in the estate to Gopi Ram. It is true that the document is not happily worded, but the language used by the executant, when taken with the circumstances set out above, leads to the inference that he intended that his nephew Gopi Ram should step into his shoes.

At the very outset the document states in very clear terms that Daya Ram relinquishes his rights in favour of Gopi Ram; and this appears to be the operative part, so far as the question of the title is concerned. The rest of the deed deals with the delivery of possession when obtained, and specifies the rights and obligations of the parties in the event of the non-fulfilment of his part of the bargain by either of them. It is to be observed that in case Gopi Ram did not obtain possession of the property, he was to get, not damages for the breach of the contract, but one-third of the price of the entire land. This clearly shows that Gopi Ram was treated to be the owner of the property from the date of the execution of the document. In the event of his failure to pay his share of the costs of the suit, his title was liable to be defeated and he was to be deprived of the possession of the property. It is only the penultimate sentence which creates some slight doubt in the matter. It states that if Gopi Ram fulfils the aforesaid conditions, then jab qabza Mussammi Gopi Ram ko milega us waqt khud qabzi kar ke waris mutazakkara bala ke hoga. Now, this sentence is not only couched in cryptic language, but is wholly redundant; and we do not think that a sentence of this kind can be availed for the purpose of overriding the earlier clauses of the instrument, which indicate a clear intention that the title should pass at once.

The learned Counsel on both sides have cited a large number of authorities in support of their respective contentions, but we consider it unnecessary to refer to them here, because, as the learned gentlemen themselves have pointed out, the decision in each case must depend upon its own peculiar circumstances. There is no dispute as to the principle of the law to be followed in a matter of this kind; and the question which arises in each case is, as stated above, whether the instrument amounts to a conveyance of the property or confers only a right to demand a conveyance. Upon a careful perusal of the document before us we are not prepared to dissent from the findings of the lower Courts that it is a conveyance of immoveable property of the value of more than Rs. 100 and that it is consequently compulsorily registrable.

As regards the contention that the plaintiff should be afforded an opportunity to prove his claim for the recovery of the money spent by him in litigation, we observe that the plaint contains no prayer for a money decree nor even a prayer for a general relief such as is usually found in almost every plaint. It further appears that no request for amendment was made to the Court of first instance, and it seems to us that the proposed amendment, if allowed, would alter the nature of the suit. In these circumstances we do not think that there is any adequate ground for allowing the amendment of the plaint especially at this late stage, and the plaintiff must stand or fail by the relief claimed in the plaint.

For the aforesaid reasons we confirm the decree of the lower Appellate Court and dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

AMIR SHARIF AND OTHERS—DECREE-HOLDERS AND AMIR ALI MIYA—JUDGMENT-DEBTOR—RESPONDENTS.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXXVIII, rr. 9, 11—Attachment before judgment, whether ceases on dismissal of suit—Appeal, whether revives order of attachment.

An attachment before judgment comes to an end when the suit is dismissed. [p. 231, col. 1.]

In order to avoid all possible doubt and difficulty, the Court should when dismissing a suit make an order under Order XXXVIII, rule 9, Civil Procedure Code, withdrawing the attachment before judgment. But even if an order directing withdrawal of attachment is not made, on the dismissal of the suit, the attachment before judgment ceases to exist, and it does not revive when an appeal is lodged. [p. 232, col. 1.]

In a suit brought by the plaintiff the property of the defendant was attached before judgment. The Trial Court dismissed the suit without making any order as to the withdrawal of the attachment. On appeal, the suit was decreed. In the interval, the property attached was transferred by a private sale. The decree-holder then applied for the execution of his decree by the sale of the property without applying for its re-attachment:

Held, that as the property had ceased to be under attachment after the dismissal of the suit by the Trial Court, the Court had no jurisdiction to direct it to be sold without being first attached. [p. 231, col. 2.]

Appeal against the order of the District Judge, Chittagong, dated the 1st September 1916, reversing that of the Munsif, Cox's Bazar, dated the 7th March 1916.

FACTS of the case appear from the judgment.

Babu Chandra Sekhar Sen, for the Respondents.—Under section 102 of the Civil Procedure Code no second appeal lies in this case, because the value of the original suit is less than Rs. 500.

Babu D. L. Kastagir, for the Appellants.—The case comes under section 47 of the Code, and, therefore, a second appeal lies. Even if no second appeal lies there is this Rule, and your Lordships can interfere under section 115, Civil Procedure Code.

The property of the defendant was attached before judgment, and when the plaintiff's suit was dismissed by the Trial Court, the attachment was not formally withdrawn by the Court although it should have done so under Order XXXVIII, rule 9 of the Code. The question then is, whether the dismissal of the suit made the order for attachment before judgment functus officio. The cases decided under section 488 of the Civil Procedure Code of 1882, corresponding to Order XXXVIII, rule 9, of the Code of 1908 show clearly that on the dismissal of the suit the attachment comes to an end, and this is so, even though the Court omits to make any formal order withdrawing the attachment. Refers to Order XXXVIII, rules 9 and 11, and Shaikh Moheeoodeen v. Shaikh Ahmed Hossein (1), Ram Chand v. Pitam Mal (2) and Sasirama Kumari v. Meherban Khan (3). Having regard to the above authorities it is clear that the learned Judge's construction of Order XXXVIII, rule 9, is obviously wrong. So the property which had been attached before judgment and which was sold away after the dismissal of the suit cannot be sold in execution of the decree obtained by the opposite party in appeal.

Babu Chandra Sekhar Sen.—If the case is treated as being one under section 115, Civil Procedure Code, then no question of jurisdiction is involved in this case. The Court of Appeal below had jurisdiction to decide the question of law involved in the case, and when it has decided that question whether that decision is right or wrong, it cannot be interfered with in revision.

On the merits, my submission is that the attachment continued even after the dismissal of the suit because the Court, when it dismissed the suit, did not withdraw the attachment. The cases cited in support of the appellant's case were decided under the old Code of 1882 and do not apply to a case decided under the Code of 1908, because the introduction of the word "subsequently" in rule 11 of Order XXXVIII has made a change in the law. Rule 9 of Order XXXVIII provides that the Court shall make an order withdrawing the attachment so that if the Court does not withdraw the attachment, it must be taken to be subsisting even after the dismissal of the suit and until the disposal of the appeal.

Babu D. L. Kastagir in reply.

JUDGMENT.

RICHARDSON, J.—A preliminary point is taken in this appeal that no appeal lies under section 102, Code of Civil Procedure. We are of opinion that this objection is good and that the appeal must be dismissed.

The appellant, however, succeeded in obtaining a Rule from this Court which raises the same question as is raised in the appeal. The question turns on the provision contained in rule 9 of Order XXXVIII, Code of Civil Procedure. The rule runs as follows: "Where an order is made for attachment before judgment, the Court shall order the attachment to be withdrawn when the defendant furnishes the security required together with security for the costs of the attachment or when the suit is dismissed." It appears that on the 19th September 1911, certain property belonging to the defendant in the suit out of which these proceedings arise was attached before judgment. The suit was dismissed by the Trial Court on the 20th November 1911. On appeal the suit was decreed on the 28th January 1913. In the interval the property attached before judgment had been purchased at a private sale by the appellant, or rather the petitioner. In 1915 the decree-holder applied for execution of his decree by the sale of the property, on the footing that the attachment before judgment subsisted and that it was unnecessary for him to apply for re-attachment of the property. It is obvious that he was bound to frame his application for execution in that way because if the attachment before judgment did not subsist, the property having been purchased by the petitioner could not be attached or sold in execution. The point made on behalf of the decree-holder is that when the first Court dismissed the suit it omitted to carry out the direction in rule 9 of Order XXXVIII of the Code that the Court should at the same time order the attachment to be withdrawn. If that order had been made, there can be no doubt that the attachment would not have subsisted and would not have been revived by the fact that on appeal the decree of dismissal was set aside and the suit was decided in the plaintiff's favour. As authority for that, if authority is needed, we may refer to the case of Sesirama Kumari v. Meherban Khan (3) decided by Mookerjee and Coxe, JJ. The argument is that the Court having omitted to make an order withdrawing the attachment, the attachment continued. This point was decided by the learned Munsif against the decree-holder and by the learned District Judge in his favour. With great respect to the latter I agree with the learned Munsif. The observations made by Mr. Justice Mahmud in the case of Ram Chand v. Pitam Mal (2) are as applicable to the present Code as to the previous Code and in my opinion they correctly state the law. In principle, as pointed out by Mr. Justice Mookerjee in the first case cited, the attachment before judgment should come to an end when the suit is dismissed. And I agree with Mr. Justice Mahmud when he says, speaking of the Code of 1882, that the part of the Rule requiring the Court to remove the attachment was never intended to be more than directory. There is no doubt that in order to avoid all possible doubt and difficulty the Court should, when dismissing a suit, at the same time make the order directing the attachment to be withdrawn. But even if the order is not made, in my opinion, on the dismissal of the suit the attachment before judgment falls to the ground.

Some attempt was made to argue that rule 11 of Order XXXVIII has made some change in the law by reason of the word "subsequently" which appears in that rule. The rule is as follows.—"Where property is under attachment by virtue of the provisions of this Order and a decree is subsequently passed in favour of the plaintiff, it shall not be necessary upon an application for execution of such decree to apply for a re-attachment of the property". But that rule cannot be read in the way in which the learned Pleader for the respondent seeks to read it. It applies only where the property is under attachment and a decree is passed subsequently. It is begging the question to say that the property remains under attachment after the suit has been dismissed or that it revives when an appeal is lodged. If the property is not under attachment at the date of the appeal, this rule can have no application even though a decree be subsequently made in favour of the plaintiff

It is obvious that if the suit is dismissed and no appeal is preferred, the attachment, whether an order withdrawing it is made or not, must cease, and I cannot see that the filing of an appeal makes any difference.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment of the District Judge is, in my opinion, erroneous and must be set aside. The Rule is accordingly made absolute.

It has been suggested that no question of jurisdiction arises which justifies us in interfering with the District Judge's order under section 115, Code of Civil Procedure. But clearly if the property is not under attachment, the District Judge had no jurisdiction to direct it to be sold without being first attached. The question raised is, therefore, one which falls within the scope of section 115.

The result is that the Rule must be made absolute and the order of the Court below set aside. The petitioner is entitled to his costs which are assessed at one gold mohur.

BEACHCROFT, J.—I agree.

Rule made absolute.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff is the Receiver of the Estate of Ashan Ali who died in December 1908. Ashan Ali was the promoter and Chairman of the Bengal Steam Navigation Company. The defendants were three of the Directors of the Company. On the 1st of July 1908 Ashan Ali and the three defendants executed Exhibit N, a pro-note for Rs. 75,000 in favour of a Chetty. The Chetty obtained a decree for the balance due on that pro-note, which was Rs. 50,000 (Rs. 40,000 principal and Rs. 10,000 interest), against Ashan Ali and the three defendants. He realised from the estate of Ashan Ali Rs. 32,080-10 3 and the plaintiff now sues the three defendants for $\frac{3}{4}$ths of that sum by way of contribution. His case is that the pro-note was executed on behalf of the Company which has no assets. The defendants' case is that they executed Exhibit N as sureties for Ashan Ali. The plaintiff obtained a decree on the Original Side of this Court, and the defendants now appeal.

Ashan Ali was a banker and financed the Company under an agreement with the Company, which was very beneficial to himself. On the 3rd of April 1906 he borrowed from the Chetty under a pro-note Exhibit I Rs. 10,000 and on the 12th April 1906 he borrowed from the Chetty upon a pro-note Exhibit 2 Rs. 70,000; and that Rs. 80,000 was used for the purposes of the Company. On the 1st of January 1907 Ashan Ali by his pro-note Exhibit 3 in favour of the Chetty renewed the two pro-notes Exhibits 1 and 2. In the Company's books there are entries of the 7th of January 1907 which would show that the Company received on that date Rs. 80,000 from the Chetty and that the Company had paid Rs. 80,000 to Ashan Ali. On the 4th of March 1907 a Director wrote to Ashan Ali on behalf of the Company asking him to pay this Rs. 80,000 debt owing by the Company to the Chetty as he had sufficient funds of the Company in his hands to do so, and on the 18th May 1907 the request was repeated. On the 21st of April 1908 the Company paid off Rs. 5,000 of this debt to the Chetty. On the 1st of July 1908 Exhibit N was executed because the Chetty required payment from Ashan Ali; and in the Company's books entries in an account with the Chetty on that date would show that the amount borrowed on the pro-note in the 1st of January 1907 was paid in full, and that Rs. 75,000 was borrowed by the Company on a pro-note from the Chetty. After the death of Ashan Ali between the 23rd of March 1909 and the 7th of July 1909 the Company paid to the Chetty Rs. 35,000 on account of principal owing under Exhibit N.

It is clear that before Exhibit N, Ashan Ali was alone personally liable to the Chetty for the money borrowed by him. The Chetty was never a creditor of the Company and he never agreed to accept the Company as his debtor. The entries in the Company's books are to that extent misleading. The defendants, no doubt, knew of the entries in the Company's books of the 7th January 1907, but there is nothing to show that they did not realize the actual position, viz., that the Company was not in fact liable to the Chetty but that the Company had agreed with Ashan Ali to pay, on his behalf to the Chetty direct, the amount owing on his pro-note.

It would be doubtful, after the Company's letters of 4th March and 18th May 1907, whether Ashan Ali, if he had paid the Chetty, could have claimed to be repaid by the Company. But assuming that he could have done so, the fact that the Company had promised Ashan Ali to pay this debt of his to the Chetty, and the fact that the defendants with Ashan Ali jointly executed Exhibit N in favour of the Chetty, would not show, in the absence of an express agreement to that effect, that the defendants undertook to share with Ashan Ali his ultimate loss in the event of his paying his debt to the Chetty and not being able to recover it from the Company. When the defendants executed Exhibit N they promised the Chetty to pay Ashan Ali's debt. The Company's debt to Ashan Ali was a separate and distinct matter; and there is nothing to show that the defendants, by agreement with Ashan Ali, signed Exhibit N as if it were the renewal of a debt due by the Company to the Chetty when Exhibit N was executed, Ashan Ali was a wealthy man, whereas the Company was in a moribund condition. The defendants, although they were some of the Directors of the Company, had a personal liability for the debt for the renewal of which the pro-note was executed. There was little risk in standing surety for Ashan Ali, but an almost certain loss if they undertook personal liability on behalf of the Company. The renewal of the old debt was at the instance of the Chetty to whom Ashan Ali was alone liable. Prima facie the defendants would merely be sureties to the Chetty for Ashan Ali's debt; and the entries in the Company's books are not sufficient to show that the defendants executed this pro note on behalf of the Company. The entries in the Company's books of the 1st of July 1903 do not carry the case any further for the plaintiff. It is clear that the Company's method of book-keeping was that when a pro-note was renewed it was entered as if the old debt was paid off and a fresh sum borrowed. The effect of those entries would merely be this: that the Company, having undertaken to pay the debt on behalf of Ashan Ali to the Chetty direct under the old pro note, undertook to do the same under the renewed pro-note. And the payment of Rs. 35,000 by the Company to the Chetty in 1909 would be in pursuance of that agreement. We allow the appeal and dismiss the plaintiff's claim with cost in both Courts.

Appeal allowed.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XII, r. 6—Portion of claim admitted, effect of Judgment on admission—Appeal - Discretion exercised by Court, when open to correction in appeal—Interpretation of Statutes—Indian Act based on English Act, construction of—English decisions, whether binding.

A Court has jurisdiction under Order XII, rule 6, Civil Procedure Code, to enter judgment for the plaintiff in respect of a portion of the claim admitted by the defendant, with liberty to the plaintiff to proceed with the suit in the ordinary way as to remainder of the claim. [p. 234, col 2; p. 235, col. 1.]

Per Mookerjee, J.—A judgment on admission by the defendant under Order XII, rule 6, Civil Procedure Code, is not a matter of right, it is in the discretion of the Court, so that if a case involves questions which cannot be conveniently disposed of on a motion under the rule, the Court may, in the exercise of its discretion, refuse the motion. The discretion is judicial and an erroneous exercise thereof may be open to correction by a Court of Appeal which, however, on well-established principles, will be slow to interfere, unless either of the parties has been manifestly and unfairly prejudiced [p. 236, cols. 1 & 2.]

Order XII, rule 6, Civil Procedure Code, cannot be restricted in its operation to cases where the plaintiff accepts the admission of the defendant in its entirety or where the claim is severable into distinct portions and the defendant admits his liability in respect of one such fragment of the claim. [p. 237, col. 1.]

In considering the construction of a section in an Indian Act which is professedly based on and in fact reproduces the language of an English enactment the Courts in India are, in practice if not in theory, bound by the decisions of the English Court of Appeal [p. 236, col. 2.]

Appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Fletcher, dated the 22nd May 1916.

Mr. S. R. Das (with him Mr. P. N. Chatterjee), for the Appellant.

Mr. N. Sircar (with him Mr. S. Ghose), for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

SANDERSON, C. J.—This is an appeal by the defendant against the judgment of Fletcher, J., whereby he directed that judgment should be entered for the plaintiffs for Rs. 4,500 with interest and costs, and that the plaintiffs were to be at liberty to prove their claim in respect of the balance of the claim in suit in the ordinary way.

This judgment was given upon a motion made by the plaintiff firm under Order XII, rule 6.

The suit was for Rs. 6,813-1-0, and, if necessary, for an account of the dealings and transactions between the parties and for an order on the defendant firm to pay to the plaintiff firm what on the taking of such accounts might be found due by the defendant firm to the plaintiff firm.

It was alleged in the statement of claim that the plaintiff firm had been acting as commission agents in Calcutta for the defendants on terms set out therein. That on the last adjustment of accounts, viz., on 25th March 1915, a sum of Rs. 9,329-5-6 was found to be due from the defendants to the plaintiffs. That the business continued until 15th October 1915, at which time the accounts showed a balance of Rs. 6,038-5-6 due to the plaintiffs and that with the interest thereon up to 4th April 1916 amounting to Rs. 774-11-6, the total due at the time of institution of the suit was Rs. 6,813-1-0.

The material points of the defence are paragraphs 3, 4 and 5. In paragraph 3 the defendant alleged that he denied that "there was any adjustment on the 9th day of Chayet 1972, corresponding with 25th day of March 1915, or that Rs. 9,329-5-6 was found due by the defendant firm to the plaintiff firm, the fact being that the last adjustment took place sometime in March or April 1914 in respect of dealings between the parties for the Sumbat year 1970 and since then there was no other adjustment. Shortly prior to the said adjustment the plaintiffs had sent certain goods of the value of Rs. 4,500 or thereabouts to the defendants which had not been ordered by the defendants." Then he proceeded to say that "shortly thereafter the plaintiff firm sent their accounts of the dealings for the Sumbat year 1970 and Badri Dass Jalooka, gomastha of the plaintiff firm, came to adjust the accounts for the Sumbat year 1970. The defendant Assaram Agarwalla told the said Badri Dass Jalooka to take back the unordered goods. Whereupon Budri Dass Jalooka asked Assaram to sell those goods, and in the next accounts between the parties the plaintiff firm would not charge any interest on the price of the unordered goods and would also pay to the defendant firm all losses to be incurred by them in the sale of those goods."

In paragraph 4 the defendant said, "with reference to the Exhibit A annexed to the plaint the defendant firm states that the item of Rs. 9,329-5-6 on the debit side of the said exhibit is not correct, the fact being that a much smaller sum was due to the plaintiff firm at the end of the Sumbat year 1971, inasmuch as the same will be reduced by the interest charged by the plaintiff firm on the said sum of Rs. 4,500 and by the losses incurred by the defendant firm on the sale of the unordered goods aforementioned."

Then in paragraph 5 he said: "With reference to the 7th and 8th paragraphs the defendant firm state that on an account being taken of the dealings between the parties during the years 1970, 1971 and 1972 it will be found that the sum of Rs. 4,500 or thereabouts is due to the plaintiff firm from the defendant firm besides interest on the sum."

On these pleadings the application was made by the plaintiffs for leave to enter judgment for Rs. 4,500 with interest on the ground of the admissions contained in the statement of defence.

It was not denied by the defendants at the hearing of the application that the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment for Rs. 4,500 and interest, but the defendants alleged that if such judgment were obtained, the plaintiffs should not be allowed to proceed with the suit as to the remainder of their claim.

Fletcher, J., decided that the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment for Rs. 4,500 and interest and further that they should be at liberty to prove their claim to the balance, and consequently this appeal was lodged by the defendants.

The learned Judge in his judgment said "In this case there is no doubt that the defendant admits that Rs. 4,500 is due to the plaintiff. I asked the learned Counsel appearing for the defendant whether he still admitted that Rs. 4,500 was due to the plaintiff, and he said he did so. The admissions need not necessarily be made in the pleadings, they can be made otherwise, and under Order XII, rule 6, a verbal admission is sufficient to enter up judgment provided the Court is satisfied that the admission was in fact made. That being so, there cannot be any doubt that in this case there was a clear admission that Rs. 4,500 was due."

Now Order XII, rule 6, provides as follows: "Any party may at any stage of a suit, where admissions of fact have been made, either on the pleadings, or otherwise, apply to the Court for such judgment or order as upon such admissions he may be entitled to without waiting for the determination of any other question between the parties; and the Court may upon such application make such order or give such judgment, as the Court may think just."

I assume from the above mentioned extract from the judgment that the learned Judge satisfied himself that there was a clear and unambiguous admission by the defendants that in any event Rs. 4,500 was due from them to the plaintiffs. Assuming that to be so, I am of opinion that the learned Judge had jurisdiction to enter judgment for that amount, and it was in his discretion, having regard to the nature of the case and the allegations contained in the pleadings and the admission made in Court, whether he would allow the plaintiffs to proceed to prove the remainder of their claim.

I do not think that the case of United Telephone Co. v. Danohoe (1) covers the point raised in this case. The above-mentioned case was an action for infringement of a patent and the defendant admitted ten instances of infringement, but denied he had committed any others: the plaintiffs thereupon moved for judgment upon the admissions in the pleadings: in the Court of first instance the Vice-Chancellor granted an injunction against infringement by the defendant of the plaintiffs' patent, but he refused an enquiry as to damages. The Court of Appeal held that the plaintiffs were entitled to an enquiry as to damages, but that it must be limited to the instances of infringement admitted; and that the judgment having been obtained upon a motion for judgment upon the pleadings, the plaintiffs were bound to take the negative as well as the affirmative allegations therein.

The question whether the Judge, who in the first instance heard the application, would have had jurisdiction to give judgment on the admissions and to allow the plaintiffs to proceed to prove the rest of their claim as to the other alleged infringements, if such an application had been made, was not before the Court.

The case of Andrews v. Patent Assurance Co. of Ireland (2) does not decide that the Judge hearing the application had no jurisdiction to make the order asked for in that case; it amounts to a decision merely that having regard to the circumstances of that case and the form of the pleadings, the Judge was entitled to exercise his discretion and to decide that the plaintiff ought not to have judgment for the £62 and yet proceed to trial of the remainder of the case.

This being a matter of discretion, we ought not to interfere unless it is clear that the discretion was wrongly exercised.

In this case I cannot say that it is clear that the discretion of the learned Judge has been wrongly exercised.

The main question which remains to be tried is, whether the arrangement alleged by the defendants in their defence to have been made with respect to the unordered goods was in fact made, and, if so, how much must be deducted in respect thereof from the plaintiffs' total claim.

This seems to be an issue independent of the other part of the claim, and even if it were decided in favour of the defendants it would not, having regard to the above-mentioned admission made by the defendants in Court, reduce the plaintiffs' claim below Rs. 4,500.

With regard to the question of costs, I think that the plaintiffs should not at present be given the costs of the suit, but that these costs should be reserved until the trial, when they will be in the discretion of the Judge who tries the matters which remain for decision.

The plaintiffs are entitled to the costs of the application for judgment. For these reasons in my judgment the appeal should be dismissed on the main point raised therein, but that the decree as to costs should be varied in the manner above mentioned.

There will be liberty to apply with respect to the question of costs to the learned Judge on the original side in the event of the parties not proceeding to the trial of the remainder of the plaintiffs' claim.

I think that the parties should bear their own costs of this appeal.

MOOKERJEE, J.—This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment on an application by the plaintiff under Order XII, rule 6, of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908. The plaintiff firm instituted this suit for the recovery of a sum of money from the defendant firm in respect of a commission agency. The plaintiff firm alleges that accounts had been adjusted between them on the 25th March 1915, when a sum of Rs. 9,329 5 6 was found due from the defendant firm, that thereafter business was continued on the same terms and conditions as before down to the 15th October 1915, and that on the 4th April 1916, when the suit was instituted, an aggregate sum of Rs. 6,813-1-0 inclusive o interest was recoverable from the defendant. The written statement of the defendant firm denied the alleged adjustment of accounts, mentioned a transaction on terms other than those previously arranged and contained an admission that if an account were taken of the dealings between the parties and credit allowed from all payments made, the sum of Rs. 4,500 or thereabouts would be found due to the plaintiff firm besides interest on such sum. Thereupon on the 19th May 1916, the plaintiff firm applied to the Court under Order XII, rule 6, for judgment for Rs. 4,500 with interest thereon according to the admission of the defendant firm. Mr. Justice Fletcher heard the application on the 22nd May. In answer to a question put by the Court to Counsel for the defendant whether he still admitted that Rs. 4,500 was due to the plaintiff, an answer was given in the affirmative. The Court thereupon proceeded to give judgment for the plaintiff for Rs. 4,500 with liberty to the plaintiff to prove in the ordinary way the claim for the difference. The plaintiff was also awarded the costs of the application and the costs of the suit. The defendant has appealed to this Court on the ground that the Court could not or at any rate should not have given judgment to the plaintiff under Order XII, rule 6. It is consequently necessary to examine the terms of the rule and determine its exact scope.

Order XII, rule 6, which reproduces Order XXXII, rule 6, of the English rules is as follows:—

"Any party may at any stage of a suit, where admissions of fact have been made either on the pleadings or otherwise, apply to the Court for such judgment or order as upon such admissions he may be entitled to without writing for determination of any other question between the parties: and the Court may, upon such application, make such order or give such judgment as the Court may think just."

The rule, it will be observed, is expressed in comprehensive terms, and the only requisite for a judgment under the rule in favour of the plaintiff is that admission of facts should have been made by the defendant, either on the pleadings or otherwise. It would be obviously improper for the Court to read into the rule qualifications which may restrict its application. But a judgment on admission is not a matter of right, it is in the discretion of the Court, so that if a case involves questions which cannot be conveniently disposed of on a motion under the rule, the Court may in the exercise of its discretion refuse the motion. The discretion is judicial and an erroneous exercise thereof may be open to correction by a Court of Appeal which, however, on well-established principles will be slow to interfere, unless either of the parties has been manifestly and unfairly prejudiced. See the observation of Jessel, M R, in Mellor v. Sidebottom (3). Subject to these observations I cannot hold that any crystallised rules can be formulated to regulate the exercise of the discretion vested in the trial Court. It has been urged, however, that such rules are deducible from cases in the reports and reference has specially been made to the decision in United Telephone Co. v. Danohoe (1), which arose under Rules of Supreme Court Order XXXII, rule 6, and Andrews v. Patent Assurance Co. of Ireland (2), which turned upon the construction of Rrules of Supreme Court (Irish) Order XXXII, rule 6. It may be observed that the Irish rule is identical in terms with the English rule. These cases, though not binding upon us as authorities, are valuable guides in the interpretation of the rule in our Code, for as observed by White, C. J., in Messrs. Lovelock and Lewes v. Malabar Timber and Saw Mills, Ltd. (4), in considering the construction of a section in an Indian Act which is professedly based on an English enactment, which in fact reproduces the language of the English enactment, we are in practice, if not in theory, bound by the decision of the English Court of Appeal. The cases mentioned, however, do not assist the appellants. In the first case the defendant in an action for infringement of a patent admitted certain instances of infringement but denied that he had committed any others. The plaintiffs thereupon moved for judgment upon the admission in the pleadings. Bacon, V. C., granted a perpetual injunction but refused an enquiry as to the damages. The plaintiffs appealed and contended that a direction might be added for an enquiry as to the damages sustained by them by reason of the infringement mentioned in the pleadings. The Court of Appeal ruled that they were entitled to an enquiry as to the instances of infringement admitted in the pleadings, but as to no others. This decision is not an authority for the proposition that the plaintiff might not have joined issue and set down the action for trial as regards the infringements not admitted by the defendant. The decision in Andrews v. Patent Assurance Co. of Ireland (2) seems at first sight more favourable to the contention, of the appellant, but upon closer examination turns out to be an authority only for the proposition that the Court has a discretion to exercise in relation to applications for judgment on admissions and may impose terms if relief be given. The case is not an authority for an inflexible rule that the plaintiff who applies for judgment upon an admission must always take the admission as a whole or must ignore the admission and proceed to trial. In my opinion, it would be lamentable if the discretion, which for the best of reasons has been left free and untrammelled by the Legislature, were to be crystallised by judicial decisions, as it would become in course of time by one Judge attempting to prescribe definite rules with a view to bind other Judges in the exercise of the discretion, which must be applied with due regard to the varying circumstances of each particular case. I must consequently decline to interpret Order XII, rule 6, so as to restrict its operation to cases where the plaintiff accepts the admission of the defendant in its entirety or where the claim is severable into distinct portions and the defendant admits his liability in respect of one such fragment of the claim. I do not also feel pressed by the argument that if a decree is made first on admission in respect of one portion of the claim and then on investigation as to the remainder, there may ultimately be two decrees in the same suit. I see nothing objectionable in principle to such a result, specially in view of the provisions of Order XXIV which treats of payments into Court. In my opinion, the case before us falls within the scope of Order XII, rule 6, and sufficient grounds have not been assigned to induce us to hold that the order made by Mr. Justice Fletcher was unjust to the defendant. The direction for costs was, however, inappropriate and I agree that subject to modification in that respect as indicated in the judgment of the learned Chief Justice, the order should be affirmed.

Order affirmed.

Application for revision of the decree of the Judge, Small Cause Court, Wardha, dated the 23rd July 1914.

Mr. M. R. Bobde, for the Applicant.

JUDGMENT.—This application arises out of a suit brought on the Small Causes side of the Sub-Judge's Court at Wardha to recover damages for the illegal impounding of the non applicant's cattle. The learned Judge threw on the defendant the burden of justifying the admitted seizure and confinement of the cattle and disbelieving the evidence adduced to prove that the animals when seized were eating hay belonging to the defendant's employer decreed the claim

This Court is asked to interfere on three grounds, which may be briefly stated thus:—

(1) The burden lay on the plaintiff to prove the illegality he alleged.

(2) The suit is barred by reason of Chapter V, Cattle Trespass Act, 1871.

(3) The defendant's witnesses should have been believed.

The first contention is rested on section 101 of the Indian Evidence Act, which runs as follows:—

"Whoever desires any Court to give judgment as to any legal right or liability dependent on its existence of facts which he asserts, must prove that those facts exist."

Now it is true that the plaintiff has included in his plaint a statement that the seizure of his cattle was illegal. His story is that when taken they were lying under a tree in the village jungle. Prima facie to deprive a man of his property by disturbing his possession is to do him a legal wrong and so to give him a cause of action in tort. To use the words of the Privy Council in Rogers v. Rajendro Dutt (1), such an act "prejudicially affected the plaintiff in some legal right." The defendant sought to justify the seizure in the manner already stated, and had no evidence been given on either side, the defendant, who in substance stated the affirmative, would have failed, section 102 of the Indian Evidence Act being applicable. I hold, therefore, that the onus was correctly laid by the lower Court.

Upon the second point the authorities are opposed to the applicant's contention. I refer to Nomaz Mollah v. Lall Mohun Tagadgeer (2) and Shuttrughon Das Coomar v. Hokna Showtal (3). In the former the provision of law considered was section 14 of the Act III of 1857 (an Act relating to trespasses by cattle), but the terms of that section correspond closely with those of Chapter V in the Cattle Trespass Act, 1871. Aslem v. Kalla Burzi (4), the only case which favours the applicant, was not apparently argued before the High Court, a consideration which weighed with the Judges who decided the later Calcutta case above cited. The applicant relies on Jagannath v. Khuba (5), where, however, the Statute to be considered creates a liability not existing at common law and gives also a particular remedy for enforcing it. The present case belongs to an entirely different class, which consists of cases where a special remedy is provided for a right or liability already existing. In the latter class, unless the Statute contains words which expressly or by necessary implication exclude the common law remedy, the party suing has his election to pursue either that or the statutory remedy. This general rule finds expression in section 91, Civil Procedure Code, which lays down that Courts shall have jurisdiction to try all suits of a Civil nature excepting suits of which the cognizance is either expressly or impliedly barred. It was applied in Krishna v. Reade (6), where it was held that the summary remedy provided by Act IX of 1861 does not bar a suit by a Hindu father to recover possession of his minor son alleged to be illegally detained by the defendant, a view which was also taken by Broughton, J., in the earlier case of In the matter of the petition of Kashi Chunder Sen (7). I would also refer to the comparatively recent decision of a Full Bench of the Madras High Court in Zamindar of Eettayapuram v. Sankarappa Reddiar (8), which affirms the correctness of the following general principle laid down in an earlier Full Bench decision:—

"When a Statute is confirmatory of a pre-existing right, the new remedy is presumed as cumulative or alternative unless an intention to the contrary appears from some other part of the Statute."

With regard to the difficulty noticed in Aslem v. Kalla Burzi (4), namely, that Chapter VII of the Cattle Trespass Act, 1871, reserves the right of filing a Civil suit only in the case specified, I think the Legislature clearly intended to make the special remedy afforded by the Act in that case cumulative, while leaving the remedy under Chapter V as merely an alternative one.

There remains the merits of the applicant's defence. As to these I have to observe that the person who took the animals to the pound, viz., the defendant, himself did not enter the witness-box, while his witnesses admittedly did nothing to prevent the trespass by the plaintiff's cattle though working close by. The application fails on all points and is dismissed without notice to the opposite party.

Buddhist Law, Burmese—Succession—Exclusion from inheritance, requisites for.

Mere non-attendance on a deceased during his or her illness is not sufficient to exclude those who would ordinarily inherit from him or her. The law requires that on the part of the person sought to be excluded, there must be conduct such as constitutes an intention on his part to destroy the natural tie between him and the deceased. [p. 240, col. 1.]

Mr. Ba Dun, for the Appellant.

Mr. Po Han, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The respondents are brother and sister and the appellant is their brother. They had another sister, Ma Thi, who is dead. The respondents were older and the appellant younger than Ma Thi. On her death, the respondents sued the appellant for their respective shares in the property left by her. The appellant set up his daughter, Ma Saw Mya, as an adopted daughter of the deceased and Ma Saw Mya was added as a party defendant. The parties then went to trial on the following issues:—(1) Whether Ma Saw Mya was an adopted daugther of Ma Thi or not; (2) To what share is each of the parties entitled? The contest was concentrated on the first issue, but in the evidence it appears that the appellant and Ma Thi, were not on speaking terms for some considerable time owing to a law-case they had between them. It also appears that Ma Thi, who had been ailing for four or five years past, apparently not seriously, for witnesses say that she was ill off and on, took ill seriously one day and died the same day.

The trial Court held that Ma Saw Mya was not adopted and that as the appellant had neglected to assist Ma Thi during her illness, he was not entitled to inherit. But it proceeded to say that appellant's daughter and a daughter of one of the respondents so assisted and the funeral obsequies were performed out of Ma Thi's money and it thought, apparently because of these latter facts, that the appellant and the respondents should share the estate of Ma Thi equally.

The lower Appellate Court held that the appellant's claim was extinguished through failure to attend on the deceased during her last illness but allowed the decree of the trial Court to stand, as the respondents had not appealed. It also held that Ma Saw Mya was not adopted by Ma Thi.

Ma Saw Mya has not appealed. The appellant now urges that he being the younger brother of Ma Thi and the respondents being her elder brother and sister, he excludes them and that the lower Courts were wrong in not giving him the whole of the property.

It has been urged before me by the learned Counsel for the respondents that the appellant was not on speaking terms with the deceased for some considerable time before her death owing to a law-suit between them, that he did not attend on the deceased during her illness and that he did not contribute towards the expenses of the funeral and that these facts clearly show that the fraternal relationship between them had been intentionally and deliberately severed by the appellant.

We are not in a position to know who was in fault with regard to the litigation, to whom was solely due the fact that the sister and brother were not on speaking terms. If the sister was in fault and to her was solely due the estrangement between them, the appellant cannot be blamed. It must be remembered that Ma Thi had not the right to exclude her brother by any conduct on her part towards him. It must be shown that the appellant was guilty of conduct which in law is sufficient to exclude him. In other words, he must be proved to have forfeited his ordinary right by his own misconduct. If Ma Thi was to blame for the estrangement we cannot expect the appellant to be at her bedside during her illness, especially as she took ill suddenly and died. It is not denied that he went to the house after her death. As regards the funeral expenses, it seems no one contributed towards them and they were paid, as has been rightly held by the trial Court, out of Ma Thi's property. I am unable to hold that mere non-attendance on a deceased during his or her illness excludes those who would ordinarily inherit from him or her. The law requires that on the part of the person sought to be excluded there was conduct such as constitutes an intention on his part to destroy the natural tie between him and the deceased. See the cases of Maung Chit Kywe v. Maung Pyo (1) and Maung Sein v. Maung Kywe (2).

For the reasons given above I am unable to hold that the appellant could be excluded at all. The result is that he is entitled to the whole of the estate. As the younger brother of the deceased he excludes the respondents, her elder brother and sister.

The appeal is allowed with costs.

Appeal allowed.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXXVIII, rr. 1 to 6—Attachment before judgment— Procedure—General allegation against defendant, whether sufficient.

When a party seeks to obtain an order of attachment before judgment, he must by definite evidence satisfy the Court that there is reasonable cause for believing that the judgment-debtor is about to dispose of the whole or part of his property with a view to defeating his creditors. It is not sufficient to make only general allegations. [p. 24, col. 2.]

Appeal from a decision of the Subordinate Judge, Bhagulpore.

Mr. Hasan Imam (with him Mr. Naresh Chandra Sinha), for the Appellant.

Mr. Pugh (with him Mr. Bankim Chandra Mitter), for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

CHAPMAN, J.—In this case the suit was instituted on the 11th of April 1917; and on the 14th of April the Court heard an application for an attachment of the defendant's property before judgment. Notice was issued, or purported to issue, on the defendant and on the 21st of April 1917, the date fixed for the disposal of the application, an order was made in the absence of the defendant for the attachment of the defendant's property before judgment. On the 30th of April, the defendant filed an objection to the attachment before judgment, in which he denied the allegations made by the plaintiffs and objected to the attachment upon the ground that he had no notice of it. After some adjournments the matter was disposed of on the 14th of August; and the attachment before judgment was vacated by the Court on two grounds: the first ground being that the defendant had no notice of the proceeding for attachment; and the second ground being that at the time that the order for attachment was made there was no evidence before the Court, either by affidavit or otherwise, that the defendant was about to dispose of or remove any part of the property within the meaning of Order XXXVIII, rule 5. An appeal has been filed before this Court against the order setting aside the attachment before judgment and directing that the attached properties be at once released. It is urged on behalf of the respondents that no appeal lies.

It is conceded that an appeal could only lie under Order XLVII, rule 7, sub-rule 1, clause (a)—that is to say, an appeal would lie to this Court on the ground that the application for review could not be entertained by the Subordinate Judge inasmuch as he was not the Subordinate Judge who made the order for attachment, unless the application for review was based on the ground of discovery of new and important evidence or on the ground of clerical or arithmetical mistake. It is conceded, however, by the appellant that the order of the Subordinate Judge must be upheld inasmuch as, upon his finding that the previous order for attachment was without notice to the defendant, and upon his finding that the notice had been suppressed, it was the obvious duty of the learned Subordinate Judge to vacate the order made by his predecessor. It is immaterial, therefore, whether an appeal lies in this case or not. In any case the order of the learned Subordinate Judge must stand, inasmuch as it was the proper order to make having regard to his finding that the notice had not been served upon the defendant and that the process of the Court had been suppressed.

The only question for our consideration is whether there should be a direction by this Court that the Subordinate Judge should entertain the application for attachment before judgment. He has not in fact entertained it. He has merely held that his predecessor was wrong on the materials then before him in issuing an order of attachment before judgment. It appears, however, that since the passing of that order of attachment, there has been some evidence on the record, however scanty it might be, to support the application for attachment before judgment; and I think that the proper procedure for the learned Subordinate Judge was, after vacating the order of his predecessor, to proceed to dispose of the application for attachment before judgment on the evidence before him. Therefore, I think it desirable to direct that the application for attachment before judgment should be disposed of in the proper way. I do not wish to suggest that there are upon the record materials which any Court should hold as sufficient to support the application for attachment before judgment; but I am of opinion that the application should be disposed of in the proper way. The appeal before us has failed on the grounds taken in the memorandum of appeal and is dismissed with costs.

ATKINSON, J.—I concur. I only wish to add one word with regard to what I believe to be important, having regard the construction to be put upon Order XXXVIII, rules 1 to 6. In my opinion when a party seeks to obtain an order of attachment before judgment, he must, by definite evidence, satisfy the Court that there is reasonable cause for believing that the judgment-debtor is about to dispose of the whole or part of his property with a view to defeating his creditors. It is not sufficient, as in this case, to make general allegations. The petitioners in this case have done no more than state generally that they have "ascertained that in order to avoid and delay realization of money that would be decreed in favour of the plaintiffs the defendants are about to dispose of the property mentioned in the schedule annexed." A general statement of this sort without any evidence to support it is, in my opinion, wholly insufficient to prove any intention on the part of the defendant to dispose of any part of his property with a view to defeat his creditors; or to warrant the Court in making an order of attachment before judgment.

I, however, agree with my learned brother that the application for attachment before judgment should be disposed of in the regular way upon the evidence now on the record. This will not, of course, debar the plaintiffs from adducing such additional evidence relative to the state of things existing at the date of the application for attachment as the learned Subordinate Judge may think admissible.

Appeal dismissed.

In a suit for damages for wrongful seizure of cattle the burden lies on the defendant to prove that the seizure was legal.

Revision petition against the judgment and decree of the Judge, Small Causes Court, Drug, in Suit No. 546 of 1914, dated the 30th January 1915.

Mr. M. R. Bobde, for the Applicant.

Mr. G. P. Dick, for the Non-Applicant.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff sues for damages for wrongful impounding of his cattle by the defendant. The latter admits the seizure, but pleads that he was justified in law as he found the cattle grazing in his jungle. The lower Court has found that there is no satisfactory evidence to show that the cattle were grazing in the defendant's jungle. It also found that the plaintiff has failed to prove that the seizure took place when the cattle were grazing in the plaintiff's jungle and, therefore, dismissed the suit. The defendant's costs were disallowed as he failed to prove his allegation. The sole question is whether the burden of proof lies on the plaintiff to prove that the seizure was illegal or whether it is for the defendant to justify his seizure. The applicant for revision relies on an unreported ruling of this Court: Bala v. Vithu, Civil Revision No. 285 of 1914 (1), which supports the view that it was for the defendant to justify the seizure. I entirely agree with the view taken by Sir Henry Drake-Brockman in the latter case. I may point out that this is not a case of tort based on absence of legal process where an improper order has been procured from a competent authority. In such a case the burden lies heavily on the plaintiff to establish his case. This is an instance of self-help in abatement of nuisance which the law allows. But the party taking the law into his own hands must justify his act, just as under the Penal Code the burden of proof lies on the party relying on the right of private defence. To hold otherwise would be contrary to principle. On the finding of the lower Court, the plaintiff is entitled to a decree for Rs. 19-12-0. The decree of the lower Court is set aside and a decree for Rs. 19-12-0 with costs in both Courts will be passed. I allow Rs. 16 as Pleader's fee.

Per Curiam (Seshagiri Aiyar, J., dubitante). A tenant is entitled, under Madras Act I of 1900, to compensation for reclaimed lands only at the rates specified in the contract between the parties. He cannot, ignoring the valuation under the contract, resort to section 9 for appraising compensation for tanks and channels dug by him in land, which, at the time of the demise, was a forest. [p. 243, cols. 1 & 2.]

In all matters which are provided for by the contract, the parties are governed by it. [p. 243, col. 1.]

Per Seshagiri Aiyar, J.—Section 9 deals with cases where, at the time of demise, the land was of some value and an additional value was imparted to it by the labour of the tenant. The section is intended to apply to cases where the Court has to fix the entire valuation under the Act, ignoring the contract, if any, between the parties. There cannot be first a valuation under the contract and a further valuation invoking the aid of section 9. [p. 243, col. 2.]

A tenant is not entitled to claim as improvements the value of trees of spontaneous growth standing on land reserved for the use of the landlord. [p. 244, col. 1.]

Per Napier, J.—After the tenant has been given compensation at the rate fixed in the contract, he cannot for the purpose of valuing the improvements made by the construction of tanks and channels import the increase in the value of the annual net produce as a factor in ascertaining the value. The compensation for the value of tanks and channels must be ascertained under section 11. [p. 244, cols. 1 & 2.]

JUDGMENT.

SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—The case has occupied more time than the importance of the points to be decided in the appeal demands. The reason is that we have to construe an Act which does not err on the side of being very clear or explicit. After listening to the arguments of Mr. Kutti Krishna Menon and after giving my best consideration to sections 9 to 12 of Madras Act I of 1900, I am not sure that my decision is quite correct. It may be attributable to obtuseness, but one cannot help feeling that the Act is calculated to confuse even clearer minds than mine.

I shall proceed to deal with the points which have been argued. First of all, I shall take Mr. Anantha Krishna Aiyar's memorandum of objections. After the decision in Kunhalloor Puthia Veettil Rayarappa v. Parkum Punnisseri Kelappa (1), in all matters which are provided for by the contract, the parties are governed by it: consequently, in respect of Vettukanom for the reclaimed lands, the tenant is not entitled to anything more than what has been given in Exhibit A. By reclamation the forest has been converted into nilams or paddy fields. Till that stage is reached, the tenant is not entitled as compensation to more than Rs. 7 per plot of one para (seed) area. Mr. Kutti Krishna Menon contended that as there is nothing in the contract regarding tanks and channels, Exhibit A is not conclusive as regards his client's right to them. Mr. Anantha Krishna Aiyar did not seriously dispute this position under section 4 of the Malabar Compensation for Tenants' Improvements Act. Tanks and channels are improvements, and when it is found that the tenant has expended labour in digging those tanks and making those channels, he is entitled to be paid compensation for that labour. The further point raised by Mr. Kutti Krishna Menon, so far as I am able to understand him, is, this: Under the contract the tenant is entitled to Rs. 7 for reclamation. Under the Act, he is entitled to the value of the labour spent by him in digging the tanks and constructing the channels. He is entitled further under section 9 of the Act to have the tanks and channels valued by the process mentioned in section 9. I am unable to agree with the learned Vakil, though I have come to the conclusion against him with some hesitation. On the face of it, section 9 seems to deal with cases where, at the time of demise, the land was of some value and an additional value was imparted to it by the labour of the tenant.

That is the plain reading of the section. When the land was let under the demise Exhibit A and under the previous demises, it was of no value to the landlord as paddy fields. Therefore, prima facie, section 9 has no application. Moreover, section 9, as I understand it, is intended to apply to cases where the Court has to fix the entire valuation under the Act ignoring the contract, if any, between the parties. You cannot have first a valuation under the contract and a further valuation invoking the aid of section 9. That, to my mind, is a good answer to Mr. Kutti Krishna Menon's contention. As I have said, this conclusion is by no means free from doubt. However, that is my present impression.

The next question is whether the tenant is entitled to the valuation of the timber utilised by him for building farm houses and granaries. Here again, the contract makes it clear that if any timber is to be used by the tenant from the forest of the landlord, he is not entitled to the value of that timber. From a common sense point of view, it seems to me impossible to uphold the view that you can take the landlord's property and compel him to pay for what you have taken from him. Therefore, in fixing valuation for the farm houses, the value of the timber should be excluded. That disposes of Mr. Anantha Krishna Aiyar's memorandum of objections.

On the appeal itself, Mr. Kutti Krishna Menon contended that his client is entitled to the value of the improvements in respect of the trees of spontaneous growth standing on the demised land. He has drawn our attention to the case of Narayani

(1) 39 Ind. Cas. 741; 40 M. 594; 32 M. L. J. 110; (1917) M. W. N. 195; 21 M. L. T. 245; 5 L. W. 617.

Amma v. Kunchukutti Amma (2), in which it was held that the Act has nothing to do with the ownership of trees but that it has regard only to the value of improvements to be paid at the time of eviction. But that question of law does not arise in the present case, for this simple reason. Under the contract, a certain portion of the demised land is reserved for the landlord's use and he is entitled to have the trees thereon cut by himself and removed: only when the forest thus reserved is denuded of trees the tenant is given liberty to enter upon it and to make it cultivable land. He has no other right in respect of this reserved plot of land. So far as we are able to see, these trees of spontaneous growth in respect of which improvements were claimed are to be found in the reserved plot. Mr. Kutti Krishna Menon wanted to argue that some of the trees were outside of that area, but this question was not raised in the lower Courts and we cannot allow it to be argued now. As, under the contract, the plot is reserved solely for the use of the landlord, the tenant is not entitled, on eviction, to the value of the trees of spontaneous growth standing thereon. For these reasons I would dismiss the second appeal with costs and allow the memorandum of objections. The learned Vakils state that on the principles stated by us, they will be in a position to fix the valuation in this Court. Therefore, it is not necessary to send the case down.

The decree of the lower Appellate Court will be modified and the amount agreed to by the learned Vakils in pursuance of the principles enunciated in our judgment will be entered in the place of the amount decreed by the Courts below. Parties to pay and receive proportionate costs throughout.

NAPIER, J.—I wish to add a few words on the points argued on section 9. It is urged by Mr. Anantha Krishna Aiyar that, after the tenant has been given under the terms of the contract compensation for reclamation at 7 rupees per plot, he cannot for the purpose of valuing the improvement made by construction of tanks and channels import the increase in the value of the annual net produce as a factor in ascertaining the value. In my opinion this contention must prevail. The section gives the tenant compensation based on the increased outturn if that works out at higher value than the costs of the improvements. It is admitted that the improvements paid for under the contract cannot be used for the purpose of comparison under section 9, clause 2, and the tenant wishes, of course, to exclude it, but as I am satisfied that part of this net increase has already been compensated for under the contract, he cannot use this increase at all and section 9 does not apply. The compensation for construction of tanks and channels must be ascertained under section 11. In other respects I agree with the judgment of my learned brother.

Decree modified.

NIRMAL DAS—PLAINTIFF AND Musammat KABULAN AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS NOS. 1 TO 3—RESPONDENTS.

Specific Relief Act (I of 1877), s. 22—Specific performance of contract, suit for—Delay, effect of—Abandonment, failure to enforce registration, whether amounts to.

Mere delay in the institution of a suit for specific performance of a contract to sell land is not sufficient to defend the claim. The delay must be of such a character as to give rise to an inference of the abandonment of the right or should disclose some prejudice to the defendant. [p. 246, col. 1.]

The failure of the plaintiff to obtain compulsory registration of the deed in his favour is not of itself sufficient to prove abandonment. [p. 246, col. 2.]

Appeal from a decsion of the District Judge, Patna.

Mr. Bankim Chandra Mitra, for the Appellant.

Mr. Sambhu Saran, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff instituted this suit for the specific performance of a contract entered into by him and defendants Nos. 1 and 2 on the 25th of June 1912. Evidently the agreement to sell 4½ annas share of Salempur Chatura Lakhraj took place 2 or 3 days before this date.

On the 27th of June defendants Nos. 1 and 2 executed a deed of sale in favour of the plaintiff, but this deed was not registered. On the 17th of October 1912 the sum of Rs. 71 out of the consideration money settled at Rs. 75 between the parties was paid by the plaintiff to the defendants Nos. 1 and 2. On the 24th of February 1914 defendants Nos. 1 and 2 executed a deed of sale in favour of defendant No. 4 and sold the property in suit with some other properties. Three months after it transpired that defendant No. 3 also was supposed to have some interest in the property and a supplementary deed of sale was executed by defendants Nos. 1 to 3 in favour of defendant No. 4 in respect of the same properties.

The suit of the plaintiff was instituted on 1st October 1915. The Munsif of Barh who tried the suit dismissed it, but on appeal the learned Judge of Patna has reversed the decision of the Munsif and has decreed the suit in favour of the plaintiff.

The learned Vakil appearing before me on behalf of defendant No. 4 urges the following points on which, he submits, I should hold the judgment of the learned District Judge to be incomplete and insufficient.

Firstly, it is contended that issue No. 2 framed by the Munsif dealing with the question of limitation in this case has not been considered by the learned Judge. The learned Munsif found on this point against the plaintiff, on the ground that the agreement to sell having been made two or three days before the 15th of June 1912, and the plaint having been filed on the 1st October 1915, the suit would be barred under Article 113 of the Limitation Act inasmuch as the suit was instituted three years after the agreement to sell took place. The learned Munsif disbelieved the plaintiff's case with reference to the allegation that there was a subsequent agreement to execute the deed or to register it in October 1912, and hence he found that the suit was instituted after 3 years of the agreement. If it be held that more than 3 years had passed since the date fixed for the performance of the contract and no suit had been instituted, Article 113 would no doubt govern the case. But the finding of fact arrived at by the learned District Judge with reference to the subsequent agreement to execute the deed and to register it would clearly take this case out of the mischief of Article 113 of the Limitation Act. The learned Judge in his judgment holds that the payment of Rs. 71 and the execution of the receipt Exhibit 2 have been proved. The learned Judge also accepts the evidence of the plaintiff on the point of the passing of a portion of the consideration money, namely, Rs. 71 to the defendants Nos. 1 and 2. Exhibit 2, which is the receipt for this money, has been duly proved and accepted as genuine by the learned Judge. This receipt and the findings of the learned Judge on this point put the matter beyond a shadow of doubt as regards the payment made on the 17th October 1912. On this finding it would be impossible to hold that limitation applies to the case of the plaintiff. On the 17th October 1912 there was the acceptance of a part of the consideration money by the defendants Nos. 1 and 2. This by itself is sufficient to show that the time for the performance of the contract was some day subsequent to the 17th October 1912, when that payment was made. If so, the suit would be within time. As a mattter of fact the refusal to register the deed according to the plaint did not take place till the 27th October 1912. If that be so, then if Article 113 of the Limitation Act is to apply to this case it would apply from the date of this refusal, namely, the 27th October 1912, and not before. In this connection paragraph 12 of the plaint is significant inasmuch as one of the various dates when the cause of action in this case is stated to have actually arisen is the 27th October 1912.

The learned Vakil appearing on behalf of defendant No. 4 contends that the learned Judge has not taken up the question of limitation as an issue in the case and dealt with it properly. It is true that the judgment of the learned Judge has not dealt with this question of limitation exhaustively, but I find that the principal elements constituting the issue of limitation in this case have, as a matter of fact, received the learned Judge's consideration and the findings to which I have made reference are sufficient in themselves to show that Article 113 of the Limitation Act has no application to the present case.

The next point to which my attention has been drawn by the learned Vakil appearing on behalf of the defendant-appellant is the question of laches on the part of the plaintiff in instituting this suit. It is pointed out that although the refusal to register the deed took place on the 27th October 1912, the plaintiff showed no sign of instituting his suit till almost the close of the year 1915 and that this delay on his part might be considered as an indication that he had abandoned all idea of pressing his claim for specific performance of the contract entered into between himself and the defendants Nos. 1 and 2. Delay cannot in this case be disputed, but the question is whether this delay by itself is sufficient to justify me to hold that the plaintiff has been guilty of laches. As I have held before, the suit is not barred by limitation. Therefore, the delay is not such as is not permitted by the law. On the authority of Kissen Gopal Sadaney v. Kally Prosonno Sett (1), mere delay is not sufficient. The delay must be of a character as to give rise to an inference of the abandonment of the right or should disclose any prejudice to the defendant. The learned Munsif who framed the issue on this question found it against the defendant. The learned Judge who heard the appeal has not dealt with this question. It has been contended that the learned Judge should have done so and that the case for that reason should be referred to the learned Judge for disposal after he has considered it. I am not disposed to agree to this prayer, inasmuch as nothing has been shown how the delay in instituting the suit has either prejudiced the defendants or amounts to an abandonment of the right of the plaintiff to ask for specific performance of the contract. The defendant No. 4 is a near relative of defendants Nos. 1 to 3. The finding of the learned Judge is that the defendant has failed to prove that she was a bona fide purchaser for value without notice to the plaintiff's equitable title.

Considering the circumstances of the case. I have no doubt that defendant No. 4 was well aware of the major portion of the consideration money having been paid by the plaintiff to defendants Nos. 1 to 2. There is, therefore, no reason to think that there was any valid reason for defendant No. 4 to believe that the plaintiff had abandoned his claim.

My attention has been drawn to the fact that there was no attempt on the part of the plaintiff to apply for compulsory registration of the deed of sale Exhibit 1 and that this ought to be sufficient in itself to leave the defendant No. 4 under the impression that the plaintiff had no intention of proceeding with the agreement that was entered into in June 1912. I am not satisfied that, the plaintiff not having asked for compulsory registration, this in itself is sufficient to justify any inference against him with reference to his abandonment of the claim by conduct. Morever, I find nothing in the written statement of defendant No. 4 to show that there was, apart from the delay, anything in the conduct of the plaintiff to suggest abandonment. The only paragraph of the written statement to which my attention has been drawn is paragraph 11. I am unable to find how the allegations in paragraph 11 can justify my holding that there have been such laches on the part of the plaintiff as to induce the exercise of the discretion vested in this Court under section 22 of the Specific Relief Act in favour of the plaintiff. In the circumstances I am also unable to accept the contention that in this case on the question of laches there is any necessity for the case to be referred back to the learned Judge who heard the appeal.

The learned Vakil appearing on behalf of the defendant-appellant has pressed upon me the consideration that I should rule out the relief for the specific performance of the contract and grant to the plaintiff relief No. 4, which is in the alternative. The alternative relief sought by the plaintiff is evidently subject to the condition that should the Court find any difficulty in passing a decree for the specific performance of the contract, then the alternative relief might be granted. The learned District Judge found no difficulty in giving a decree for specific performance of the contract and I confess I see no difficulty in my way. No sufficient reason has been placed before me as to why in the absence of any particular difficulty the relief sought in the first instance should not be granted and that the relief in the alternative should be considered as the right and proper one in this case.

The appeal is dismissed with costs.

MA ZI ZAN—RESPONDENT.

Evidence Act (I of 1872), ss. 74, 83—Survey maps, evidentiary value of.

Survey maps are official documents prepared by competent persons and with such publicity and notice to persons interested as to be admissible and valuable evidence of the state of things at the time they were prepared. They are not conclusive and may be shown to be wrong: but in the absence of evidence to the contrary they may be judicially received in evidence as correct when made.

Jagadindra Nath Roy v. Secretary of State, 30 C. 291; 30 I. A. 44; 7 C. W. N. 193; 5 Bom. L. R. 1 (P. C.), followed.

Mr. Broadbent, for the Appellant.

Mr. Maung Po Han, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The appeal in this case has been argued with the appeals in cases Nos. 57 and 58. Aung Min sold the appellant some land on which the respondents in these appeals have houses, and the appellant sued for ejectment. The question for decision in each case is whether the land used for house sites was so used by permission of Aung Min who claims it as owner. The only evidence that Aung Min owned the land and gave permission to the respondents to occupy it is his own statement, coupled with the survey map, which shows the land as Aung Min's property. With reference to survey maps, their Lordships of the Privy Council said in Jagadindra Nath Roy v. Secretary of State for India (1) that they were "official documents prepared by competent persons, and with such publicity and notice to persons interested as to be admissible and valuable evidence of the state of things at the time they were prepared. They are not conclusive and may be shown to be wrong; but in the absence of evidence to the contrary, they may be judicially received in evidence as correct when made." In the present case a reference to the map shows that the houses have been built at the apex of a holding shown as Aung Min's, where a P. W. D. road begins to cross the railway line.

There is evidence to show that the respondents have encroached on that road. The total area in dispute only amounts to a fraction of an acre in extent, and it would be very easy for a mistake to occur in a map dealing with a holding which terminates in the manner Aung Min's does. On the other hand, there is the evidence of aged and respectable elders which goes to show that the disputed sites have been occupied by various persons for years and were originally waste land. There is not the slightest evidence that Aung Min was paid any rent for the sites. In the circumstances I have no doubt that the judgment appealed against was correct. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Clerical errors or slips in a decree or order can be corrected by the Court which passed it, although an appeal against the same is pending in a superior Court. The proper Court to correct them is the Court in which the errors were made. [p. 249, col. 1.]

Petition, under section 115 of Act V of 1908, praying the High Court to revise the order of the District Court, Madura, dated the 14th April 1916, in Amendment Petition No. 274 of 1916 to amend the revised decree of the said Court as per order dated the 26th February 1916, in Review Petition No. 76 of 1916, in Appeal Suit No. 101 of 1914 (Original Suit No. 137 of 1913 on the file of the Additional District Munsif's Court, Madura).

Petition praying that in the circumstances stated in the affidavit filed therewith the High Court will be pleased to amend the order of the District Court, Madura, dated the 26th February 1916, in Review Petition No. 76 of 1916, in Appeal Suit No. 101 of 1914, and also the revised decree, dated the 26th February 1916, in the said Appeal Suit (Original Suit No. 137 of 1913 on the file of the Additional District Munsif's Court, Madura).

FACTS.—A instituted a suit against B and C for recovery of possession of a house from B, on the strength of a sale-deed executed in his favour by C. He also prayed in the alternative for the return of the purchase-money in case C his vendor were found to have no title. B claimed the house as his ancestral property and if that were found against, he relied on title by adverse possession for more than the statutory period. The District Munsif found that the title to the house was in C and that A, his vendee, was entitled to recover and accordingly gave A a decree for possession, observing that in this view it became unnecessary for him to consider and find the issue raising the question of alternative relief, viz., the return of purchase-money. On appeal the District Judge held that B had acquired title to the house and that A was not entitled to recover. He, however, dismissed the suit without considering the question of alternative relief, the consideration of which had become necessary by his finding on the question of title. A thereupon preferred a second appeal to the High Court and also a review petition in the District Court, claiming in both the alternative relief to which he had become entitled in the view which the District Judge had taken as to his right to the main relief. The second appeal was admitted and was confined to the relief against C, who alone was made the respondent. The District Judge allowed the review petition, but in his order by a mistake put "1st defendant" (B) for "2nd defendant" (C), so that the order directing C to make good the purchase-money read as an order directing B to return the same, which the District Judge could not have meant. Similarly, "2nd defendant" (C) was held to be an unnecessary party, while what was meant and alone could have been meant was that the 1st defendant (B) was an unnecessary party. A thereupon withdrew the second appeal, which was consequently dismissed. Meanwhile, B had put in a petition for the amendment of this accidental slip in the District Court but the District Judge, while recognising the mistake, held that he had no power to correct it as the second appeal was pending in the High Court. B thereupon preferred a Civil Revision Petition against the order of the District Judge and also prayed the High Court by a simultaneous Civil Miscellaneous Petition to correct the mistake itself in case it should agree with the District Judge that he had no jurisdiction to amend.

Messrs. K. Jagannatha Ayyar, K V. Sesha Aiyangar and K. V Krishnasami Ayyar, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

IN CIVIL REVISION PETITION No 872 OF 1916.

The District Judge was mistaken in thinking that he had no power to correct a clerical error occurring in his Review Order because of the pendency of a second appeal in this Court.

The clerical errors alleged in the affidavit, which was before the Judge, consisted of the words: "1st defendant" occurring where the words "2nd defendant" were intended and vice versa.

This was a matter to be dealt with under section 152 of the Code of Civil Procedure and that section distinctly provides that where such clerical errors arise from any accidental slip, the Court (that is, the Court in which they have occurred) may correct them at any time.

I set aside the District Judge's order and direct him to pass fresh orders according to law after giving notice to the parties concerned. The parties will bear their own costs of this application.

IN CIVIL MISCELLANEOUS PETITION
No. 2597 OF 1916.

The proper Court to correct clerical errors is the Court in which the errors were made. The petition is dismissed.

Where an execution case is discontinued, not by reason of default on the part of the decree-holder, but at the instance of an unsuccessful claimant who has instituted a suit to contest the validity of the order in the claim case, the attachment effected at the instance of the decree-holder continues to be in force. [p. 249, col. 2.]

Where the same property is attached in execution of two decrees, one passed by a Court of superior grade and the other by a Court of inferior grade, the sale should be held by the Court of superior grade. Where, however, the Court of inferior grade has actually held the sale in ignorance of the fact that proceedings in execution have already been taken in the Court of superior grade and that the property brought to sale was subject to a legally subsisting attachment effected in the latter Court, the proper procedure is to move the District Judge to transfer the proceeds realised by the sale held by the Court of inferior grade to the Court of superior grade. If this procedure is adopted, full effect is given to the intention of the Legislature. The Court of superior grade in essence adopts the sale held by the Court of inferior grade as if it were a sale held by itself and the sale-proceeds are then rateably distributed in accordance with the provisions of the Code. JUDGMENT.—This Rule raises a question of the relative rights of two rival decree-holders to participate in the sale-proceeds of the property of their common judgment-debtor. The petitioner obtained a decree for money against his judgment debtor in the Court of the Subordinate Judge on the 17th March 1916. At his instance, writ of attachment was issued and served. A claimant appeared on the scene, but his objection was overruled. The claimant then sued for cancellation of the order and obtained an injunction restraining the petitioner from proceeding with execution of his decree till the suit had been decided. The Subordinate Judge thereupon stayed the sale and proceeded to dismiss the execution case. It appears to have been erroneously assumed that the effect of this order was, under rule 57 of Order XXI of the Code, to cancel the attachment effected by the petitioner. The execution case was discontinued, not by reason of default on the part of the decree-holder, but at the instance of an unsuccessful claimant who had instituted a suit to contest the validity of the order in the claim case. In these circumstances, we must assume that the attachment effected at the instance of the petitioner is still in force. Meanwhile, proceedings had been taken by the opposite party, another creditor of the same judgment-debtor, for realization of his dues. The sale at his instance was fixed for the 20th April 1917. The petitioner applied to the Subordinate Judge and prayed that he might communicate with the Munsif with a view to get the sale stayed. The letter was sent, but reached the Munsif after the sale had already been held in his Court.

The petitioner then asked the Subordinate Judge to attach the sale-proceeds deposited in the Court of the Munsif and to distribute them rateably. This application was dismissed. The petitioner now contends that the assets should be rateably distributed by the Subordinate Judge amongst all persons qualified under section 73, Code of Civil Procedure, inclusive of himself.

The petitioner is not entitled to rateable distribution under section 73, which provides that where assets are held by a Court and more persons than one have, before the receipt of such assets, applied to the Court for the execution of decrees for the payment of money passed against the same judgment-debtor and have not obtained satisfaction thereof, the assets, after deducting the costs of realization, shall be rateably distributed among all such persons. In this case, the petitioner did not apply for execution of his decree to the Court which held the assets. Indeed, he was not competent to make such an application, as the decree obtained by him in the Court of the Subordinate Judge could not possibly be executed by the Munsif. Nor has he been able to obtain the benefit of the principle recognized in section 63, which provides that where property, not in the custody of any Court, is under attachment in execution of decrees of more Courts than one, the Court, which shall receive or realize such property and shall determine any claim thereto and any objection to the attachment thereof, shall be the Court of the highest grade or, where there is no difference in grade between such Courts, the Court under whose decree the property was first attached. If the petitioner had been able to apply in time to the Subordinate Judge under this section, the sale might have been held in his Court. That event, however, has not happened. The sale has actually been held by the Munsif, and is a valid sale, as is clear from section 63 (2), which provides that nothing in the section shall be deemed to invalidate any proceeding taken by a Court executing one of such decrees. The position thus is that in the events which have happened, neither section 63 nor section 73 applies.

The question next requires consideration, whether, in the actual circumstances of the case, it is still possible for the Court to give relief to the petitioner. The Legislature undoubtedly contemplated that, where, as here, the same property has been attached in execution of two decrees, one passed by a Court of superior grade and the other by a Court of inferior grade, the sale should be held by the Court of superior grade. Here, however, the Court of lower grade has actually held the sale in ignorance of the fact that proceedings in execution had already been taken in the Court of higher grade and that the property brought to sale was subject to a legally subsisting attachment effected in that Court. But the true intention of the Legislature may still be carried out in substance, if the course pointed out in Bykant Nath Shaha v. Rajendro Narain Rai (1) is adopted. There, the same property was sold in execution successively by a Munsif and by a Subordinate Judge, and the question arose as to the validity of the title acquired by the subsequent purchaser The Court observed that the Subordinate Judge, instead of holding a second sale, should rather have accepted the sale held by the Munsif and have required a transfer of the deposit in his Court of the assets realized, so that they might be rateably distributed amongst all the decree-holders. The same view was adopted in Patel Naranji Morarji v. Haridas Navalram (2), where Sir Charles Sargent, C. J., observed in similar circumstances that the petitioner might have applied to the District Judge to transfer the proceeds realized by the sale held by the second class Subordinate Judge to the Court of the first class Subordinate Judge. If we compare the observations in the two cases just mentioned, it becomes obvious that Sir Charles Sargent pointed out the correct procedure to be followed in cases of this character, namely, the Subordinate Judge is not to direct the Munsif to transmit the proceeds to his Court, but should move the District Judge to have the proceeds so transferred. If this procedure is adopted, full effect is given to the intention of the Legislature. The Subordinate Judge in essence adopts the sale held by the Munsif as if it were a sale held by himself and the sale-proceeds are then rateably distributed in accordance with the provisions of the Code We feel no doubt that the Court has inherent power to adopt the procedure we have described to effectuate the ends of justice and that this course should have been followed in the present case.

The result is that this Rule is made absolute, and the order of the Subordinate Judge set aside. We direct that the sale proceeds be transferred from the Court of the Munsif to the Court of the Subordinate Judge to be rateably distributed by him amongst the decree-holders who have qualified themselves under section 73, Code of Civil Procedure, including the present petitioner. We make no order as to the costs of this Rule.

A suit lies for mesne profits after date of payment under a preliminary decree in a suit for redemption of mortgage, the mortgagor's remedy not being confined to a claim for adjustment of accounts at the time of the passing of the final decree. [p. 252, col 1.]

Papla Chakrapani Chettiar v. Ramaswamy Thenkondan, 42 Ind. Cas. 230, Rukhminibai v. Venkatesh, 31 B. 527; 9 Bom. L. R. 958, distinguished.

Second appeal against the decree of the Temporary Subordinate Judge, Tanjore, in Appeal Suit No. 54 of 1916, preferred against that of the Court of the District Munsif, Tiruturaipundi, in Original Suit No. 143 of 1913.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Mr. K. Bashyam Aiyangar, for the Appellants.—No separate suit for mesne profits is maintainable. Under Order XXXIV, rule 10, Civil Procedure Code, the parties to a mortgage have the right to claim an adjustment of accounts at the date of the final decree. The accounts include a claim for mesne profits which have accrued due after payment of the amount of redemption. That is a matter for enquiry in the suit itself and as the relationship of mortgagor and mortgagee continues till the date of the final decree, the parties resort to the only statutory remedy provided by Order XXXIV, rule 10, Civil Procedure Code. Vide Papla Chakrapani Chettiar v. Ramaswamy Thenkondan (1) and Rukhminibai v. Venkatesh (2).

Mr. C. S. Vencatachariar, for the Respondents, argued contra. It was urged that, on payment of the redemption amount under the preliminary decree, the mortgagor acquires a right to immediate possession and subsequent possession by the mortgagee is wrongful, which makes him liable to the mortgagor in damages. A separate suit for future mesne profits is not barred under the language of the rule. The cases cited do not put a restrictive interpretation on the rule. The mortgagor can elect to ask for adjustment of accounts, but his failure to do so does not operate as res judicata for preferment of a fresh claim.

JUDGMENT.—The previous suit was for redemption. A preliminary decree was passed on the 30th September 1909, which gave a month for the payment by the mortgagor. The payment was actually made on the 29th October 1909. The final decree was passed on the 13th December 1912. The present suit is for mesne profits between the 29th October 1909 and the date of the suit. Both the lower Courts, following Sakari Datta v. Sheikh Ainuddy (3), gave plaintiff a decree.

In second appeal Mr. Bashyam Aiyangar argued that the claim is barred by res judicata. His contention is that as Order XXXIV, rule 10, provides for an adjustment of the amount due on the occasion of passing the final decree, the relationship of mortgagor and mortgagee subsists till then and the only remedy open to the mortgagor is to claim a settlement of accounts in the passing of the final decree and not to sue separately for the mesne profits. The question is whether the mortgagor is compellable to adopt this course indicated by the learned Vakil.

It was recently held by a Full Bench of this Court, that a claim for future mesne profits can be sued on separately. It is not seriously disputed that a decree for redemption is practically a decree for possession, subject to the condition of paying a certain amount fixed by the Court. Therefore when that amount has been paid, the mortgagor is entitled to possession and the retention of possession by the mortgagee is that of a wrong-doer. This is the view taken in Sakari Datta v. Sheikh Ainuddy (3) and we agree with that decision. Under Order XXXIV, rule 1 (a), the moment the amount ascertained by the preliminary decree is paid into Court, the mortgagor acquires a right to the property. There is nothing more to be done by way of adjustment. Moreover, in this case, the possession of the property was to be in lieu of interest. Therefore no question of further accountability arises. Vide section 77 of the Transfer of Property Act.

Our attention was drawn to a decision of Abdur Rahim and Bakewell, JJ., in Papla Chakrapani Chettiar v. Ramaswamy Thenkondan (1). The learned Judges held in that case that the Court had power, even after the preliminary decree, to adjust the rights of the parties. It was neither argued nor decided that the mortgagor is bound to claim this adjustment and that if he did not do so, his right to mesne profits will be barred as res judicata. Rukhminibai v. Venkatesh (2), which was strongly relied on by the learned Vakil for the appellants, was a case in which tender was before decree. No payment was made under the decree and consequently the present question is unaffected by that decision.

The other cases quoted do not decide that the mortgagor's only remedy is to claim an adjustment before the passing of the final decree.

We think the decision of the lower Appellate Court is right and dismiss the second appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Mr. G. V. Kukade, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The defendant No. 1 obtained a simple money-decree against the plaintiff Krishnaji in the Court of Small Causes at Akola and in execution thereof attached a preliminary decree for foreclosure obtained by the plaintiff against one Naru. The decree was sold at a Court sale and purchased by the 2nd defendant. The present suit has been instituted for a declaration that the sale is null and void on various grounds, two only of which are pressed in this second appeal. The plaintiff's case is that the Small Causes Court had no jurisdiction to sell the preliminary decree for foreclosure, which according to his contention was immoveable property. It is also urged that the sale took place without notice being given to him as required by Order XXI, rule 66. In the alternative the plaintiff claims damages against the 1st defendant. The plaintiff's suit has been dismissed by both the Courts below.

On behalf of the plaintiff-appellant a number of cases has been cited to show that a mortgage of immoveable property is immoveable property within the meaning of the

KRISHNAJI v. BALIRAM.

Civil Procedure Code for the purposes of execution. Except the case of Musammat Bhawani Kuar v. Gulab Rai (1), which was a case under Act VIII of 1859, none of the cases cited before me is a case where the mortgage had merged in a decree. I may, however, point out that the weight of authority is distinctly in favour of the view taken by this Court in Balwant Rao v. Musammat Ratna Bai (2), where it was held that a sale of mortgage debt in pursuance of attachment made under section 268 of the Code of 1882 is a legal and valid sale and the collateral security will pass to the auction-purchaser even when the sale was made by a Court of Small Causes. In addition to the cases cited therein, I need only refer to Tarvadi Bholanath v. Bai Kashi (3) and Nataraja Iyer v. South India Bank (4). As regards usufructuary mortgages, there might conceivably be a difference of opinion and the point would apparently depend upon whether there was an enforceable debt secured by mortgage. See Ramasami Moopan v. Srinivasa Iyengar (5), explaining and distinguishing Manilal Ranchhod v. Motibhai Hemabhai (6). Their Lordships of the Privy Council have held that a suit for foreclosure is a suit to enforce payment of money charged upon immoveable property within the meaning of Article 132 of the Limitation Act: Vasudeva Mudaliar v. Srinivasa Pillai (7). Therefore, a mortgage by conditional sale may be regarded as a debt charged upon immoveable property.

As I have already pointed out, we are concerned here not with a mortgage but with a decree. Order XXI, rule 53, clearly deals with the mode in which decrees are to be attached and dealt with in execution proceedings. They are a class by themselves whether the decree is one regarding moveable or immoveable property. Order XXI, rule 54, which deals with immoveable property, clearly refers to immoveable property other than that in which the rights are merged in a decree. The corresponding sections to rules 53 and 54 of Order XXI in the repealed Code are sections 273 and 274. Schedule II of the repealed Code shows that section 274 (Order XXI, rule 54) was not made applicable to Provincial Courts of Small Causes and section 273, corresponding to Order XXI, rule 53, was made applicable so far as it relates to decrees for moveable property. It is clear that under the old law a Court of Small Causes could not attach immoveable property nor a decree affecting immoveable property. One prohibition in this respect is contained in Order XXI, rule 82, which says that sales of immoveable property in execution of decrees may be ordered by any Court other than a Court of Small Causes. I have already held that a decree relating to immoveable property is not immoveable property within the meaning of the Chapter relating to execution. There is nothing, therefore, in the present Code to prevent a Small Cause Court attaching and selling a decree for immoveable property. The contention that section 7 bars the jurisdiction of the Small Cause Court is unsound. It merely lays down that a Small Cause Court shall not exercise jurisdiction in suits excepted from its cognizance, nor shall it exercise jurisdiction in the execution of decrees in such suits, but the suit in which the preliminary decree for foreclosure was attached and sold was a suit within the cognizance of the Small Causes Court. Order L, rule 1, makes inapplicable to Small Cause Courts so much of the First Schedule as relates to the execution of decrees against immoveable property. But this does not prevent the attachment of decrees affecting immoveable property. Order XXI, rule 53, contemplates an attachment and sale of all decrees other than those for the payment of money or for sale in enforcement of a mortgage or charge [Gopal Nanashet v. Joharimal (8), Delhi and London Bank, Ld. v. Partab Singh (9)]. In view of the amendment made by the Act of 1908 the principle laid down in these cases, though applicable, must be read subject to the amendment now introduced. In other words, in the case of a decree for sale the only procedure laid down for its attachment and realisation is that contained in the earlier part of Order XXI, rule 53. Such a decree can no longer be sold, but the decree itself is to be executed, and the assets realised to be made available to the person entitled to attach the decree. The procedure adopted in the case was correct.

As regards the appellant's contention that he was not served with a notice under Order XXI, rule 66, I agree with the lower Court that this was only an irregularity. The provision for notice is directory, not mandatory. It does not seem to have been enacted for the benefit of the judgment-debtor but with a view to ascertaining the exact rights which should be set forth in the proclamation for sale. Notice to the judgment-debtor, any more than to the decree-holder, is not a condition precedent to the sale, as argued before me. It is merely a matter of procedure enacted in the interests of the auction-purchaser. In any case, it is only an irregularity which if it had in any way prejudiced the judgment-debtor might have entitled him to have the sale set aside. The description given in the sale proclamation was a perfectly correct description. Therefore, the case cited [Ravaneshwar Prasad Singh v. Baijnath Ram Goenka (10)] has no application. The appellant cannot maintain a suit to have the sale declared null and void on this ground.

As regards the claim for compensation it does not merit serious consideration. It was no part of the decree-holder's duty to give notice under Order XXI, rule 66, to the judgment-debtor. Therefore the absence of a notice gives rise to no cause of action against the decree-holder any more than it would give rise to a cause of action against the auction-purchaser.

The appeal is, therefore, dismissed with costs.

Bengal Tenancy Act (VIII B. C. of 1885), ss. 49, 85—Lease from year to year—Ejectment—Notice—Lease in contravention of s. 85—Grantor, whether can question ease—Estoppel by representation, plea of.

In 1891 plaintiff granted an under-raiyati lease to the defendant. The lease was not for any specified term, but was described as a harsana patta (yearly lease). The plaintiff stated that she had a raiyati interest in the land and the defendant was enjoined to have an entry made in the Survey and Settlement Record that the grantor possessed a raiyati right and the grantee himself a harsana right:

Section 49 of the Bengal Tenancy Act prescribes no form of notice, nor does it give any indication as to the length of notice. An under-raiyat is protected from ejectment until the end of the agricultural year in which a notice to quit is served upon him by his landlord, and this indicates the time when it becomes obligatory upon him to leave. [p. 255, col 2.]

(Case-law discussed).

Estoppel by representation only arises where the representation is as to a matter of fact. [p. 258, col. 2.]

It is absolutely necessary to plead estoppel if it is intended to rely upon it. [p. 257, col. 2; p. 258, col. 1.]

Where a raiyat giving a permanent sub-lease in contravention of the provisions of section 85 (2) of the Bengal Tenancy Act induces his lessee to accept it on the faith of a representation that his own status is such as to validate such a sub-lease, he cannot afterwards be allowed to prove in a suit against his lessee that his status was other than it was in the first instance represented to be. JUDGMENT.

MOOKERJEE, J.—This is an appeal under clause 15 of the Letters Patent from the judgment of Mr. Justice Newbould in a suit for ejectment. On the 20th February 1891 the plaintiff granted an under raiyati lease to the defendant. The lease was not for any specified term, but was described as a barsana patta (yearly lease). The grantor stated that she had a raigati interest in the land under a grant from her superior landlord, dated the 26th November 1838; and the grantee was enjoined to have an entry made in the Survey and Settlement Record that the grantor possessed a raiyati right and the grantee himself a harsana right. On the 12th April 1911 the plaintiff served a notice upon the defendant calling upon him to quit the land at the end of six months. On the 14th August 1911, she instituted the present suit to eject the defendant who had not left the land in spite of the notice to quit. The Court of first instance dismissed the suit on the ground that the tenancy was permanent and was valid and operative as between grantor and grantee. Upon appeal, the Subordinate Judge held that a permanent lease registered in contravention of section 85 (2) of the Bengal Tenancy Act was of no effect, and that the defendant was consequently liable to be ejected on service of notice to quit. The suit was accordingly decreed and that decree has been affirmed by Mr. Justice Newbould.

On a perusal of the lease, it is obvious to me that it was not intended to be and is in no sense a permanent lease. It is throughout described as a lease from year to year. The case appears to have been argued in the Courts below on the erroneous assumption that it was a permanent lease, because the interest was treated as heritable. No question, consequently, arises whether a permanent lease registered in contravention of section 85 (2) of the Bengal Tenancy Act is ineffectual for all purposes between grantor and grantee, a question which has led to some divergence of judicial opinion in this Court, nor is it necessary to consider the question of the applicability of the doctrine of estoppel to this case, for here both the parties knew and stated explicitly that the grantor was a raiyat [Bamandas Bhattacharyya v. Nilmadhab Saha (1)]. If, then, we assume that the lease was operative between lessor and lessee, obviously this furnishes no answer to the claim for ejectment, for it is of the very essence of an annual tenancy that it is terminable by the landlord on notice to quit. Ordinarily, the landlord has to give a six months' notice ending with a year of the tenancy, but in the case of agricultural tenancies of the description now before me, the provision for notice is to be found in section 49 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. That section contemplates two classes of cases, namely, first, where an under-raiyat holds under a written lease for a specified term, and, secondly, where an under raiyat holds either without a written lease or under a written lease which is not for a specified term [Raj Kumari Debi v. Barkatulla Mandal (2)]. The defendant is an under-raiyat of the second description [Mohendra Nath Sepai v. Parbutty Charan Dass (3), Komaruddi v. Sreenath Chowdhury (4) and Indugazi Doctor v. Chandra Kali Sundrani (5)]. The landlord has complied with the requirements of section 49 (b). The notice was served just before the expiry of 1272 M. S., the tenant was bound to quit by the end of 1273, that is, on the 13th April 1912, and the suit was instituted some months later. The only possible objection which can be taken to the notice is that it called upon the tenant to quit at the end of six months from the date of its service, but as pointed out by Jenkins, C. J., in Harifulla Guin v. Benode Behary Mondol (6), section 49 prescribes no form of notice nor has it given any indication as to the length of notice, and the Chief Justice added that it would be deplorable to introduce into matters of this kind the intricacies of English Law as prevailing in the Presidency Towns. The under-raiyat is protected from ejectment until the end of the agricultural year in which a notice to quit is served upon him by his landlord, and this indicates the time when it becomes obligatory upon him to leave. I am of opinion that the tenancy in this case was terminable, was, in fact and in law, validly terminated by a notice under section 49 (b), and the plaintiff was, at the date of the institution of the suit, entitled to recover possession of the land from the defendant.

The appeal must accordingly be dismissed with costs.

BEACHCROFT, J.—The plaintiff in this suit sued to eject the defendant from certain land. She alleged that her status was that of a raiyat, that she gave the defendant a lease of the land in suit, that the lease could not confer a permanent right on defendant or in fact any right for a period exceeding 9 years, and that on the expiry of the 9 years she served defendant with a notice to quit. The defence was that the lease was a permanent one, that the Bengal Tenancy Act did not apply and that no notice was served.

The Munsif held that the Bengal Tenancy Act applied and that notice was served. But as the lease contained provisions for devolution by inheritance, he considered it would be inequitable to allow the plaintiff to recede from the terms of the contract made by her and dismissed the suit.

On appeal the findings of the Munsif as to service of notice and as to the applicability of the Bengal Tenancy Act were not disputed. The Subordinate Judge also upheld the view that the patta in terms created a permanent tenancy. But he considered himself bound by certain decisions of this Court to hold that the patta could not be given in evidence and that the lease could not be proved by oral evidence. He, therefore, decreed the suit. It may here be noted that even if there had been a finding as to a tenancy created otherwise than by the patta, it would have been of no avail to the defendant in view of the finding as to the service of notice.

On appeal to this Court the decree of the Subordinate Judge was upheld by Newbould, J., and the present appeal is against that learned Judge's decision.

Before Newbould, J., the appeal appears to have been argued on the footing that the sub-lease granted by the plaintiff was a permanent one and before us also it was argued by both sides on that supposition. That being so, I propose to deal with the matter as if the sub lease in terms purported to create a permanent tenancy.

The position then is that the plaintiff, who is a raiyat, having given the defendant a sub-lease for a period exceeding 9 years, has succeeded in ejecting him on the plea that the lease cannot be valid for a period exceeding 9 years.

The main argument that has been addressed to us is that the plaintiff was estopped from denying that her status was such as to make her competent to grant the lease. A second point taken is that section 85 (2) of the Bengal Tenancy Act was enacted for the benefit of the landlord, and, therefore, no one else but the landlord of the raiyat could question the validity of the sub-lease.

It will, therefore, be necessary to deal with the two questions of estoppel and of the scope of section 85 (2).

In regard to section 85 (2) two views have been taken, one, that it was enacted for the benefit of the superior landlord and, therefore, no one else can question the validity of a lease for a period exceeding 9 years, and certainly not the raiyat who has granted the lease, who will be estopped from doing so; the other, that whether the intention of the Legislature was to protect only the landlord or not, and the view has been expressed that it was intended also to protect the raiyat, the section is framed in such wide terms as to make a lease for a period exceeding 9 years absolutely invalid.

That the raiyat is not estopped from denying the validity of such a lease has been held in more than one case in this Court. In the case of Fazel Sheikh v. Keramuddi Sheikh (7) the question was directly raised and answered in the negative. That was a case between the purchaser in execution of a money decree of the right, title and interest of the raiyat and the sub-lessee. The purchaser would be bound by the same estoppel as the original raiyat. It was held that no question of estoppel arose, because the plaintiff (the purchaser) was not bound by a sub-lease void in law and which his predecessor-in-interest was not empowered to grant. The report does not set out the nature of the arguments advanced on the question of estoppel, but the decision would appear to rest on the principle that there can be no estoppel against a Statute, which was the ground on which the argument of estoppel was again rejected in the case of Telam Paramanik v. Adu Shaikh (8). This was a case between two persons both of whom had permanent sub-leases from the same raiyat, the defendants being later in point of time. The defendant was in possession and pleaded the invalidity of plaintiff's title under the permanent lease. If the doctrine of estoppel would have prevented this plea from the raiyat who granted the sub lease to defendant, it would also have prevented the defendant from raising the plea, and it was accordingly argued that the raiyat could not have raised the plea. This argument was rejected. In the case of Manik Borai v. Bani Charan Mondal (9) it was hinted, though it was not necessary to decide the point, that the principle that there could be no estoppel against a Statute might defeat a plea of estoppel as between the grantor and grantee.

In the case of Telam Paramanik v. Adu Shaikh (8) the question of estoppel was certainly not argued in the form in which it is now put forward, and possibly in the earlier case cited it may have been based on the principle that a grantor may not derogate from his own grant.

The argument in the present case is based on the doctrine of estoppel by representation. It is that the plaintiff having represented herself to hold a status which would enable her to grant a permanent lease, she cannot be allowed to turn round and say that her status was other than that represented. In support of the argument reliance was placed on the case of Bamandas Bhattacharyya v. Nilmadhab Saha (1). In that case the lessee endeavoured to establish the position that his lessor was not a tenure-holder as the lease indicated, but an occupancy raiyat and, therefore, that the lease was void under section 85 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. That is the converse case to the present. It was held that the lessee having got possession from his lessor was estopped from denying the validity of his lessor's title. That decision cannot help the appellant in the present case. Landlord's estoppel and tenant's estoppel are based on entirely different considerations. It is also open to question whether the rest of the judgment can be regarded as an authority in favour of the appellant. For having decided the question of estoppel, which was enough to dispose of the appeal, except as regarded the question of damage, the learned Judges proceeded to support their conclusion by an argument based on the converse case, in which they assumed the very point which is now under discussion. They then referred to a number of cases dealing with the construction of section 85 of the Bengal Tenancy Act and remarked that as between the grantor and grantee the rule of estoppel applies when the elements essential to attract its operation are proved to exist. At the proposition expressed in those terms it is impossible to cavil, no authority is required to support it. The question is what are the elements essential to attract its operation.

It was not, however, necessary in my opinion for the appellant to invoke the support of this case to establish a well-settled proposition. If he required an authority it would have been sufficient to quote the words of Lord Selborne, L. C., in Citizens' Bank of Louisiana v. First National Bank of New Orleans (10) as to representations being treated as true if another person relying on them has altered his situation. And subject to any question as to admissibility in evidence by reason of the registration law, I have no doubt that if it be found as a fact that a raiyat giving a permanent sub-lease in contravention of the provisions of section 85 (2) has induced his lessee to accept it on the faith of a representation that his own status was such as to validate such a sub-lease, he will not afterwards be allowed to prove in a suit against his lessee that his status was other than it was in the first instance represented to be. As to the doctrine I have no doubt, as to its application to the present case there is considerable difficulty.

In the first place, the estoppel was not pleaded in the written statement. One reason possibly is that the defence taken to the plaintiff's claim that the lease was not valid for more than nine years was that the Bengal Tenancy Act did not apply. It is absolutely necessary to plead estoppel if it is intended to rely on it. This is not a technical rule of pleading, but a matter of substance. For if estoppel is pleaded it may be possible for the other side to show that there could be no estoppel, the real facts being known. It was particularly necessary that the plea should be taken in this case, for the document itself raises a doubt as to the grantor's competency to grant a permanent lease.

(8) 18 Ind. Cas. 791; 17 C. W. N. 468.
(9) 10 Ind. Cas. 469; 13 C. L. J. 649.
(10) (1873) 6 H. L. 352; 43 L. J. Ch. 269; 22 W. R. 194.

As a necessary consequence of the absence of the plea, there is no finding and presumably no evidence that such a representation as indicated above was made and relied on. Nor are we told even now what is the representation which was made as to the plaintiff's status. It is said the representation is made in the document itself. It does not necessarily follow that it was on the faith of that statement that the sub-lessee accepted the lease. In fact the representation must have been made before the document was drafted, but if any was made which considering the general knowledge that villagers have of each other's affairs cannot be predicated as a matter of certainty, it is a reasonable assumption in favour of the appellant that the statement in the document is identical with the representation made and accepted. Now what is the representation contained in the document? The whole document has not been translated for us, but a portion has, and that portion contains a passage which indicates the representations. It runs: "In the Survey Record you should record my right as raiyati and yours as harsana", i. e., the plaintiff was making it clear that her status was that of a raiyat. Now ordinarily a raiyat cannot give a sub-lease for more than nine years but there is one class of raiyats, which is not subject to the bar, viz., raiyats holding at fixed rates. It has been held that such raiyats coming under section 18 of the Bengal Tenancy Act are not subject to the provisions of section 85. In fact that decision was given long after the sub-lease in question, at the date of which the question was an open one. Raiyats holding at fixed rates are a small and exceptional class. What we have then at most is that the status of the plaintiff was said in the document to be that of a class the members of which could only in exceptional cases grant permanent sub-leases, while the large majority of the class were subject to the provisions of section 85.

Estoppel by representation only arises when the representation is as to a matter of fact. It can, therefore, only be effectively pleaded in this case, if we can say that the plaintiff represented herself to be a raiyat at fixed rates and the defendant believing that representation was thereby induced to take the permanent lease. On the facts before us it is impossible to assume that she made any such representation. That being so, the appellant's argument based on estoppel, in my opinion, fails.

There remains the other question whether the raiyat, the grantor of the lease, can avail himself of the bar created by section 85 (2). In the case of Bamandas Bhattacharyya v. Nilmadhab Saha (1) a number of cases bearing on section 85 were quoted as affirming the view that a lease granted in contravention of section 85 was operative as between grantor and grantee. The list given is not exhaustive, as will appear from a reference to the reports of some of the cases cited, and with all respect to the learned Judges I venture to question the accuracy of the conclusion which they drew from the cases cited. There are following cases in connection with section 85 in chronological order:—

Srikant Mondul v. Saroda Kant Mondul (11), Gopal Mondal v. Eshan Chunder Banerjee (12), Madan Chandra Kapali v. Jaki Karikar (13), Fazel Sheikh v. Keramuddi Sheikh (7), Ramgati Mandul v. Shyama Charan Dutt (14) and Ali Mohammad v. Nayan Rajah Bhuiya (15), this case though decided in 1903 was not reported till 1912; Basaratulla Mundle v. Kasirunnessa Bibi (16), Bipin Behari Hati v. Amirta Lal Bhattacharji (17), Tamijuddi v. Asgar Howladar (18), Manik Borai v. Bani Charan Mondal (9), Arab Ali v. Rachimaddi (19), Abdul Karim v. Abdul Rahman (20), Jarip Khan v. Durfa Bewa (21), Telam Pramanik v. Adu Shaikh (8), Mohim Chandra Dey v. Baidya Nath (22), Gonesh Mondol v. Thanda Namasundrani (23), Janaki Nath Hore v. Prabhasini Dasi (24) and Lani Mia v. Muhammad Easin Mia (25).

Some of these cases were referred to by Carnduff, J., in the case of Telam Pramanik v. Adu Shaikh (8) and the learned Judge pointed out that those cases were not authorities for the construction of sub-section (2) of section 85. And it is obvious that cases in which the question before the Judges was the effect to be placed on other sub-sections of section 85 can be no authorities on the question before us, and if the learned Judges in those cases were led into making remarks referring to section 85 (2), such remarks can at most be obiter dicta.

Four of the cases in the above list, viz., Nos. 2, 3, 8 and 11 [Gopal Mandal v. Eshan Chunder Banerjee (12), Madan Chandra Kapali v. Jaki Karikar (13), Bipin Behari Hati v Amirta Lal Bhattacharji (17), Arab Ali v. Rachimaddi (19)], which dealt with section 85 (3), may, therefore, at once be eliminated from our consideration.

Then there is a class of cases in which the lease was for 9 years only but there was a covenant for renewal. In the 6th of the above cases [Ali Mohammad v. Nayan Rajah Bhuiya (15)] it was held that section 85 was not a bar as the lease was not for more than nine years. That was followed in case No. 18 [Lani Mia v. Muhammad Easin Mia (25).] In Tamijuddi v. Asgar Howladar (18) also the lease was not one for more than 9 years and the contest was between the superior landlord and the sub-lessee. In that case, therefore, the Judges did not have to consider the present question, viz., the validity of a lease for more than 9 years, when raised as between the grantor and grantee. These three cases may, therefore, be eliminated.

In the first case on the list [Srikant Mondul v. Saroda Kant Mondul (11)] the Court decided that a sub-lease for more than 9 years was altogether void. The case was, however, between the superior landlord and the sub lessee and the Court had not to consider whether the grantor could question the validity of the lease.

Nor is the 17th case, that of Janaki Nath Hore v. Prabhasini Dasi (24), an authority on the question before us. There the question arose between the purchaser of a holding in execution of a rent decree who is not a representative of the original raiyat, and the sub lessee. It was pointed out that no considerations such as might apply between grantor and grantee, applied to the case.

This reduces the list of cases to which reference need be made to nine. In Fazel Sheikh v. Keramuddi Sheikh (7) the contest was between the sub-lessee and the successor-in interest of the raiyat. It was held that the permanent lease was altogether void in view of the express provisions of section 85 (2) and that the successor-in-interest of the grantor could question its validity.

In Ramgati Mandul v. Shyama Charan Dutt (14) the contest was between the superior landlord and the sub-lessee. In this case the superior landlord was a raiyat; he gave a sub-lease, and his lessee again gave a sub-lease. As between the two lowest lessees section 85 could not apply, as it applies only to sub-leases by a raiyat. But in order to ascertain the title of the lowest lessee the Court had to consider the validity of the permanent sub-lease granted by the raiyat and the learned Judges held, again at the instance of the grantor, that it was invalid.

In Basaratulla Mundle v. Kasirunnessa Bibi (16) the lease was for a period of 9 years with a covenant for renewal. On a suit to eject the sub-lessee after the expiry of the term of 9 years, it was argued that the sub-lessee was protected by the covenant for renewal and that section 85 (2) could be enforced only on behalf of the superior landlord. This argument was negatived by Geidt, J.

In Manik Borai v. Bani Charan Mondal (9) the sub-lessee of the raiyat had been dispossessed by some persons other than the grantor of the sub-lease. It is not stated under what title these persons claimed, but in one passage in the judgment it is stated that the contest was between the under-raiyat (i.e., the sub-lessee) and a trespasser who had no title, and it was, therefore, "unnecessary to consider whether the validity of a sub-lease granted by a raiyat in contravention of section 85 could be questioned by the grantor." That being so, the case is not an authority for the question now before us, for though in another part of the judgment there is an expression of opinion that the question could only be raised by the superior landlord, the case was disposed of on the ground that "the plaintiff had a subsisting interest when the action was commenced."

In Abdul Karim v. Abdul Rahman (20) the contest was between the raiyat and his lessee. It was held that the lease was a permanent one and that the contract was valid in law, so far as the contracting parties were concerned. Carnduff, J., was a party to this decision and he subsequently in Telam Paramanik v. Adu Shaikh (8) expressed the opinion that the case had been wrongly decided and that the authorities quoted in support of the proposition stated therein were in fact not authorities for the proposition.

In Jarip Khan v. Durfa Bewa (21) it was held that a sub-lease for more than 9 years, which had been registered in contravention of section 85 (2), must be treated as not registered and that there was, therefore, no proof of the title of the person who claimed under the sub-lease. The effect of this decision was the same as the effect of Fazel Sheikh v. Keramuddi Sheikh (7) and other cases on the same lines viz., that a sub lease for more than 9 years is absolutely void. To the same effect was the case of Telam Paramanik v. Adu Sheikh (8), where the question was raised between the grantee and a transferee of the grantor.

In Mohim Chandra Dey v. Baidya Nath (22), a case between the raiyat and his lessee, it was held following Jarip Khan v. Durfa Bewa (21) and Telam Paramanik v. Adu Sheikh (8) that the lease was a nullity, and that acceptance of rent could not ratify a lease which was initially void. The learned Judges did not state whether they approved or not of the view taken in the two cases cited; this case, therefore, does not add to the authority of those cases. The only point worthy of note is that one of the Judges viz., Coxe, J., was a party to the decision in Manik Borai v. Bani Charan Mondal (9) and if he intended to hold in the last mentioned case that the question of validity of the lease could not be raised as between grantor and grantee, he had apparently modified his view in 1914.

Gonesh Mondal v. Thanda Bamasundrani (23) also does not lend authority either way. Fletcher, J., pointed out that there were two classes of case, one in which the sub-lessee was precluded from proving his lease, as exemplified by Jarip Khan v. Durfa Bewa (21), and one in which he was able to rely on possession to prove his tenancy independently of his lease, as exemplified by Manik Borai v. Bani Charan Mondal (9). He had to see whether the facts of the case before him brought it within the first or the second class, and finding it to be within the latter, he considered the decision referred to had to be followed. This case is not an authority for the proposition that the raiyat cannot question the validity of the sub-lease.

The result of the cases appears to be this. The document creating the lease cannot be given in evidence if the lease is for more than 9 years, whether the document has been registered or not, and the lease is void. This is undisputed, with this exception that the lease may perhaps be operative as against the grantor or a person claiming title from him. As to this point four different Judges in four cases [Fazel Sheikh v. Keramuddi Sheikh (7), Ramgati Mandul v. Shyama Charan Dutt (14), Basaratulla Mundle v. Kasirunnessa Bibi (16), and Telam Paramanik v. Adu Shaikh (8)], have held that the grantor or a person claiming from him can question the validity of the lease and that it is not operative against him. In only one case [Abdul Karim v. Abdul Rahman (20)], in which it has been necessary to decide the point has the contrary been held and one of the Judges who took part in that decision subsequently took precisely the opposite view.

The authorities, therefore, point to this that the validity of the lease can be questioned by the grantor, and that this view should have been taken is not surprising when, to use the words of Jenkins, C. J., "the Legislature saw fit to carry out the particular purposes indicated in sub-section (2) by a provision which must of necessity have been of universal application. In forbidding registration it forbade for all purposes the production of the document as evidence and withheld from it any ability to affect immoveable property." And though the Act has been extensively amended since three out of the four cases, to which I have just referred, were decided, section 85 has remained untouched.

I regret that I am compelled to take a view, which allows a man to profit by violating his own contract. The view may be taken that a person deserves no sympathy, who taking a lease for more than 9 years with his eyes open deliberately attempts to evade the law. The knowledge that he may be penalised by his grantor is perhaps the best deterrent, though it is not conducive to honesty to permit advantage to be taken of an evasion of the law by one who has himself been a party to it. However, the Statute is so worded that, in my opinion, the conclusion to which I have come cannot be avoided. I, therefore, agree that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

EMPEROR THROUGH COLLECTOR, LAHORE—RESPONDENT.

Stamp Act (II of 1899), s. 2 (10), Sch I, Art. 23—"Conveyance," meaning of—Letter reciting previous sale and admitting receipt of consideration, whether conveyance—Interpretation of Statutes—Fiscal enactments.

The Stamp Act is a fiscal Act and must be rigorously construed in favour of the public, whenever any ambiguity arises. [p. 262, col. 1.]

A conveyance is an instrument which transfers property from one person to another. [p 261, col. 2.]

A document ran as follows:—

"I am enclosing herewith the original sale-deed in respect of the land measuring 38 kanals, 18 marlas, Khasra No. 3388, in Mauza Mozang, situate on Jail Road, which I have sold to you for the sum of Rs. 1,000 and in respect of which I have already received the purchase-money from you:"

Held, (1) that the document was a mere letter reciting an earlier sale and an earlier receipt of the consideration for that sale; [p. 262, col. 1.]

(2) that at most it was a receipt for the consideration money and an admission of the sale, but was not in itself the instrument of sale or conveyance; [p. 262, col. 1.]

(3) that had for the words "which I have sold" the words "which I hereby sell" been substituted, the document would have been an instrument of sale; [p. 262, col. 1.]

(4) that therefore the document was not a conveyance and was not liable to stamp duty. [p. 262, col. 1.]

Case referred under section 57 of the Indian Stamp Act (II of 1899) by the Financial Commissioners, Punjab, with their Letter No. 3289, dated the 28th April 1915, for the orders of the Chief Court of the Punjab.

Mr. K. J. Rustomji, for the Petitioner.

JUDGMENT.—In reference under the Indian Stamp Act, section 57, we are asked to decide whether the document "A", which is in the form of a letter, is a "conveyance" within the meaning of section 2 (10) of the Indian Stamp Act. The document runs as follows:—

MADAM AND SIRS,

I am enclosing herewith the original sale-deed, dated 22nd October 1904, in respect of the land measuring 38 kanals, 18 marlas, Khasra No. 3388, in Mauza Mozang situate on Jail Road, Lahore, which I have sold to you for the sum of Rs. 1,000 and in respect of which I have already received the purchase-money from you.

Yours faithfully,
J. RUSTOMJI.

"Conveyance" is defined in Wharton's Law Lexicon as 'an instrument which transfers property from one person to another."

Section 2 (10) of the Indian Stamp Act attempts no precise definition of the term, but provides that the term shall include every instrument by which property moveable and immoveable, is transferred inter vivos. Applying these tests to the document under consideration, we are quite unable to hold that it is a conveyance.

The Stamp Act is a fiscal Act and must be rigorously construed in favour of the public, whenever any ambiguity arises.

The document is a mere letter, reciting an earlier sale and an earlier receipt of the consideration money for that sale.

It is at most a receipt for the consideration money and an admission of the sale, but it is not in itself the instrument of sale or conveyance.

Had for the words "which I have sold" the words "which I hereby sell" been substituted, the document would have been the instrument of sale.

In its present condition, the document A, we hold, is not a "conveyance", and is not liable to be charged with stamp duty as a "conveyance."

Reference disposed of.

Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act (VI of 1908), s. 139 (5) —Wrongful dispossession of tenant—Suit to recover possession in Civil Court, whether maintainable—Jurisdiction—Evidence—Inadmissible evidence admitted at request of parties, whether can be objected to in appeal —Interpretation of Statutes—Retention of old provision, effect of.

Where a tenant has been wrongfully dispossessed of his holding, he may bring a suit for possession of the land in the Civil Courts. Section 139 (5) of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act is no bar to such a suit. The word 'application' in the section does not include suits. [p. 264, col. 1.]

Where the parties themselves request either that certain evidence which is not in itself admissible as evidence, if objections are taken, should be considered by the Court or where they request that the Judge should himself put questions to witnesses, it does not lie in the mouth of either party, who asks that that course should be taken, afterwards to question it in appeal. [p. 263, col. 1.]

In construing a Statute the Court is entitled to look at the course of legislation up to the date of the Statute, and if the words of a previous Statute are re-enacted it may be assumed that it was intended that the law should be continued as it previously existed. Appeal from a decision of the Subordinate Judge, Ranchi, dated the 1st March 1916.

Mr. Atul Krishna Ray, for the Appellant.

Messrs. S. N. Palit and U. C. Laha, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

MILLER, C. J.—In this case defendant No. 1 appeals from a decision of the Subordinate Judge of Ranchi and he contends that the decision ought to be set aside on two grounds. The first is that the Court had no jurisdiction to try the case, although neither before the Munsif nor before the lower Court of Appeal was any such objection taken. The second ground upon which he asks us to allow this appeal is that the learned Munsif who tried the case originally went himself and inspected the locality concerning which the dispute took place and although it is not contended that he had no power to go and make an inspection of the locality, it is contended that in the course of that inspection the Munsif took evidence by asking questions from an old man called Chilgu and based his decision entirely or at all events largely upon the evidence so obtained. The facts of the case quite shortly appear to be these:—

The plaintiff many years ago, about the year 1901 I think it is, settled upon certain waste lands described in the survey as plot No. 613 in Mauza Saheda with the intention of converting them into his korkar. No objection was apparently taken by the malik at that time nor indeed for many years afterwards and, therefore, he contends that no objection having been taken for two years he is entitled to occupancy rights in respect of that land, he having a few years ago converted it into cultivable land. The original malik appears to have died and was succeeded by defendant No. 2. In the year 1908 a Survey and Settlement took place in which the lands in question were entered in the Record of Rights as the ghair mazrooah khas of the malik and no objection was apparently taken to that by the plaintiff. The reason given in the judgment of the Court below for the plaintiff taking no objection is that at that time the land had not been entirely brought under cultivation and the plaintiff did not think that it was necessary that he should assert his rights at that time or that he was entitled to get his name entered in the survey record as having any right or title to the land. Then according to the plaintiff he grew crops on the land and shortly before this suit was instituted in 1915. Defendant No. 1, who claimed to have taken settlement from the present malik defendant No. 2, appears to have destroyed the crops and disputed the plaintiff's right or title to any occupancy at all. The Munsif at the trial having heard evidence upon the application of the plaintiff made a personal inspection of the land in question with a view to ascertaining how far the plaintiff's evidence was accurate, to the effect that he had erected bunds on the land and had carried out other works with a view to reducing the land to a state fit for cultivation. During the course of that inspection according to the Munsif's report of what took place, it appears that both parties asked the Munsif to question this old man Chilgu who was either the headman of the village or one of the oldest inhabitants, and from the evidence given by Chilgu the learned Munsif was confirmed in the impression, which he seems from his judgment to have arrived at apart from this evidence, that the plaintiff had erected a bund or embank ment whereby the land in this plot No. 613 was materially assisted in being redeemed to a state of cultivation. Now where the parties themselves request either that certain evidence, which is not in itself admissible as evidence if objections are taken, should be considered by the Court or where they request that the Judge should himself put questions to witnesses, I cannot see that it lies in the mouth of either of the parties, who ask that that course should be taken, afterwards to question it on appeal if it should turn out that the result of the evidence is against them, and therefore in my opinion this part of the appeal must fail.

The next objection which is taken is that this being a suit to recover possession the Court, that is to say, the Court of the Munsif in which the suit was originally brought, had no jurisdiction to try it because under the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act of 1908 which applies to suits with respect to the land in question it is provided in section 71 that if any tenant is ejected from his tenancy or from any portion thereof in contravention of section 68, he may within a period of one year from the date of such ejectment present to the Deputy Commissioner an application praying to be replaced in possession of such tenancy or portion; and the Deputy Commissioner may, if he thinks fit, after making a summary enquiry replace him in possession in the manner described in section 68. That section says that no tenant shall be ejected from his tenancy or any portion thereof except in execution of a decree, or in execution of an order of the Deputy Commissioner passed under this Act. Then section 139 of the same Act provides as follows: "The following suits and applications shall be cognizable by the Deputy Commissioner, and shall be instituted and tried or heard under the provisions of this Act, and shall not be cognizable in any other Court, except as otherwise provided in this Act, namely," and then follow eight different classes of suits or applications which it is said shall be tried only by the Deupty Commissioner. No. 5 is "All applications to recover the occupancy or possession of any land from which a tenant has been unlawfully ejected by the landlord or any person claiming under or through the landlord." It is said that sub-section 5 applies to the present case and therefore the suit is barred, because it could only be tried under that sub-section by the Deputy Commissioner. Reliance was placed upon the earlier legislation, both the Act of 1859, section 23 (6) and the Chota Nagpur Procedure Act of 1879, section 37, clause 6, in which suits of this nature were only cognizable by the Deputy Commissioner and it is said that there is no difference between the word suits and the word applications used in section 139 of the present Act and that it was intended merely to re-enact the law as it previously existed. In construing a Statute I think one is certainly entitled to look and see the course of legislation up to that time and if the words of the previous Statute are re-enacted, it may be assume that it was intended that the law should be continued as it previously existed. But in the present case section 139 of the Act of 1908 seems to my mind clearly to draw a distinction between suits and applications and the reasons seem to me to be clear. The word application in the section merely refers to certain summary procedure, at all events in sub-section 5 which provides that in case where tenants are ejected they may at once and without the delay and expense of bringing a suit be—if they make out their case—put in possession of the disputed property. But having regard to the fact that the word suits is also used in many of the sub-sections in the same section, I cannot believe that it was intended in the present Act that not only applications such as those I have described should be confined to the Deputy Commissioner's Court alone but also suits which claimed not only to be put in possession but also included claims for declarations and matters of that sort. In the present case it is noticeable that not only did the plaintiff seek the relief of being put in possession of the disputed land, but he sought a decree adjudicating upon his korkar rights and claimed also any other reliefs to which he was entitled in the opinion of the Court. In any case I do not think that section 139, sub-section 5, of the Act in question was intended to bar a suit being brought in some other Court besides that of the Deputy Commissioner. The matter has already been the subject of judicial decision in a case which came before the High Court of Calcutta in 1910 and the judgment of Woodroffe and Carnduff, JJ., appears in Khetra Nath v. Paru Beuri (1). Both these learned Judges were agreed that the word application in the section under consideration did not include and was not meant to include suits such as that which has been brought in the present case. I think on both grounds this appeal must fail and must be dismissed with costs. The costs, which the respondents have to pay in respect of their unsuccessful application for security, will be set off against the costs they recover in the appeal. We assess the appellant's costs of that application at one gold mohur.

MULLICK, J.—I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Negotiable Instruments Act (XXVI of 1881), s. 56—Promissory note, transfer of balance due upon, validity of.

The object of section 56 of the Negotiable Instruments Act is simply to prevent a promissory note from being transferred for a portion only of the sum at the time due upon it. It has no application to the transfer of the whole of the balance due upon a promissory note.

Petition, under section 25 of Act IX of 1887, for revision of the decree of the Judge, Small Cause Court, Lahore, dated the 12th August 1915, decreeing the claim.

Kanwar Dalip Singh, for the Petitioner.

Mr. Lal Chand Mehra, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—In this case the lower Court has stated the facts. It has held that at the time when the promissory note in suit was endorsed in favour of plaintiff, defendant No. 1 did, as a matter of fact, owe Rs. 315-2-0, and it finally absolved defendants Nos. 2 and 3 from liability and gave a decree against defendant No. 1 alone The grounds for revision seemed to me to require argument and consideration, and I have now heard arguments. It is urged on behalf of the defendant-petitioner that, under section 56 of the Negotiable Instruments Act, such a promissary note as this could not be endorsed over to the plaintiff or to any one. This I think is incorrect. This is not a case in which a portion only of what is due is endorsed over or transferred. Plaintff freely admits that out of Rs. 1,000 of the promissory note only Rs. 313-2-0 remained due. Plaintiff does not propose to make a separate claim for the remaining Rs. 686-14-0, but takes that as wiped out. The object of section 56 is simply to prevent a promissory note from being transferred for a portion only of the sum at the time due upon it. Nothing of the kind happened here. There does not appear to be any ground for revision and I dismiss the petition.

Article 11 of Schedule I of the Limitation Act applies in a case where a person sues to establish his right to property in respect of which a claim preferred by him under Order XXI, rule 58, Civil Procedure Code, has been dismissed for default and without investigation. [p. 266, col. 1.]

The language of Article 11 of Schedule I of the Limitation Act of 1908 is more comprehensive than the language of the preceding Acts and the applicability of the Article cannot be restricted to those cases only in which the claim preferred under Order XXI, rule 58, Civil Procedure Code, has been disallowed after an investigation. JUDGMENT.

RICHARDSON, J.—The only question to which we need address ourselves in this appeal is the question of limitation. In the course of certain execution proceedings the property now in dispute was attached. The present plaintiff preferred a claim to the property under Order XXI, rule 58, Code of Civil Procedure. The claim was rejected and he brought this suit to establish his title to the property and for consequential reliefs. It is not disputed that if the order made in the execution proceedings rejecting the claim was an order within the scope of Order XXI, rule 63, the present suit is a suit of the nature contemplated by that rule and is governed as to limitation by Article 11 of the Limitation Act of 1908. The period of limitation prescribed in such a suit is one year from the date of the adverse order in the claim case. Here the suit was instituted more than a year after the claim was rejected. The defendant No. 1 pleaded, therefore, that the suit was out of time. The contention put forward on the plaintiff's behalf is that the claim having been rejected for default and without investigation, the order of rejection was not an order within Order XXI, rule 63, and Article 11 had no application. The contention proved successful in the Courts below and the appeal before us has been preferred by this defendant No. 1. Now, it may be useful to cite in this connection the language used by Lord Hobhouse in delivering the judgment of the Privy Council in the case of Sardhari Lal v. Ambika Pershad (1). Lord Hobhouse said:—"The order", that is, the order in the claim case to which he was referring, "was made and it was an order within the jurisdiction of the Court that made it. It is not conclusive; a suit may be brought to claim the property, notwithstanding the order; but then the law of limitation says that the plaintiff must be prompt in bringing his suit. The policy of the Act evidently is to secure the speedy settlement of question of title raised at execution sales and for that reason a year is fixed as the time within which the suit must be brought."

If that was the policy of the law under the Civil Procedure Code of 1877 and the Limitation Act of the same year, it is still more emphatically the policy of the law under the present Civil Procedure Code and the present Limitation Act.

On the plaintiff's behalf reliance has been placed on decisions of this Court under Article 11 of the Limitation Act of 1877, but those decisions are no longer of authority because the language of Article 11 has been altered in the Act of 1908. The change made follows the change made in section

(1) 15 I. A. 123; 15 C. 521; 5 Sar. P. C. J. 172; 12 Ind. Jur. 210; 7 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 931.

283 of the Code of 1882 now represented by rule 63 of Order XXI. Section 283 ran as follows:—"The party against whom an order under section 280, 281 or 282 is passed may institute a suit to establish the right which he claims to the property in dispute." Rule 63 on the other hand says that where a claim or an objection is preferred, the party against whom an order is made may institute a suit to establish the right which he claims to the property in dispute. The specific reference to the previous sections or rules has been omitted. A corresponding change has been made in Article 11. The ground, therefore, on which the cases under the previous Limitation Act and the previous Code were decided, that the section specifically referred to in Article 11 and section 283 of the Code required some investigation to be made, is gone. Rule 63 of the present Civil Procedure Code and Article 11 of the present Limitation Act are quite general in their terms. All that is now necessary is that a claim should be preferred under rule 58 and that there should be an order either allowing or rejecting it. The party against whom the order is made may then bring a suit in the language of rule 63 "to establish the right which he claims to the property in dispute" or in the language of Article 11 "to establish the right which he claims to the property comprised in the order", and the suit must be brought within the year allowed by Article 11.

The Courts below have plainly erred in applying the old cases to the present law. Even under the Limitation Act of 1877 there was some difference of opinion on the question whether an order rejecting a claim made without investigation came within Artice 11 or not. In the case of Jugal Kishore Marwari v. Bejoy Krishna Mukherjee (2) Mookerjee and Beachcroft, JJ., observed in their judgment that though there might be some divergence of judicial opinion there was weighty authority in support of the view that where an application had been dismissed with or without investigation a regular suit, if instituted, must be commenced within one year from the date of such order; and the learned Judges cited reported cases in support of that observation.

(2) 15 Ind. Cas. 683; 16 C. W. N. 882.

The case of Umacharan Bhattacharjee v. Hironmoyee Debi (3) was decided in 1913, but the Article applied was Article 11 of the Limitation Act of 1877 and the case is of no assistance to the plaintiff. No doubt the learned Judges there held that Article 11 of the Act of 1877 was not applicable where there had been no investigation of the claim. But at the same time they referred to the change which had been made in the language of Article 11 by the Act of 1908 and remarked that the change might have altered the law.

The view we take is supported by the two decisions of the Madras High Court in Narasimha Chetti v. Vijiavala Nainar (4) and Ponnusami Pillai v. Samu Ammal (5), in which the learned Judges pointed out that the language of Article 11 of the Act of 1908 was more comprehensive than the language of the preceding Act and refused to restrict the Article to those cases in which an investigation had taken place.

The result is that this appeal must be allowed and the whole suit dismissed with costs, both here and in the Courts below. But the dismissal of the suit will be without prejudice to any right which the plaintiff may have as against the defendant No. 2.

JUDGMENT.—This judgment deals with Civil Appeals Nos. 2810 to 2814 of 1915. The plaintiffs in these cases alleged that their father had mortgaged certain properties to the defendants who, while the said mortgages subsisted, bought out a number of occupancy tenants. The plaintiffs redeemed the mortgages in 1908 by private arrangement, but the defendants had refused to give possession of the lands which had been subject to the occupancy tenancies alleging that they had not acquired those tenancies as mortgagees and were entitled to retain them for their own benefit. The plaintiffs, therefore, claimed possession of the said tenancies on payment of the sums for which they had been acquired.

In one of these cases, No. 294, Appeal No. 2814, there was a defence that the occupancy rights had been acquired before the date of the mortgage and the Munsif found that this was so, but he held further that the plaintiffs could not succeed in any case and dismissed all the suits.

The plaintiffs appealed to the District Judge who failed to touch the special question raised in the case of Suit No. 294, and accepting all the appeals granted decrees to the plaintiffs, though obviously Suit No. 294 should have been dismissed if the finding of the Munsif as to the date of acquisition was sustainable.

The defendants have now preferred second appeals to this Court.

It is first necessary to remark that the District Judge held that the acquisitions in suit were made by the mortgagees in their capacity as representatives of the mortgagor, but the finding is not founded on evidence, but rather on conjecture and on section 63 of the Transfer of Property Act. It has not been supported in this Court on the ground that purchase in a representative capacity was established on the merits.

It has been found as a fact by both Courts that the occupancy tenants in the village in which the lands in suit are situate have an unrestricted right of alienation. This finding is now attacked by Counsel for the respondents; but it is based upon an agreement in the wajib-ul-arz of the village and that agreement appears to be one which could be enforced under section 111 of the Tenancy Act, despite the provisions of section 56 of the same Act. The finding, therefore, contravenes no provision of law and it is one which must be accepted.

It follows, therefore, that the defendants, even if they had not been mortgagees, could have acquired the occupancy tenancies in dispute.

These being the facts, Counsel for the defendant-appellants has argued that as the tenancies were not necessarily acquired by them qua mortgagees but could have been acquired in another capacity, they ought not to be regarded as accessions which the mortgagors can claim. For this proposition he has cited a ruling, referred to as Bal Krishen Seth v. Nandu (1) in Sanjiva Row's Lawyers' Reference at page 321, in which it appears to have been laid down that it is competent to a mortgagee during the continuance of the mortgage to purchase an absolute occupancy tenure for himself and to treat it as his separate property after the mortgage comes to an end. Though I have not been able to obtain any report of that judgment it appears to have been based on Raja Kishendatt Ram v. Raja Mumtaz Ali Khan (2), on which Counsel also relies. In that ruling their Lordships observed that they were not prepared to affirm the broad proposition that every purchase by a mortgagee of a sub-tenure existing at the date of the mortgage must be taken to have been made for the benefit of the mortgagor so as to enhance the value of the mortgaged property and to make the whole including the sub-tenure subject to the right of redemption upon equitable terms: and they gave as an instance a case in which a mortgagee could not be said to have derived from his mortgagor any peculiar means or facilities for making the purchase which would not be possessed by a stranger and might, therefore, be held entitled equally with the stranger to make it for his own benefit. In the particular case before them, however, they held that although the mortgagee might have kept alive certain birt tenures which he had acquired, he did not do so but treated them as merged in the mortgaged taluk.

This ruling was delivered before the enactment of the Transfer of Property Act, IV of 1882. In Ram Brich Narayan Singh v. Ambika Prosad Singh (3), following section 63 of that Act, it was held that where the mortgagees during the continuance of a mortgage had bought in some of the raiyati holdings, of the mahal from the enants, the mortgagor was entitled to treat the purchases as accessions to the mortgaged property within the meaning of section 63 and that the rights of the mortgagee did not depend upon whether he had any special advantage by reason of his position as mortgagee in acquiring the accession. Raja Kishendatt Ram v. Raja Mumtaz Ali Khan (2) was considered, but it was held that the law as to accession to the mortgaged property is now formulated in section 63 of the Transfer of Property Act.

Counsel for the appellants has not contended that the decision arrived at in Ram Brich Narayan Singh v. Ambika Prosad Singh (3) was incorrect, but he has urged that it is of no application to the present case because the Transfer of Property Act is not in force in the Punjab; that in this Province we ought, therefore, to fall back upon the principle laid down in Raja Kishendatt Ram v. Raja Mumtaz Ali Khan (2) and that it should, therefore, be held that as the mortgagees could have acquired as strangers and there is nothing to show that they intended that the occupancy tenancies should merge in the proprietary holdings, they are entitled to retain the tenancies for themselves.

Counsel for the respondents, on the other hand, has argued that Raja Kishendátt Ram v. Raja Mumtaz Ali Khan (2) is out of date and that as it has been frequently held by this Court that the principles embodied in the Transfer of Property Act should be followed, section 63 of that Act should be applied in the present case. If it is applied, and if Ram Brich Narayan Singh v. Ambika Prosad Singh (3) is good law, then all the plaintiff's suits must succeed, except perhaps No. 294.

It appears to me, however, that the argument for the appellants must prevail. It cannot be said that section 63 of the Transfer of Property Act expounds any broad principle. As was observed even in Ram Brich Narayan Singh v. Ambika Prosad Singh (3), it goes further than section 90 of the Indian Trusts Act and there is no reason in equity why a mortgagee who has acquired what any stranger, or even the mortgagor himself, could have acquired equally well despite the mortgage, should be compelled to hand over his rights to the mortgagor.

Raja Kishendatt Ram v. Raja Mumtaz Ali Khan (2), on the other hand, does profess to lay down broad principles of equity and good conscience, and it is on those principles that the Courts of this Province, in the absence of any legislative enactment, are bound under section 6 of the Punjab Laws Act, Act IV of 1872, to base their decisions.

It appears to me to be clear that according to the principles expounded in the judgment of the Privy Council the defendants in these cases are entitled to retain the benefit of their acquisitions for themselves.

Accordingly I allow all the appeals and dismiss the suits, but as the point is a novel one and the defendants set up various

METHARAM RAMRAKHIOMAL AND OTHERS — APPELLANTS

versus

REWACHAND RAMRAKHIOMAL AND OTHERS—RESPONDENTS.

Hindu Law—Joint family—Self-acquired property—Gains obtained from education received at expense of joint family, whether partible—"Science acquired at the expense of ancestral wealth"—Special and general education—Question of fact.

The rule laid down by the Mitakshara that "what is earned by science acquired at the expense of ancestral wealth must be shared with the whole of the brethren and with the father" does not apply to gains which are the result, not of the education received at the expense of the joint family but of the peculiar skill, mental abilities and individual effort in applying and improving such education exercised by the person educated at the expense of the joint family. There is no authority in the Mitakshara for the contention that gains made personally and without the aid of joint funds by a member of a joint family, who received an ordinary education suitable to his position as a member of the family to which he belonged, should in law be regarded as partible and not as his self-acquired property. [p. 277, col. 1.]

The question whether a member of a joint family who carries on a personal business without detriment to the joint funds carries it on for his own benefit or for the benefit of the family is a question of fact to be determined on the evidence. [p. 277, col. 1.]

Appeal from a decree of the Court of the Judicial Commissioner, Sind (Hayward J. C., and Leggatt, A. J. C.), dated the 24th June 1910, reported as 8 Ind. Cas. 930, confirming that of a single Judge of the Court exercising jurisdiction as the District Court, Karachi.

FACTS.—The facts of the case are sufficiently set out in their Lordships' judgment. The suit was brought by appellants for a declaration that property which one Shewaram purported to devise as self-acquired was the joint property of a Hindu joint family to which he and they belonged and that his Will passed no title to it. Both the lower Courts held that the property in question was self-acquired. Leave to appeal to the Privy Council was granted on the ground that the appeal involved a substantial question of law, which had been expressly left open by the Board in Pauliem Valoo Chetty v. Pauliem Sooryah Chetty (1), viz., whether a mere general education such as Shewaram received was sufficient according to Hindu Law to constitute his earnings joint family property.

Messrs. P. O. Lawrence, K. C. and E. B. Raikes, for the Appellants.

Messrs. L. DeGruyther, K. C., and G. C. O'Gorman, for the Respondents.

P. O. Lawrence, K. C., for the Appellants — I put first the broad proposition that a general education imparted at the expense of the family makes the "gains of learning" of the person who receives it partible. The Mitakshara, Chapter I, section IV, clauses 1—11 (Colebrooke's edition, pages 25—28) deals with effects not liable to partition. Clause 1 lays down the general rule that anything acquired by a man himself without detriment to the father's estate does not appertain to the co-heirs. This general rule runs throughout the section: the gains of science are separate only if the science is acquired without use of the father's goods (clause 6). The vernacular of science is vidya: science then meant knowledge of the Vedas, the only knowledge of those times: it is equivalent to education. The illustration given in clause 8 is that of science acquired when receiving a foreign maintenance: gains derived from such science are not participable. Science there means any knowledge gained at the family expense, even reading and writing.

[SIR W. PHILLIMORE.—Or do you mean any knowledge or training which is exceptional for his position?]

No. I would put it as any knowledge which has to be paid for.

To the same effect as the Mitakshara is the Mayukha, Chapter IV, section VII, paragraphs 2, 4.

[SIR LAWRENCE JENKINS.—Does the Mayukha apply in Sind?]

(1) 4 I. A. 100; 1 M. 252; 1 Ind. Jur. 323; 3 Suth. P. C. J. 387; 3 Sar. P. C. J. 698; 1 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 167.

I am rather doubtful: but it merely follows the Mitakshara on this point. The authority of the Mayukha in Western India is discussed in Mayne's Hindu Law, paragraph 28 (page 29 of 8th edition).

[SIR LAWRENCE JENKINS.—I think its authority only extends to Bombay Island and Gujerat. Sind has nothing to do with Gujerat: it is a mere accident of administration that it is associated with Bombay.]

In some of the earlier judgments the Courts came to the conclusion that although science included general education, yet if a son blossomed out into a particular line, his gains from that would not be partible. The first case of importance was Chalakonda Alasani v. Chalakonda Ratnachalam (2), which laid down that the gains of science were indivisible only when the science was imparted at the expense of persons not members of the learner's family.

It was the case of a dancing girl specially educated at the expense of the joint family for her trade. The District Judge, Mr. Collett, in an elaborate judgment, came to the conclusion, on the Sanskrit authorities, that the gains of the dancing girl were impartible: but his judgment was reversed by the Madras High Court (Phillips and Holloway, JJ.) who held that the gains of science imparted at the family expense are joint property.

[LORD BUCKMASTER.—The only point of the judgment is where they say they are bound by authority. The rest is mere uncertain discussion of texts.]

Holloway, J., at page 78 seems to distinguish between ordinary and extraordinary gains.

In Dhunookdharee Lall v. Gunput Lall (3) the Calcutta High Court took a contrary view to Madras, and held that the fact of defendant having been educated at the expense of the joint family did not necessarily make his gains acquired by the aid of such education joint: but the facts of the case do not appear from either of the reports.

In Bai Manchha v. Narotamdas Kashidas (4) the Bombay High Court followed the Madras decision.

(3) 10 W. R. 122; 11 B. L. R. 201 note.
(4) 6 B. H. C. R A. C. J. 1.

A later decision in Madras to the same effect was Durvasula Gangadharudu v. Durvasula Narasammah (5), where it was held that the professional gains of a Vakil who had received a general education at the family expense were joint.

[SIR JOHN EDGE.—The education required for a High Court Vakil must have been less in those days. A High Court Vakil now-a-days requires a very special education, more than is generally understood—more I think than is needed to be called to the Bar.]

Then came the judgment of this Board in Pauliem Valoo Chetty v. Pauliem Sooryah Chetty (1), where the point was discussed but explicitly left open, and since then there seems to have been a reluctance on the part of the Judges in India to follow the earlier decisions, which I submit are right and would ordinarily be binding. There have been four cases since: Boologam v. Swornam (6), Lakshman Mayaram v. Jamnabai (7), where for the first time a distinction is drawn between special and general education, Krishnaji Mahadev v. Moro Mahadev (8) and Lachmin Kuar v. Debi Prasad (9).

I submit that all these four later cases were wrongly decided and that the proper interpretation of the article of the Mitakshara laid down in the earlier decisions has not been adhered to. My submission is that the true meaning of "science" is that given to it by the Courts before the Privy Council decision—that it is equivalent to ordinary knowledge.

[SIR W. PHILLIMORE.—May not the test be whether there has been any plus education—more spent on one boy than on another?]

In 1891 a Bill was brought forward to make the gains of education impartible but it created so much sensation that Government dropped it. The state of the law which that Bill was designed to alter is the state of the law for which I contend.

Counsel further submitted on the facts that even if the property in suit were originally separate, there was an agreement by Shewaram to throw all his funds into the joint purse.

Mr. Raikes followed.—Under the Mitakshara maintenance plus any education would be a detriment to the family purse. The decisions which take the other view have come about partly through the Board's observations in Pauliem Valoo Chetty v. Pauliem Sooryah Chetty (1) and partly through Mayne's observations based on the Dayabhaga. Till 1877 the decisions were unanimous in my favour: then came this Board's judgment in Pauliem Valoo Chetty v. Pauliem Sooryah Chetty (1) and in 1878 the first edition of Mayne's Hindu Law appeared. Mayne deals with the matter in paragraph No. 283. The view he there propounds, so far as it deals with the construction of Mitakshara, I, 4, 8, is an innovation introduced from the Dayabhaga: it has no proper place in the Western School of Law. Mayne's observations are cited and misunderstood in Lakshman Mayaram v. Jamnabai (7).

Secondly, this is not a case where the learner received only the same education as the rest of the family. He had a better education than his elder brother: nor is it material that his younger brothers received the same education as himself.

When the education was given none of these cases except Bai Manchha v. Narotamdas Kashidas (4) had been decided. Shewaram and Metharam may have been doubtful as to the legal position; the arrangement between them, even if invalid as a contract for want of consideration, may have been good as compromise. Till 1888 Shewaram never asserted self-acquisition.

[The Board intimated that they did not desire to hear arguments for respondents, but would be obliged if respondents' Counsel could refer them to any other authorities.]

Mr. DeGruyther, K.C., for the Respondents, referred to Sir Thomas Strange's Hindu Law. Although the Mitakshara is in terms a commentary, yet as regards the people to whom it applies it is the law and you start from it. The texts on which the question depends are cited in Mr. Collett's judgment in Chalakonda Alasani v. Chalakonda Ratnachalam (2). In Manu IX, Slokas 206, 208, there quoted, "without using the patrimony" means without using the family property in the actual exercise of your profession. So in Mitakshara, Chapter I, section 4, paragraphs Nos. 10, 11, "to the detriment of the family estate" is equivalent to the "without using the patrimony." This is made very clear in Strange's Hindu Law, at page 213: "the essence of the exclusion consists in its having been made by the sole agency of the individual, without employing for the purpose what belongs in common to the family."

[SIR W. PHILLIMORE.—Your argument would go to destroy all those cases about special education.]

That is not necessary for the decision of this case.

Strange goes on to lay down (at page 215) that the acquisition vests in the family only if the common fund has been directly instrumental: the emphasis is on the direct. He has given as his authority certain passages in the Dayabhaga, but on the general question whether property is joint or self-acquired there is no distinction between the two.

[SIR W. PHILLIMORE.—But you say the Mitakshara is the law and we have to construe that.]

You have to decide what is meant by "science" and "to the detriment of the family," and in construing those words it is legitimate to refer to another work of great authority. Those passages of the Mitakshara have also been translated by Sir W. Jones: he translates as "learning" what Colebrooke renders as "science".

Mr. P. O. Lawrence referred to Durga Dutt Joshi v. Ganesh Dutt Joshi (10).

JUDGMENT.

SIR JOHN EDGE.—This is an appeal from a decree, dated the 24th June 1910*, of the Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Sind, which confirmed a decree, dated the 3rd April 1908, of a single Judge of that Court exercising jurisdiction as the District Court of Karachi.

The suit in which this appeal has arisen was brought in the Court of the District of Karachi on the 26th May 1905 by the appellants here to obtain a declaration that the property which one Shewaram purported to devise by his Will and a codicil was the joint family property of Shewaram, the plaintiffs and some of the defendants, and that the Will and codicil were inoperative to pass any title to the property. Other reliefs were claimed, to which it is not necessary to refer. The executors of the Will were amongst the defendants to the suit.

(10) 5 Ind. Cas. 400; 32 A. 305; 7 A. L. J. 216.

Shewaram died on the 27th May 1899. He had been and was at the time of his death a member of a joint Hindu family, which was governed by the law of the Mitakshara. The plaintiffs were members of the same joint family. The question in the suit was whether the property of which Shewaram purported by his Will and codicil to dispose was property of the joint family or was property self-acquired by Shewaram which had not been thrown by him into the joint stock of the family property.

The plaintiffs, Metharam, Shewaram, and the defendants, Rewachand and Hermandas, were sons of one Seth Ramrakhiomal Jethanand, and they and others, parties to this suit, constituted a joint Hindu family. The family business was that of money lending, and was carried on at Karachi, Seth Ramrakhiomal being, until his death in 1884, the manager. On his death the money-lending business of the family was continued, and was carried on under the management of the plaintiff Metharam, who was the eldest son. Shewaram, who was the second son, was born in or about 1847. He was educated at the expense of the joint family at the Government School at Karachi, which in the evidence is referred to as a High School. At that school Shewaram learned to speak and to write English. When he was 22 years old he became a Pleader's clerk. He continued to be a Pleader's clerk until 1878, when he entered the employment of Messrs. Volkart Brothers. He was subsequently in the employment of Messrs. Rose and Co., and in October 1881 he entered the employment of the firm of Charles Forbes and Co., as their head broker. With the latter firm he continued until he died in 1899. It may be assumed that the knowledge of English which Shewaram acquired at the Government School was of use to him as a Pleader's clerk and in the other employments in which he was subsequently engaged. From the savings out of his salaries and brokerage, and from the profits which he derived from a money-lending business which he personally carried on, he acquired a fortune of about 2 lakhs and 50,000 rupees, which is represented by the property of which he purported to dispose by his Will and codicil. The money-lending business which Shewaram personally carried on was started by him with capital derived from the savings out of his salary as a Pleader's clerk, and without the aid of the joint fund.

In the plaint it was in effect alleged that the property of which Shewaram purported by his Will and codicil to dispose had been acquired by him as a member of the joint family, and was joint family property of which he could not dispose by Will, and alternatively that Shewaram had thrown his self-acquired property into the common stock with the intention that it should be treated as joint and not self-acquired property. In the written statements of the executors it was alleged that the property of which Shewaram had by his Will and codicil disposed was his self-acquired property, and it was denied that Shewaram had thrown his self-acquired property into the common stock of the family. The learned Trial Judge fixed the following amongst other issues which are now immaterial:—

"2. Did Shewaram acquire the property in suit with the assistance of joint family funds?

"3. If not, did Shewaram join the property to the common ancestral property?"

Those issues were agreed to by the parties. No issue was suggested or fixed as to the education which Shewaram had obtained, nor was it contended before the Trial Judge that the property in question had been acquired by Shewaram by means of any special or other education. The Trial Judge, having stated in his judgment that the evidence in the case "covers nearly every year of Shewaram's active life, and details every incident from which an inference can be extorted that Shewaram's property was the property of the family," considered the evidence fully and in detail, and found the second and third issues in the negative, and dismissed the suit. The plaintiffs appealed to the Court of the Commissioner, and in their grounds of appeal did not suggest that the education which Shewaram had received at the expense of the joint family had been such as to entitle the joint family to the gains made by him as a Pleader's clerk or in his subsequent employments, or as a money-lender. When, however, the appeal came on for hearing in the Court of the Commissioner the learned Counsel who appeared for the plaintiff-appellant contended, amongst other things, that it had been proved that Shewaram had obtained the posts from which he had derived his salary and brokerage through the general education which he had received from the joint family funds.

There is no evidence on the record to show what was the nature of the education which Shewaram received at the school at Karachi. Had the plaintiffs been in a position to prove that his education had been of an exceptionally high standard and more expensive than the education which ordinarily would be provided for a member of such a family as he belonged to, they could have raised an issue on that subject and have called evidence in support of it. The learned Judges who heard the appeal considered that the English education received at the Government School at Karachi could not be regarded, for a well-to do family, as more than a general education, and certainly was not a special education comparable with special training for the Bar or the Civil Service, and they concurred with all the material findings of fact of the Trial Judge, and by their decree dismissed the appeal. From that decree this appeal has been brought.

In this appeal it has been contended on behalf of the plaintiffs that in arriving at their findings on the second and third issues the Courts below have misconstrued a document in writing. The document referred to was a letter which was written by Shewaram to his brother Metharam, and was as follows:—

"My Dear Brother,

"I am ready to join my property with the family property, and take my share from it.

"SHEWARAM.

"Dated 1st October, 1888."

The Trial Judge construed that letter as a conditional offer. "If you will come to partition I shall join my fund to yours;" implying: "If you don't come to partition, I shall not join them."

The plaintiffs endeavoured to prove by oral evidence that Metharam had asked Shewaram for a chit showing that the joint family fund and Shewaram's self-acquired fund were liable to be partitioned as a joint family fund, and that thereupon Shewaram wrote the letter of the 1st October 1888. That story rested solely on the evidence of Metharam and Rewachand, and the Trial Judge entirely disbelieved it. The Judges who heard the appeal construed the letter as an offer made by Shewaram during negotiations for partition, and found that the offer was never accepted. The Courts below rightly construed the letter. In their Lordships' opinion, Shewaram's letter affords strong evidence that on the 1st October 1888 his contention was that the property which he had acquired was his self-acquired property, and was not the property of the joint family. If Shewaram had, before the 1st October 1888 thrown his self-acquired property into the joint family fund there was no object in his writing the letter to Metharam, who was the manager for the joint family. In neither of the Courts below did the Judges misconstrue the letter of the 1st October 1888; and the plaintiffs are concluded, so far as conclusions of fact to be drawn from the evidence are concerned, by the concurrent findings of fact of those Courts that the property in suit was the self-acquired property of Shewaram, and that Shewaram did not join his self-acquired property to the joint family property.

It has, however, been contended on behalf of the plaintiffs that as Shewaram had received an education in English at the school at Karachi at the expense of the joint family, the property which he acquired must be attributed to that education, and must in law be held to be the joint property of the joint family. That contention depends upon the interpretation of texts of the Mitakshara, which are to be found in section 4, Chapter I. Section 4 deals with effects which are not liable to partition. Those texts of the Mitakshara translated by Mr. Colebrooke are as follows:—

"1. The author explains what may not be divided, whatever else is acquired by the co-parcener himself, without detriment to the father's estate, as a present from a friend, or a gift at nuptials, does not appertain to the co heirs. Nor shall he who recovers hereditary property, which had been taken away, give it up to the parceners; nor what has been gained by science.'"

"5. He need not give up to the co-heirs what has been gained by him through science, by reading the scriptures, or by expounding their meaning; the acquirer shall retain such gains.

"6. Here the phrase 'anything acquired by himself without detriment to the father's estate,' must be everywhere understood; and it is thus connected with each member of the sentence; what is obtained from a friend without detriment to the paternal estate; what is received in marriage, without waste of the patrimony; what is redeemed of the hereditary estate, without expenditure of ancestral property; what is gained by science, without use of the father's goods. Consequently, what is obtained from a friend, as the return of an obligation conferred at the charge of the patrimony; what is received at a marriage concluded in the form termed Asura or the like; what is recoverd of the hereditary estate by the expenditure of the father's goods; what is earned by science acquired at the expense of ancestral wealth; all that must be shared with the whole of the brethren and with the father."

The Sanscrit word which Mr. Colebrooke translated as "science" was translated by Sir William Jones as "learning."

The earliest case, to which their Lordships have been referred, decided in India on the meaning of those texts of the Mitakshara was Chalakonda Alasani v. Chalakonda Ratnachalam (2). That was decided by the High Court of Madras in 1864. It was a very peculiar case. The plaintiff and the two defendants were dancing girls and constituted a Hindu joint family. The first defendant was the plaintiff's adopted daughter, the second defendant was the plaintiff's natural daughter. The plaintiff brought the suit to obtain possession, as the manager of the joint family, of gold and silver jewels and other personal property which represented gains of the first defendant in her calling of a dancing girl, she also claimed certain household utensils and some other minor articles. The plaintiff had spent a considerable amount of money in educating the first defendant in singing and dancing.

Mr. Collett, who, as the Civil Judge of Vizagapatam, tried the suit, having in a learned judgment considered several Sanscrit texts as translated, including the texts of the Mitakshara, Manu, Yajnavalkya, Narada, and the Dayabhaga and the works of some modern writers on Hindu Law, said:—

"I am sure I am laying down an equitable rule, and I believe also the rule most consistent with the weight of authority. There is no doubt some conflict of opinion; but I think that the true position is that the mere fact of a Hindu having received a professional education at the expense of his family, as for instance from his father, does not render all his subsequent professional earnings liable to be divided with his brothers. I believe that on a due consideration of the authorities the rule of law is not really different in respect to property acquired by learning to what it is in respect to property acquired by agriculture or by trade. The test is the substantial use of joint property during and for the purpose of the acquisition, if there is none such, then the acquisition does not become joint property."

Mr. Collett made a decree in favour of the defendants with the exception of the house-utensils and some other minor articles. From that decree the plaintiff appealed to the High Court of Madras. Phillips and Holloway, JJ., in their judgment in the appeal, said:—

"We are constrained to say that we feel bound by authority to hold that the gains, at all events the ordinary gains, of learning and science which have been taught at the expense of the family funds, are not impartible. To render them so the science or learning must have been imparted by persons not members of the learner's family," and they allowed the appeal.

In Dhunookdharee Lall v. Gunput Lall (3) which was decided by the High Court of Bengal in 1868, the defendant proved that in acquiring the property, which was alleged to be joint property, he did not use any of the property which belonged to the joint family, and L. S. Jackson and Dwarkanath Mitter, JJ., in appeal dismissed the suit. Dwarkanath Mitter, J., added:—"His (the plaintiff's) case in the Court below was that the defendant received his education from the joint estate, and that he is consequently entitled to participate in every property that has been acquired by the defendant by the aid of such education. But this contention is nowhere sanctioned by the Hindu Law, and I see nothing in justice to recommend it."

In Bai Manchha v. Narotamdas Kashidas (4), which was decided by the High Court of Bombay in 1869, one Jamnadas, a deceased member of a joint Hindu family, had made money as a Vakil and as a money-lender, and it was held by Couch, C. J., and Newton, J., that the onus of proving that the property so acquired by Jamnadas was his self-acquired property was upon the party alleging that it had been self-acquired. These learned Judges approved of the judgment of the High Court of Madras in Chalakonda Alasani v. Chalakonda Ratnachalam (2).

In Durvasula Gangadharuda v. Durvasula Narasammah (5), which was decided by the High Court of Madras in 1872, it was proved that a Vakil had received from his father nothing more than a general education, and it does not appear that the Vakil was distinguished by his professional learning. Kindersley, J., considered that the fair presumption was that such attainments as the Vakil possessed had been acquired with the assistance of the family means, and that presumption not having been rebutted by evidence of the acquisition of such attainments without such assistance, he held that the professional earnings of the Vakil were subject to partition. The judgment of Kindersley, J., suggests that he considered that if the professional gains of the Vakil had not been merely the result of the general education which he had received at the expense of the joint family to which he belonged, but had been the result of much legal learning or skill, his professional gains would have been his self-acquired property. Holloway, J., entertained no doubt that the fund representing the professional earnings of the Vakil was partible, and expressed his full adherence to the judgment of the High Court of Madras in Chalakonda Alasani v. Chalakonda Ratnachalam (2), and especially to the statement in that case, that the ordinary gains of science by one who has received a family maintenance are certainly partible, and concluded his judgment by observing, "I do not believe, moreover, that within the meaning of the authorities the Vakil's business is matter of science at all." Apparently Holloway, J., regarded the learning in the law required by a Vakil of his day as inferior to the science necessary to her success in her line of life of an Indian dancing girl.

In Pauliem Valoo Chetty v. Pauliem Sooryah Chetty (1), which came before this Board in 1877, the Board on the evidence found that the son had not been educated by means of any joint fund of the family, but out of the separate estate of his father, over which the father had an absolute power of disposition. In that case the Mitakshara, Chapter, 1, sections 4, 6, 7 and 8, and the decisions in Chalakonda Alasani v. Chalakonda Ratnachalam (2), Dhunookdharee Lall v. Gunput Lall (3), Bai Manchha v. Narotam Das Kashidas (4) and Durvasula Gangadharudu v. Durvasula Narasammah (5) were referred to in argument before the Board, and their Lordships with reference to them observed—"It does not become necessary to consider whether the somewhat startling proposition of law put forward by the appellant, which, stated in plain terms, amounts to this: that if a member of a joint Hindu family receives any education whatever from the joint funds he becomes for ever after incapable of acquiring by his own skill and industry any separate property, is or is not maintainable. Very strong and clear authority would be required to support such a proposition. For the reasons that they have given, it does not appear to them necessary to review the text-books or the authorities which have been cited on this subject. It may be enough to say that according to their Lordships' view, no texts which have been cited go to the full extent of the proposition which has been contended for. It appears to them, further, that the case reported in the tenth volume of Sutherlands's 'Weekly Reporter,' in which a judgment was given by Mr. Justice Jackson and Mr. Justice Mitter, both very high authorities, lays down the law bearing upon this subject by no means so broadly as it is laid down in two cases which have been quoted as decided in Madras, the first being to the effect that a woman adopting a dancing girl and supplying her with some means of carrying on her profession was entitled to share in her gains; and the second, to the effect that the gains of a Vakil who has received no special education for his profession are to be shared in by the joint family of which he was a member; decisions which have been to a certain extent also acted upon in Bombay. It may hereafter possibly become necessary for this Board to consider whether or not the more limited and guarded expression of the law upon this subject of the Courts of Bengal is not more correct than what appears to be the doctrine of the Courts of Madras."

That intimation appears to have had its effect upon Courts in India.

In Boologam v. Swornam (6), which was decided in 1881, Innes and Kernan, JJ., on the evidence having found that the earnings of the dancing girls, who had received an ordinary education sufficient to fit them to earn a living as dancing girls, were acquired by them without detriment to the family estate and without any scientific acquirements which had been imparted by the aid of the family fund held that the earnings of the girls were their self-acquired property.

In Lakshman Mayaram v. Jamnabai (7), which was decided in 1882, Melvill and Kemball, JJ., who considered that the dictum of Mitter, J., in Dhunookdharee Lall v. Gunput Lall (3), that the Hindu Law nowhere sanctions the contention that acquisition of a member of a Hindu family who has received education is liable to partition, is not strictly accurate, held that when the Hindu texts "speak of the gains of science which has been imparted at the family expense, they intend the special branch of science which is the immediate source of the gains, and not the elementary education which is the stepping stone of all science," and consequently that the property which was acquired by a Subordinate Judge who had received a mere elementary education at the family expense, but had obtained in a lawyer's office and in the Sadar Adalat that knowledge of law and judicial practice which had qualified him for the post of a Judge, was his self-acquired property and was impartible.

In Krishnaji Mahadev v. Moro Mahadev (8), which was decided in 1890, Birdwood and Candy, JJ., held that the gains made as karkuns by two members of a joint Hindu family who had received only a rudimentary education at the expense of the joint family were their self acquired property.

In Lachmin Kuar v. Debi Prasad (9) Burkitt and Dillon, JJ., in 1897, approved of the decision in Krishnaji Mahadev v. Moro Mahadev (8) and following it held that the gains from employment in the Commissariat Department of a member of a joint Hindu family, who was not shown to have had any assistance from the joint family funds except his support in early years and the usual rudimentary education, were his self-acquired property.

With the exception of the cases to which they have referred, no case decided in India, or in which this Board has expressed an opinion on the question as to whether the gains of a member of a joint Hindu family, who had been educated at the expense of the joint family, are in law to be considered as his or her self-acquired property or as belonging to the joint family, has been brought to the attention of their Lordships.

Their Lordships will assume that the Sanscrit word used in the Mitakshara which Mr. Colebrooke translated as "science" means "learning." The latter apparently is the meaning of the word which has been generally accepted by the Courts in India. It gives the Sanscrit word a wider meaning than it would otherwise have. It would be difficult, if not impossible, to ascertain what could have been the science or sciences which the author of the Mitakshara, Vijnanesvara, who wrote his commentary in the latter part of the eleventh century, had in contemplation if he used a word which meant "science" strictly so called and is not susceptible of the wider and more comprehensive meaning "learning."

In construing the texts of the Mitakshara which their Lordships have quoted, it is necessary to bear in mind that education beyond that of a very elementary kind must have been limited to very few of the people for whose guidance the Mitakshara was written, and that for that limited few there could have been then no education attainable in the arts, sciences, and professions of that time comparable with the education now obtainable and necessary for a successful career in the arts, sciences, and professions of the present day. It may be assumed that the author of the Mitakshara, who was construing and explaining the more ancient texts of the Hindu Law for the benefit and guidance of the Hindu community, could not have intended to penalise an education which was not in his contemplation and of which necessarily he knew nothing. Nor can it be assumed that his intention was to penalise and discourage self-acquired skill, or the exercise of high mental abilities or great individual effort in winning success in an art, or science, or a profession. He must have been writing of education—learning—such as he knew it to be, and when he laid down that the gains obtained from an education received at the expense of a joint family should be partible, he could not have intended that such gains should include the gains which were the result, not of the education received at the expense of the joint family, but of the peculiar skill, mental abilities and individual effort in applying and improving such education exercised by the person who had been educated at the expense of the joint family. Their Lordships cannot find in the texts of the Mitakshara any authority for contention in this case that the gains made as a clerk, as a broker or as a money-lender personally and without the aid of the joint funds by a member of a joint family who received an ordinary education suitable to his position as a member of the family to which he belonged, should in law be regarded as partible and not as his self-acquired property. The question of whether a man who happening to be a member of a joint family carried on his business, whatever it was, personally for his own personal benefit without detriment to the joint family fund, or carried on such business as a member of the joint family, for the benefit of the point family, is a question of fact to be determined on the evidence. No inferences can be drawn from the fact that until Shewaram became a Pleader's clerk he was maintained by the joint family funds. As a member of the joint family he was entitled to be maintained at the expense of the joint family, and to receive an ordinary education suitable to a person of his position, as was any other member of the family.

Their Lordships are of opinion that this appeal fails and should be dismissed with costs, and they will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

Appeal dismissed.

WADHAWA SINGH AND OTHERS—PLAINTIFFS—APPELLANTS

BALWANT SINGH AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Punjab Land Revenue Act (XVII of 1887), s. 44—Mutation entries, effect of—Presumption—Burden of proof.

Where the parties were present at the time when certain mutation entries were made with their consent, and the Revenue Officers made every effort to ascertain what the parties wished to be done, the entries themselves being quite clear, the onus of proving that a mistake was made lies heavily upon the party who asserts that his intention was not correctly expressed by the entries, and this onus is not discharged by showing merely that there is a certain amount of confusion in the report of the patwari and that the area given by that party is considerably in excess of the area received by him. [p. 279, col. 1.]

Second appeal from the decree of the Divisional Judge, Lahore, dated the 14th and 16th February 1914, affirming that of the Subordinate Judge, 1st Class, Lahore, dated the 28th October 1911, dismissing the suit that defendant is not proprietor of 494 kanals, 13 marlas of land at Dhagana.

FACTS.—

WADHAWA SINGH v. BALWANT SINGH.

The parties owned land in two villages, Dhagana and Bhanu Chak.

In 1866 Mal Singh's issue (absentees from Dhagana) brought a suit against issue of Sewa Singh for possession of their share in the land at Dhagana. In 1868 the case was decided and some of the then plaintiffs got decree of their share on the condition of their making over to Sewa Singh's issue the latter's share of the land in Bhanu Chak. No reciprocity was effected and the decree remained a dead letter.

In the 1868 Settlement the Revenue Authorities recorded Mal Singh's issue as absentees and so issue of Baj Singh. Mal Singh's issue was shown as proprietor of ½ of Bahadar's land and Baj Singh proprietor of ¼th and Sewa Singh's issue was recorded as in its possession.

In the Settlement of 1892, the above state of affairs was repeated.

In 1905 according to the well-known Circular No. 2 of 1903, dated 3rd June 1903, (printed in Revenue Executive Part of Punjab Record, 1903, at page 8) names of issue of Mal Singh were removed from Dhagana Revenue papers. Sawan Singh, however, in the same year got a settlement with descendants of Sewa Singh. He gave ½ of the land in his possession at Bhanu Chak and received in return ½ of Bahadar's land at Dhagana and mutations in both the villages were accordingly effected.

In April 1909, some of the parties' land at Dhagana was acquired by the Government and Sawan Singh was allowed to receive ½ of its compensation according to the mutation entry.

On 7th October 1909, descendants of Sewa Singh sued Sawan Singh for declaring that the latter was not owner of 494 kanals and 13 marlas of land in Dhagana inasmuch as by mistake of the Revenue Authorities Sawan Singh was recorded as owner of ½ of Mal Singh's land at Dhagana of which they are the sole owners and are in its exclusive possession, and that Sawan Singh was really entitled to 1/8th of the whole holding and even that had been abandoned by Sawan Singh and his ancestors and, therefore, he is not entitled to any share in the land at Dhagana. The first Court held that Sawan Singh was entitled to ½ of Bahadar's land and that mutation was effected with the free consent of the plaintiffs who were also estopped from disputing the mutual settlement.

This decision of the first Court was confirmed by the lower Appellate Court.

The plaintiffs preferred a second appeal to the Chief Court on the following GROUNDS.—1. That the agreement, dated 1st May 1905, required compulsory registration and not being registered ought not to have been received in evidence, and that in the event of its rejection no other evidence was receivable in evidence.

2. That the mutation entries in themselves cannot create any rights and if based on an agreement which is not receivable in evidence, they can be of no avail to the defendant.

3. That the plaintiffs were not debarred in law from impugning the mutation entries:

(a) because the agreement was not clear as to whether the land in Daghana, of Mal Singh, absentee's branch in plaintiffs' possession, was to be put in hotchpot;

(b) because the plaintiff-appellant laboured under the impression that the land of Mal Singh, absentee, in Dhagana, was excluded from the agreement, but owing to misconception and mistake the matter was not cleared up at mutation.

Mr. Sewaram Singh for the Hon'ble Pandit Sheo Narain, for the Appellants.

Mr. Nihal Chand Mehra and Lala Hukam Chand, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiffs' suit was dismissed by both the Subordinate Judge and the Divisional Judge of Lahore, and this second appeal by them was admitted with reference to the question whether the agreement of 1905, referred to in detail in the judgment of the lower Courts, was admissible in evidence despite the fact that it was not registered.

After hearing the case very thoroughly and exhaustively argued, we are of opinion that the question at issue between the parties can be decided without reference to the said agreement, and that the determination of the case really depends on the proceedings before the Revenue Officers in 1905 and the mutation entries that were then made. It is obvious, and indeed not now disputed, that the claim of the plaintiffs as laid in their plaint was exaggerated and that the defendant is unquestionably entitled to at least one-fourth of the land in dispute. The sole question is whether he is not entitled to a half of that land. When mutation took place in 1905, plaintiffs' party were fully represented before the Revenue Officers, and both Courts are agreed that the entries that were then made, were made at the request and with the full knowledge of Rattan Singh, lambardar, and the other plaintiffs who were present. We see no reason ourselves to differ from this finding. According to these entries, the defendant Sawan Singh is entitled to a half of all the lands in Mauza Dhagana. The appellants' contention now is that the Revenue Officers made a mistake, and that the real intention of the parties at that time was that Sawan Singh should receive merely a half of the land originally belonging to Dyal Singh and that Sewa Singh should retain all the land belonging to Mal Singh and his descendants. In support of this argument we were referred to the history of the case, to the various proceedings at mutation, and also to the fact that if Sawan Singh received in Mauza Dhagana a half not only of Dyal Singh's land but also of Mal Singh's land, the bargain would have been a one-sided one, inasmuch as Sewa Singh was given merely a half of Dyal Singh's land in Chak Bhanu where Mal Singh and his descendants continued to own and possess their ancestral share.

Admitting for the sake of argument that there is a certain amount of confusion in the reports made by the patwari at the time of mutation and that the area given by the plaintiffs is considerably in excess of the area received by them, we are still of opinion that the appellants have failed to make out a case for our interference. The parties admittedly were present at the time when the entries were made, and so far as we can see, the Revenue Officers made every effort to ascertain what they wished to be done. Again the entries themselves are quite clear, and the onus of proving that a mistake was made lies very heavily upon the plaintiffs who assert that their intention was not correctly expressed by those entries. In our opinion they have entirely failed to discharge this onus and we see no reason to differ from the conclusions at which the lower Courts arrived.

A strong point against the plaintiffs' present claim is that they made no objection whatever when in 1909 the defendant received compensation under the Land Acquisition Act for a half share of the land then taken up by Government. It is true that they brought the present suit within a few months of that award but the fact remains that at the time when it was made, they accepted the apportionment of the compensation without demur and that even in the present suit they did not claim to recover any part of the compensation paid to the defendant. We hold, therefore, that the appeal fails and it must accordingly be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

DURGA PRASAD JANA AND OTHERS—RESPONDENTS.

Specific Relief Act (I of 1877), s. 21—Contract to refer to arbitration, when bars suit—Institution of suit, whether refusal to perform contract.

Per Fletcher, J. (Shamsul Huda, J., dissenting).—The mere filing of a suit by a plaintiff who has entered into an agreement with the defendant to refer the matter in dispute to arbitration is not a refusal on his part to perform his contract within the meaning of section 21 of the Specific Relief Act [p. 280, col. 2]

The plaintiff and the defendants who were brothers entered into a registered agreement whereby, to avoid litigation, they agreed to refer their dispute to arbitration. The plaintiff, however, shortly afterwards instituted a suit in respect of the matter covered by the agreement:

DURGA PRASAD JANA v. DINABANDHU JANA.

Held, per Fletcher, J.—That the suit was not barred by the proviso to section 21 of the Specific Relief Act, inasmuch as its mere institution did not amount to a refusal within the meaning of that section. [p. 280, col. 1.]

Per Shamsul Huda, J.—That the institution of the suit amounted to a refusal on the part of the plaintiff to perform the contract he had entered into to have the dispute settled by arbitration instead of by suit, so that the suit was barred by the proviso to section 21 of the Specific Relief Act. [p. 281, col. 2.]

JUDGMENT

IN NO 330 OF 1914.

FLETCHER, J.—This is an appeal by the defendant No. 1 against the judgment of the learned Subordinate Judge of the 1st Court at Midnapur. The plaintiff brought the suit for partition of properties alleged to be joint family properties.

Eight issues were framed in the lower Court, all of which except as to a property in the Sunderbans to which appeal No. 216 of 1914 relates the learned Judge decided in favour of the plaintiffs.

On the hearing of the present appeal the first point argued was that raised by issue No. 7 in the Court below.

It appears that two days before the institution of the suit the parties entered into an agreement to refer the matter to arbitration. The appellant, therefore, alleges that the suit is barred under the provisions of section 21 of the Specific Relief Act. There is no allegation in the written statement that the plaintiff refused to perform the contract to refer to arbitration, nor was any evidence given to prove such a refusal.

The question is, therefore, whether the filing of the suit amounts to a refusal within the meaning of section 21 of the Specific Relief Act. The authorities in this Court appear to me to be quite clear that the filing of a suit is not a refusal within the meaning of section 21. The first decision I would refer to is the case of Koomud Chunder Dass v. Chunder Kant Mookerjee (1), which is exactly in point. No doubt that case was a decision of a single Judge sitting on the original side but the decision which was given in the year 1879 has never been questioned.

The next decision I would refer to is that of Crisp v. Adlard (2), which was an appeal from the Recorder of Rangoon. Against these decisions of the Court which have stood for many years the appellant relies on the decision in Ram Chandra Pal v. Krishna Lal Pal (3).

That decision can be supported on the ground that the learned Judges held that the suit was not cognisable by a Court of Small Causes.

But in so far as it held that the mere filing of a suit was a refusal within section 21 of the Specific Relief Act, I must respectfully dissent from that decision. Such a view, having regard to the fact that the learned Judges held that the suit was not cognisable by a Court of Small Causes, was unnecessary for their decision. Moreover, the learned Judges do not consider the terms of section 21 or the earlier decisions of this Court which apparently were not cited to them. I agree with the learned Subordinate Judge that it is not shown that the plaintiff has refused to perform the agreement to refer to arbitration and that section 21 of the Specific Relief Act is not a bar to the present suit.

I regret that my learned brother is of a different opinion on this issue.

The only other point argued in this appeal is the question raised by issue No. 4. This matter can be dealt with shortly.

The defendants set up a false case of an earlier separation between the parties, which the learned Judge found against them in the Court below and which they have not attempted to support in this Court. The appellant has also in this Court not challenged the finding of the learned Judge that the pucca house is joint family property.

(1) 5 C. 498; 5 C. L. R. 284; 2 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 925.

(2) 23 C. 956; 12 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 635.

(3) 17 Ind. Cas. 600; 17 C. W. N. 351.

Nor is it challenged in this appeal that on the death of Narahari, the grandfather of the parties, certain properties passed to them as joint. There is also the admitted fact that after the death of Narahari certain lands were purchased on behalf of the family although the defendants have tried to explain away this purchase. I agree with the learned Judge that there was a nucleus of joint family property out of which other properties could be acquired.

Moreover the karbars appear to have been carried on in the joint house of the parties and no reliable books of account have been produced to show that they were the property of the defendants.

The evidence establishes that either the properties in question were acquired out of the joint family properties or were brought into the common stock by the parties. It is much too late now for any of the parties to attempt to get back portions of the property as his self-acquired property. I agree with the conclusion of the learned Subordinate Judge.

But as I have already stated my learned brother and I are not agreed as to whether section 21 of the Specific Relief Act is a bar to the suit.

Accordingly under the provisions of section 98 of the Code of Civil Procedure the present appeal is dismissed with costs, three hundred rupees.

IN No. 216 of 1914.

This is an appeal by the plaintiff against the finding of the learned Judge that a property in the Sunderbans did not form a portion of the joint family property. Part of the property was transferred by deed of gift by Prasanna Kumar Jana to the son of the defendant No. 2.

The plaintiff's case was that the transfer was really one in favour of the family in consideration of debts due by Prasanna to the family. But there is no reliable evidence that such debts were in fact due. There is no reason to dissent from the finding of the learned Judge in this respect. As regards the Sunderbans Lot No. 153, which was acquired in the name of the defendant No. 2, there is nothing to support the plaintiff's case with regard to this. On the other hand the mortgage to Ram Prasad Bera on the 28th of February 1911 appears to support the case of the defendant No. 2.

I am not disposed to differ from the learned Judge on his findings as to the Sunderbans properties.

The appeal of the plaintiff must accordingly be dismissed with costs, three hundred rupees.

IN NOS. 330 AND 216 OF 1914.

SHAMSUL HUDA, J.—I regret I am unable to agree with my learned brother in the construction he has placed on section 21 of the Specific Relief Act. It may be convenient before going further shortly to state the facts so far as they bear on this question.

Plaintiff and the defendants are brothers. A dispute seems to have arisen between them regarding the partition of their ancestral properties and properties subsequently acquired Matters seem to have reached a climax seven or eight days before the 5th of August 1911, when plaintiff sent his son to Midnapur to institute a suit against the defendants. However, on the 3rd of August they entered into an agreement called the Salisnamah, whereby to avoid litigation they agreed to refer their dispute to the arbitration of Babu Shib Prasad Jana and two others and to be bound by the decision of the arbitrators. The document was registered on the same day and remained in the Sub Registry Office at least until the 9th of August. It appears that the plaintiff changed his mind almost immediately after the execution of the document and we have it on the record that the very next day, i.e., on Friday at 11 o'clock he sent a telegram to his son to file the suit and the suit was accordingly filed on Saturday the 5th of August. There is no doubt that the suit and the agreement cover the same ground.

Upon these facts the question arises whether the institution of the suit amounted to a refusal on the part of the plaintiff to perform the contract he had entered into to have the dispute settled by arbitration instead of by suit. I think it did.

It is, however, urged that a refusal presupposes a demand and as in the present case defendants did not call upon the plaintiff to go to arbitration, the institution of the suit cannot amount to a refusal. I cannot accede to this contention. In the first place, neither the demand nor the refusal need be express and they may both be implied. It is true the defendants did not expressly call upon the plaintiff to perform his part of the contract but it may safely be inferred, and there are no circumstances leading to a contrary conclusion, that the defendants were insisting on the plaintiff to go to arbitration and would have made an express demand upon him if only they had the opportunity of making one. The time for submitting the case to the arbitrators had not come, for it would have been necessary for the arbitrators to refer to the terms of the agreement and as I have said the document was still in the Sub-Registry Office. In the second place, it seems to me that there may be a refusal in anticipation of a demand. If, for instance, a contractor builds a house for me and before he has made the necessary measurements to prepare his bill and submit it for payment I write to him saying that he has done the work so badly that I refuse to pay him anything, I do not think I would be using inaccurate or inappropriate language. The institution of the suit in the present case conclusively showed that plaintiff was determined not to go to arbitration. This is also apparent from his subsequent conduct. When the defendant No. 1 pleaded in the written statement that section 21 of the Specific Relief Act was a bar to the suit, plaintiff tried to meet the objection by stating that he had executed the agreement on blank paper, had registered it without understanding its contents and that he had agreed to the arbitration of seven persons and not of three. He also pleaded that one of the arbitrators had refused to arbitrate. The learned Subordinate Judge, whilst holding that the institution of the suit did not amount to a refusal, has not accepted this story of the plaintiff and I agree in thinking that it is untrue. Its inherent improbability makes it unnecessary for me to enter into a detailed examination of the evidence bearing on the point and I hold that plaintiff's conduct in asking his son to institute the suit and its subsequent institution and plaintiff's attempt to repudiate the agreement are susceptible of one explanation only, namely, that plaintiff had made up his mind not to abide by his agreement and such determination on his part coupled with the institution of the suit, in my opinion, amounted to a refusal to perform the contract embodied in the salisnamah.

I am fortified in this view by the decision of two learned Judges of this Court in the case of Ram Chandra Pal v. Krishna Lal Pal (3). In that case Brett and Richardson, JJ., held that where a person has agreed with another that all matters in controversy between them should be referred to arbitration, it is not open to that person to resile from the agreement unless for good and sufficient cause. It has been urged, however, that this decision is an obiter dictum. What happened was this. The defendant in a suit instituted in the Court of Small Causes pleaded that the suit could not proceed, as there was a subsisting agreement to refer the dispute to arbitration. The plea was overruled and a decree passed in favour of the plaintiff. Defendant then moved the High Court under section 25 of the Mofussil Small Causes Courts Act and obtained a Rule upon the plaintiff to show cause why the decree should not be set aside on the ground that it was barred by section 21 of the Specific Relief Act. The learned Judges made the Rule absolute and they expressly stated to have done so on the ground on which it was issued. Then they apparently proceeded to strengthen their position by an expression of opinion that the suit was not cognisable by the Court of Small Causes at all. But the principal basis of the decision was the construction which the learned Judges placed on section 21 of the Specific Relief Act. It cannot, therefore, be said that the decision is an obiter dictum so far as it concerns the present question. In support of the opposite view reliance has been placed on the decision of Wilson, J., in the case of Koomud Chunder Dass v. Chunder Kant Mookerjee (1). In my opinion the law laid down in that case has reference to its particular facts. In that case defendant not only had opportunities for calling upon the plaintiff to submit to arbitration but as observed by the learned Judge in the course of argument, an occasion arose before the institution of the suit when, if the defendant wanted to insist on arbitration, he ought to have made a demand but he omitted to do so. That is a fact which seems to distinguish that case from the present. I do not think that the decision was intended to lay down an abstract proposition of law without reference to the facts. In view, however, of the seeming conflict between this decision and the decision of Brett and Richardson, JJ., referred to above I would have been glad if my learned brother had agreed to refer the case to a Full Bench, but if I have to follow one or other of these two decisions I prefer to follow the decision of the two learned Judges of this Court. Any other view of law will have the effect of unduly narrowing the scope of section 21 of the Specific Relief Act and making the provisions of that section practically nugatory.

On behalf of the plaintiff reliance has also been placed on the case of Tahal v. Bisheshar (4). In this case plaintiff's suit was instituted more than a year after the agreement to refer to arbitration. The learned Judges found that the arbitrators did not decide the case because the parties "were contentious among themselves", and they expressed the opinion that the contract the existence of which would bar a suit under the circumstances contemplated by section 21 must be an operative contract and not a contract broken up by the conduct of all the parties to it. I think the words underlined (italicised) by me lay down the true test to be applied to all such cases. It has also been urged that the refusal must be antecedent to the suit and reliance has been placed on the case of Crisp v. Adlard (2). In that case after the institution of the suit the defendant had called upon the plaintiff to go to arbitration in accordance with a previous agreement and this the plaintiff refused to do, and the learned Judges held that this refusal could not bar a suit previously instituted. In that case the question was not raised and perhaps having regard to the facts of the case it could not be said that the institution of the suit itself amounted to a refusal, and the learned Judges were not called upon to express an opinion on that point nor did they express any.

It has also been urged that it is inexpedient to refer the parties to arbitration after the case has been fully gone into and a decision obtained on the merits. The words of the section are, however, peremptory and leave no room for exercise of any discretion.

In the view that I take Appeal No. 330 of 1914 should be decreed with costs and the decree of the Subordinate Judge reversed.

I agree with my learned brother on the other points discussed by him in his judgment and also in dismissing Appeal No. 216 of 1914 with costs.

Appeals dismissed.

FIRM OF CHELA RAM SANT RAM—PLAINTIFF—APPELLANT

versus

KISHAN CHAND AND SONS—DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXX, r. 1—Suit by firm—Name of firm—Misdescription—Contract Act (IX of 1872), ss. 239, 242—Partnership—Agent sharing profits and losses, whether partner.

In India it is a common practice for a firm to be known by the name of father and son, even after both are dead and the business is carried on by the son's son. [p. 284, col. 1.]

Where a firm continues to be known by its old name, but the name of the actual head of the firm is sometimes added to the old name, the omission of such addition from the name of the firm in a suit by the firm does not amount to a misdescription. [p. 284, col. 1.]

A gomashta sharing in the profits as well as in the losses of a business is a partner in the business. [p. 284, col. 2.]

First appeal from the decree of the Senior Subordinate Judge, 1st Class, Rawalpindi, dated the 17th June 1915, dismissing plaintiff's claim.

Messrs. Tek Chand and Jagan Nath, for the Appellant.

Mr. Gobind Das, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is a suit for Rs. 5,655-15-3, brought by a money lending firm. The name of the firm is shown in the plaint as Chela Ram-Sant Ram, and the plaint is signed by Jetha Nand, who describes himself as agent and co-sharer in the firm. The suit has been dismissed on the grounds (1) that the proper name of the firm is Chela Ram-Sant Ram-Tirath Ram and (2) that Tirath Ram is the only member and sole proprietor of the firm, Jetha Nand and Jamna Das being merely gomashtas and not partners. As to (1), Tirath Ram is a son of Sant Ram. It is a common practice for a firm to be known by the name of father and son, even after both are dead and the business is carried on by the son's son. So in this case it appears that the shop is still known by the name of Chela Ram and Sant Ram though occasionally the name of Tirath Ram is also added. For all practical, everyday purposes the firm seems to be still known by the old name and we are unable to see that there has been any misdescription. We note that in the deed of hypothecation on which this suit is based (see page 6 of the paper-book) the firm is described as the "firm known as Lala Chela Ram-Sant Ram."

As to (2) there are the statements of Tirath Ram (page 43) and of Jetha Nand (page 47) and the agreement between Tirath Ram, Jetha Nand and Jamna Das (pages 3-5). Tirath Ram no doubt speaks of himself as the sole owner (malik) of the firm and so does Jetha Nand. And in the agreement also Tirath Ram is spoken of as the owner, but it seems obvious to us, reading the whole of the evidence and of the agreement, that this only means that Tirath Ram is the sole capitalist. The agreement shows clearly that Jetha Nand and Jamna Das were to have a share in both profit and loss, labh sukh, which is equivalent to nafa nuqsan. The lower Court says they were to be responsible for losses only if they acted against the orders or without the permission of the owner or traded on their own account. We do not find this in the agreement, which merely says that if they carry on other business they must do so with the permission of Tirath Ram, who will take the profit but not be liable for losses.

For defendants it is pointed out that according to the agreement Jetha Nand and Jamna Das are not only to receive a monthly allowance, but are also liable to dismissal, and that the shop can be closed at the will of the proprietor. No doubt considerable powers were reserved to himself by the owner when admitting Jetha Nand and Jamna Das into partnership, but the fact remains that the two latter were clearly made partners in both profits and losses. There is a note under section 242, Cunningham and Shepherd's Contract Act, 11th Edition, that if a man is a clerk or servant of a firm under an agreement entitling each party to a certain notice, the circumstance that he is in part remunerated by a share of the profits and has to bear a certain share of the losses does not make him a partner so as to enable him to bring a suit to have the business wound up and a Receiver appointed. But we know of no case in which it has been held in India that a gomashta sharing in losses as well as in profits is not a partner.

We hold that Jamna Das and Jetha Nand are partners.

Accepting the appeal we set aside the order of the Senior Subordinate Judge dismissing the suit and return the case to him for decision on the merits. Stamp on appeal to be refunded, other costs of this appeal to be costs in the cause.

Appeal accepted; Case remanded.

BHAGWANDAS PARASRAM (A FIRM)—PLAINTIFF—APPELLANT

versus

BURJORJI RUTTONJI BOMANJI, SINCE DECEASED NOW REPRESENTED BY DULICHAND SHIVLAL—DEFENDANT—RESPONDENT.

Contract Act (IX of 1872), s. 30—Wagering contract, what is—Common intention to wager, necessity of—Speculation, whether amounts to wagering—Pakka Adatias, position of.

BHAGWANDAS PARASRAM v. BURJORJI RUTTONJI BOMANJI.

Speculation does not necessarily involve a contract by way of wager: to constitute such a contract a common intention to wager is essential. The mere fact that one party to a contract for sale of goods does not intend to deliver, even if known to the other party, does not vitiate the contract, unless there is a bargain or understanding between the parties that delivery is not to be called for. [p. 286, col. 2.]

Pakki adat dealings are well established as a legitimate mode of conducting commercial business in the Bombay market, and the acts of a pakka adatia as such are not unlawful. [p. 286, col. 2.]

Defendant instructed plaintiffs, a firm of pakka adatias, to sell for him three several lots of linseed amounting in all to 4,000 tons for September delivery. The market went against the defendant, and the plaintiffs discharged their obligations to their buyers by delivering 300 tons of linseed, and by making cross-contracts and paying differences as to the balance. They then sued the defendant for indemnity:

Held, that the fact that the defendant was a speculator who never intended to give delivery and that the plaintiffs did not expect him to deliver did not convert the contract into a wager. [p. 286, col. 2.]

Appeal from a decree of the Bombay High Court, dated the March 28, 1913, reported as 20 Ind. Cas. 834, reversing a decree of Beaman, J., reported as 19 Ind. Cas. 29.

FACTS appear from their Lordships' judgment and from the reports in 19 Ind. Cas. 29; 37 B. 347 and 20 Ind. Cas. 834; 38 B. 204.

Sir W. Garth, for the Appellant.—The Appellate Court have erred in holding that the contracts sued on are wagering contracts. This Board have held that the law as to wagers formerly in force in India has been superseded by section 30 of the Indian Contract Act, which in Bombay is supplemented by Bombay Act III of 1865, sections 1, 2. The appellant firm were pukka adatias. A pakka adatia can accept the contract himself, or he can pass it on: in either case he guarantees the price and gets a commission. What the pakka adatia does with the contract does not concern the principal at all. As to the custom of pakki adat, I would refer to Bhagvandas v. Kanji (1), the authority of which has been accepted by both the lower Courts.

The Appellate Court, though not suggesting that we ourselves could win or lose by the rise or fall of the market, have held that we were gambling ourselves with reference to the sub-contracts into which we entered. The only points they rely on are (1) a conversation with our gomasta who is reported to have said that 300 tons of linseed were bought by us "for Court purposes." Our representative was not even cross-examined as to this; (2) the fact that in all the sub-contracts delivery to a particular Marwari firm was barred. This, the High Court say, was because that firm might require delivery, but of this there is no proof. These points were not raised in the pleadings. The onus of proof on these two matters is on defendant-respondent, and he has altogether failed to discharge it.

[LORD BUCKMASTER.—The central point in the case is, was there or was there not a stipulation, a term in the contract, express or implied, by which you were never to ask for delivery.]

Appellants here were mere commission agents, entitled to remuneration and re-imbursement of expenses, but they took no risks. It is the essence of a wager that each side should stand to win or lose according to the result of the event as to which a risk is taken. Sassoon v. Tokersey (2).

JUDGMENT.

SIR LAWRENCE JENKINS.—This appeal arises out of a suit for the recovery of money. Many defences have been pleaded, but only one need now be noticed; it is that the transactions on which the claim rests were agreements by way of wager. At the trial several issues were framed and the third was in these terms:—

"Whether the transactions mentioned in the plaint are not wagering transactions and whether the plaintiffs were not aware of the defendant's intention to deal in differences only?"

The Trial Judge, sitting on the Original Side of the High Court at Bombay, found all the issues in the plaintiffs' favour, and passed a decree for the amount claimed.

On appeal the Appellate Bench of the High Court agreed with the findings of the Trial Judge on all the issues but the third. On that it held in favour of the defendant, and dismissed the suit.

(1) 30 B. 205 at pp. 210, 215; 7 Bom. L. R. 611.

(2) 28 B. 616 at pp. 624, 625; 6 Bom. L. R. 521.

It is from that decree that this appeal has been preferred by the plaintiffs, and the only question is whether the plea that the transactions were by way of wager has been established.

At the date of these transactions the plaintiffs were a firm carrying on a large mercantile business at Bombay, and, as a branch of it, they were in the habit of acting as pakka adatias. The defendant, on the other hand, was a young man without any regular business; who, with the aid of winnings in a lottey, engaged in speculative transactions on the Bombay market.

In June and July 1910, he instructed the plaintiffs to sell for him three several lots of linseed amounting in all to 4,000 tons for September delivery.

On the strength of this order the plaintiffs sold linseed to this amount by separate contracts to thirty-nine buyers. Though the transactions took the form of sales by the defendant to the plaintiffs, followed by re-sales by the plaintiffs to thirty-nine buyers, the plaintiffs acted throughout as pakka adatias, and, to secure them against loss, sums amounting in the aggregate to Rs. 61,000 were deposited with them by the defendant as margin money.

The market went against the defendant, and at the end of August the plaintiffs asked him either to give delivery of the linseed, or to authorise them to purchase linseed on his behalf. The defendant, however, did neither the one nor the other, and so the plaintiffs, acting within their rights, discharged their obligation to the thirty-nine buyers by delivering 300 tons, and by making cross-contracts, and paying differences as to the balance of the linseed. The result was, that after giving the defendant credit for the Rs. 61,000 deposited as margin money, and a sum of Rs. 5,804-2 3 due to him on another account, there was due to the plaintiffs Rs. 90,763-14-6, unless the plea of wagering is an answer to their claim. To determine whether this plea is applicable, it is necessary to consider the real nature of the relations between the parties to the transactions. The case has proceeded in both the Courts on the footing that the plaintiffs were employed by the defendant, and acted as pakka adatias, and the description in Bhagwandas v. Kanji (1) of the customary incidents of such an employment was applicable to the circumstances of this case, though it is to be noted that the defendant was not an upcountry constituent.

The plaintiffs, therefore, acted in conformity with the terms of their employment when they made the contracts with the thirty-nine buyers.

And as they made these contracts in exercise of the authority conferred upon them and became liable for their performance, they also became entitled to be indemnified by their employer, the defendant, against the consequences of the acts done by them unless those acts were unlawful. There is no suggestion that the acts of a pakka adatia as such are unlawful; on the contrary, pakki adat dealings are well established as a legitimate mode of conducting commercial business in the Bombay market.

No doubt the contract of a pakka adatia, as that of anyone else, may be by way of wager; but can it be said that the employment of the plaintiffs by the defendant was of this description?

It has not been shown that there was any bargain or understanding between the parties, either express or implied, that linseed was not to be delivered, nor was it a term of the employment that the plaintiffs should protect the defendant from liability to make delivery.

It may well be, as suggested in the evidence of Hargopal, that the defendant was a speculator, who never intended to give delivery, and even that the plaintiffs did not expect him to deliver; but that would not convert a contract, otherwise innocent, into a wager. Speculation does not necessarily involve a contract by way of wager, and to constitute such a contract a common intention to wager is essential.

No such intention has been proved.

Under the sales to the thirty-nine buyers it was the right of each buyer to call for delivery, but as the plaintiffs had carried through the transaction as pakka adatias of the defendant the rise or fall of the market was a matter of no concern to them, except so far as it might enhance the risk of recovering complete indemnity from their employer. Their right was to their commission and to an indemnity against loss as incidents of their employment.

The mere fact that as to the greater part of the linseed there was no delivery, but an adjustment of claims cannot alone vitiate the transactions.

The learned Judges in appeal were evidently impressed by the statement ascribed to the plaintiffs' munim that the delivery of 300 tons was made for the purpose of Court proceedings and by the clause in the contracts forbidding delivery to Messrs. Narandas Rajaram and Co. Their Lordships, however, attribute no importance to either of these matters. Even if the munim's statement be regarded as proved—a point on which their Lordships are, in the circumstances, far from satisfied—it would mean no more than that the plaintiffs fancied an actual delivery would tend to allay such doubts as the Court might otherwise have as to the reality of the transactions. But this was in no sense inconsistent with this reality. At the same time the clauses forbidding delivery to Messrs. Narandas Rajaram clearly cannot be regarded as throwing any doubt on the transactions. No such suggestion seems to have been made at the trial in the Court of first instance, and it does not appear to their Lordships to be reasonably susceptible of the significance ascribed to it.

Their Lordships, therefore, hold there was no ground for setting aside the decree of the Court of first instance, and they will, therefore, humbly advise His Majesty to restore it and to reverse the decree of the High Court on appeal, ordering instead of it that the appeal to it be dismissed with costs. As the defendant Burjorji has died during the pendency of the appeal, and the present respondent has been appointed at the instance of the appellants to represent him for the purpose of this appeal alone, there will be no order as to the costs of this appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

DEONATH—PLAINTIFF RESPONDENT.

C. P. Courts Act (II of 1904), s. 15, scope of—'Value of suit," meaning of—Amendment of plaint, effect of—Appeal, forum of.

Plaintiff sued for the recovery of Rs. 1,651-15-0, but subsequently, on different dates, he gave up his claim to the extent of Rs. 651-12-5 leaving a balance of Rs. 1,000-3-0 Through mistake, however, he prayed only for a decree for Rs. 988-3-7. The first Court dismissed the claim but on appeal to the District Judge the decree was set aside and the suit was remanded for a decision on merits, with the result that a decree was passed in favour of the plaintiff for Rs. 988-3-7 claimed by him:

Held, that the value of the suit was Rs. 988-3-7 and that an appeal lay to the District Judge and not to the Court of the Divisional Judge. [p. 290, col. 1.]

Jurisdiction in the matter of appeals in the Central Provinces is governed by section 15 of the Central Provinces Courts Act, 1904. The words "value of the suit" as used in that section invariably mean value of the relief originally claimed by the plaintiff in the plaint or increased or reduced by voluntary amendment, that is to say, value of such relief as is made the subject-matter of the Court's decision. Application for revision of the order of the Divisional Judge, Chhattisgarh Division, dated the 9th September 1916.

Messrs. J. C. Ghosh and N. G. Sarkar, for the Applicant.

Mr. M. R. Bobde, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—It is necessary to make a short statement of the material facts. On the 14th April 1914 the plaintiffs instituted a suit in the Court of the Sub-Judge of Bilaspur claiming a sum of Rs. 1,651-15 10 as due to them from the defendant on account of their share of village profits for the six years 1907-08 to 1912-13 inclusive and interest thereon.

On the 8th September 1914, the plaintiff gave up Rs. 100 out of Rs. 200 on account of the value of timber allegedly cut from the village forest by the defendant, and amended their plaint in some places. Again on the 5th May 1915, shortly before the trial came to an end, the plaintiffs gave up Rs. 172 4 5 claimed for tenancy and sir profits for the year 1907-08, Rs. 10 on account of "Najars" for that year, all the interest amounting to Rs. 269-8 0 for the six years and the remaining Rs. 100 on account of timber. These reductions of the claim produce the following mathematical result:—

Original claim			Rs. 1,651-15-10
Given up on 8-9-1914	Rs.	100-0-0
„ „ 5-5-1915	Rs.	172-4-5
„ „		10-0-0
„ „		269-8-0
„ „		100-0-0
Balance in suit			1,000-3-5

No contemporaneous amendment of the plaint was made, for which and for the absence of all reference to the matter in the order sheet the Sub-Judge concerned is mainly responsible. But on the 1st November 1915, after the case had been closed for judgment, a partial amendment of the plaint was made, stating that the abandonment of the above items had reduced the claim to Rs. 988-3-7 and in the prayer to the plaint the plaintiffs now asked for a decree of Rs. 988-3-7.

The Sub-Judge dismissed the suit upon a preliminary point. The plaintiffs appealed to the Divisional Judge, who set aside the decree of the First Court and remanded the suit for a decision on the merits. This time the result was a decree in favour of the plaintiffs for Rs. 988-3-7 claim.

From this decree the defendant presented an appeal to the Divisional Judge, urging that the value of the suit being over Rs. 1,000 the District Judge had no jurisdiction to entertain the plaintiffs' appeal, and, therefore, the order of remand and all proceedings consequent thereupon were ultra vires, and the original decree dismissing the suit was in force and had been final. The learned Divisional Judge held that the appellate jurisdiction over the suit lay with the District Judge, and made an order returning the appeal for presentation to the proper Court. From this order the present application has been made by the defendant, and the short question for decision is whether the value of the suit for the purposes of appeal is Rs. 1,651-15-10 originally claimed or Rs. 988-3-7 eventually claimed.

I am of opinion that the order made by the learned Divisional Judge is correct. Jurisdiction is governed in the matter of appeal by section 15 of the Central Provinces Courts Act, 1904. We are now concerned with clause (b) of that section, which enacts "an appeal from the decree or order of the Court of a Subordinate Judge, shall, where the value of the suit in such Court exceeds Rs 1,000, lie to the Divisional Court, and in any other case to the District Court".

The words requiring interpretation are "value of suit". After a careful consideration of the subject I have come to the conclusion that for the purposes of appellate jurisdiction the words invariably mean value of the relief claimed by the plaintiff in his plaint. By the word "claimed" I mean such relief as is made the subject-matter of the Court's decision. It may be the value originally claimed or an original claim increased or reduced by voluntary amendment. It is the claim upon which the plaintiff asks the Court to adjudicate. Such value may be actual or it may be artificial, according to the rule by which valuation is governed. It may be estimated by the plaintiff, or for him by Statute. That depends upon the nature of the relief. It may be a value ascertained and specified at the time of instituting the suit, or it may be a value which has yet to be ascertained by trial, as in account suits. But in every case the value of the relief on which the plaintiff has sought adjudication in the first Court represents the value of the suit for the purposes of appeal.

It was urged that the amount claimed in this suit was Rs. 1,651-15 0 and that a subsequent reduction of the claim did not affect the value of the suit for the purposes of jurisdiction. In connection with this argument reference was made to Kalooram Kurmi v. Ramkishen Kurmi (1),

Olpherts v. Arjundas (2), Shriram v. Chunni Lal (3) and Motabhai Motilal v. Surat City Municipality (4). The argument is unsound and the rulings cited are inapposite. The plaintiffs cannot be said to have claimed that which they voluntarily withdrew from their claim. The amount for which they eventually asked the Court for a decree was Rs. 988-3-7 and no Court could legally have given them a decree for a pie above that sum, because no Court can give a plaintiff more than he claims. The items specifically given up still left a balance of over Rs. 1,000, but whether from error or other cause the claim made was for Rs. 988 3-7. This was entirely different from a reduction made by a Court. If the plaintiff had continued to claim Rs. 1,651-15- 0 and the Court had held only Rs. 988-3-7 to be claimable and compelled amendment of the plaint accordingly, the value of the suit would have remained Rs. 1,651-15-10. But where a plaintiff voluntarily reduces an original claim, it is the reduced claim which will represent the value of the suit for the purposes of appeal.

In the Bombay case above cited the claim was reduced by the Court, and it was rightly held that such adjudication did not affect the natural value of the suit for jurisdictional purposes. A Court cannot ordinarily adjudicate itself out of jurisdiction given to it by law over a suit as instituted. The cases from this Court above cited were all account cases and offer no analogy to the present case In an account case the value of the suit has to be ascertained. The value of the relief claimed by the plaintiff is whatever may be found due to him on taking accounts and therefore whatever is found discloses the proper appellate forum. There is, however, one point on which I am conscious of difference of opinion, viz., as to the power of a Court having a pecuniary limit of jurisdiction to give a decree in an account suit for a sum in excess of that limit. This power has been considered to exsit chiefly to serve convenience but I am very doubtful, with due respect, whether the conclusion is sound. The provisions of the law are imperative as to pecuniary jurisdiction, and no exception seems permissible. This is, to my mind, a much simpler solution of the problems as to what a Court is to do which finds after taking accounts that a sum is due to the plaintiff in excess of the pecuniary limits of its jurisdiction. It is to pass a decree for the maximum which the law allows it to give, and no more. A plaintiff is permitted by Order II, rule 2, of the Civil Procedure Code to relinquish any portion of his claim in order to bring the suit within the jurisdiction of any Court. Where a plaintiff institutes a suit in a Court of limited pecuniary jurisdiction he must be taken to be aware of that limit. Therefore where he claims a sum due on an account to be taken and files his suit in a Court having jurisdiction upto Rs. 5,000, he should be deemed to ask for whatever may be due to him up to Rs. 5,000 and to relinquish whatever may be due to him above that sum; and if the debt works out to, say, Rs. 5,750 the Court would accurately comply with law by giving him a decree for Rs. 5,000. He cannot in common sense ask for more than he knows to be in the "Bank" to which he goes for his money. The value of his suit when filed was an unknown sum not exceeding Rs. 5,000. However, this particular question is not before me, and, therefore, it is not necessary to express any further dissent from the view that in an account suit a Court may grant relief in excess of its pecuniary jurisdiction. There is no doubt, however, that if a plaintiff by voluntary amendment increased his claim beyond the pecuniary limit, he would have to carry his plaint to another Court. That is not the case when he voluntarily reduces the claim because reduction does not disable the Court in the same way as increase beyond its pecuniary jurisdiction. Section 13 of the Central Provinces Courts Act only applies to an original institution. Whether a plaint is to be returned in a case of reduction of claim is a matter of procedure to be regulated by the circumstances of each case. If a Sub-Judge's case is reduced into a Munsif's case before any trial has been entered upon the plaint may be returned, though the law does not require it. But where the trial has made substantial progress it should be concluded by the Sub-Judge.

For the reasons given I hold that the value of the suit in this case was Rs. 989-3-7 and that the plaintiff's appeal lay and the defendant's appeal lies to the District Judge. Whether it can and should now be admitted by that Court is a matter for decision by the District Judge. This application is dismissed with costs. I allow Rs. 2[illegible] as Pleader's fees in this Court.

Hindu Law—Joint family—Mortgage of joint property by manager who is not father—Necessity—Burden of proof—Mortgage without necessity, whether binds mortgagor's own share.

A mortgage of joint family property made by the manager of the family, who is not the father of the other members of the family, can only be justified so far as it is necessary for joint family purposes. If the necessity cannot be established by direct evidence, it may be assumed if it can be shown that reasonable care was taken to ascertain if such circumstances existed and the transferee acted in good faith. In either case the burden of proof lies on the person who claims the benefit of the mortgage. [p. 291, cols. 1 & 2.]

If the mortgage debt was not incurred for necessity, not even the mortgagor's own interest can be sold in enforcement of the mortgage [p. 291, col. 2.]

When the mortgage is for a larger amount than the necessity warrants, it will only be upheld to the extent to which necessity is proved. [p. 292, col. 1.]

A zemindar, manager of a joint family, mortgaged three joint villages for Rs. 3,000 to pay the Government revenue. The lender sued on the mortgage and the other members of the joint family contested the validity of the mortgage. It was proved that Rs. 1,698 odd were actually paid as revenue of two of the villages out of the money lent, but no evidence was given as to the disposal of the balance:

Held, that the mortgage was enforceable to the extent of Rs. 1,698 only against the joint villages and that as regards the balance, not even the mortgagor's own share in those villages was bound. [p. 292, col. 1.]

Appeal from a decree of the Allahabad High Court, dated May 11, 1911, varying that of the Subordinate Judge of Aligarh.

FACTS of the case are sufficiently set out in their Lordships' judgment.

Mr. Dube, for the Appellants, submitted that the lender in these cases is not bound to see to the application of the money. Here proper enquiry was made by the lender as to the existence of legal necessity. The recital of such necessity in the mortgage deed is sufficient. Nanda Lal Dhur Biswas v. Jagat Kishore Acharjya Chowdhuri (1).

[SIR W. PHILLIMORE.—All that that case decided was what was evidence of necessity, not that enquiry would supply the absence of necessity.]

My case is that the whole of the Rs. 3,000 was wanted for revenue.

[Sir W. PHILLIMORE.—You have not shown that the balance over and above Rs. 1,698 was even due.]

My case is that a representation was made that the money was due for Government revenue, and on that representation we acted.

The respondents did not appear.

JUDGMENT.

LORD BUCKMASTER.—The question raised in this appeal is as to the rights of certain mortgagees under and in respect of a mortgage which was dated the 4th September 1894. That mortgage was executed by one Raja Sheoraj Singh, the manager of certain joint property held by himself and his brother, Maharaj Singh, and governed by the Mitakshara Law. The mortgage was for the sum of Rs. 3,000 with interest at the rate of 1 rupee 2 annas per cent. per month, with compound interest and half-yearly rests. The mortgage affects three villages, and on the face of it there is a recital that the money was lent in order that the mortgagor might pay the Government revenue. The original mortgagee is dead, and his representatives instituted the proceedings out of which this appeal has arisen for the purpose of enforcing their rights under the mortgage-deed. A considerable number of defences were raised by the different parties who were made defendants to those proceedings, but for the purpose of the present appeal only one of those defences needs consideration. That defence is this: that the property that was mortgaged being joint property, a mortgage could only be operative to the extent to which the mortgage-money was needed for the necessities of the joint estate. The learned Judge before whom the case was heard allowed the whole of the original mortgage debt to stand, but reduced the rate of interest. The High Court, to whom an appeal was brought, has allowed the mortgage for part only of the original sum, namely, for the sum of Rs. 1,698-5-0 and has restored the full rights of interest which the mortgagee possessed under the deed on that sum.

The appeal from that judgment has been brought under an order made by the High Court, who thought that the appeal gave rise to two questions of importance, the first being: "Whether the burden lies upon a mortgagee who takes a mortgage from the manager of a joint Hindu family governed by the Mitakshara Law to prove that the debt was incurred for family necessity"; and the second: "Whether, if the debt was not so incurred, the interest of the manager of the family, that is, of the mortgagor, in the mortgaged property could be sold in enforcement of the mortgage." It is to be observed that the grounds upon which the appeal was permitted do not include the question of considering whether, in point of fact, more than the amount allowed by the High Court had in fact been raised by way of necessity; but this point has been argued and considered by their Lordships.

As to the first of these two questions their Lordships entertain no doubt. The mortgage of joint estate made by the manager of the property, who is not the father of the other members of the joint family, can only be justified so far as it is wanted for the joint family purposes. If the necessity cannot be established by direct evidence, it may be assumed if it can be shown that reasonable care was taken to ascertain if such circumstances existed and the transferee acted in good faith (section 38, Transfer of Property Act). In either case the burden of proof lies on the person who claims the benefit of the mortgage. There is no difference between the burden of proof when it is desired to support a mortgage made by a manager of a joint estate and that which is required to support the mortgage made, for example, by a widow who has only a similar limited power of disposition. In the case of Nanda Lal Dhur Biswas v. Jagat Kishore Acharjya Chowdhuri (1), following previous decisions to the same effect, it was stated in perfectly clear and unambiguous terms that the burden of proving that such dispositions were lawful rests upon the persons who seek to claim benefits under them. The question, therefore, which the High Court thought needed consideration, so far as the burden of proof is concerned, must be decided against the appellants.

As to the second point, that question so far as it covers mortgages in the same Province as the Province from which this appeal has been brought, has also been decided, since the judgment of the High Court, adversely to the appellants' contention in a case to which their Lordships' attention was called, Narain Prasad (Lachhman Prasad) v. Sarnam Singh (2).

There remains only the point as to whether in this case the High Court were right in thinking that the mortgagee had only discharged the burden thrown upon him of proving necessity for the deed to the limited extent of the Rs. 1,698. Now the facts with regard to that matter are these: There were three villages that were the subject of the mortgage. The statement in the deed was that the money was needed to pay the Government revenue.

(2) 40 Ind. Cas. 284; 44 I. A. 163; 15 A. L. J. 584; 2 P. L. W. 29; 21 C. W. N. 99; 33 M. L. J. 39; 19 Bom. L. R. 646; 26 C. L. J. 97; (1917) M. W. N. 516; 6 L. W. 334; 39 A. 500 (P. C.).

What payments were made in respect of that revenue could easily be established by calling the proper witnesses, and, indeed, one such witness was called for the purpose of proving payments in respect of two of the villages, and he showed payments to the amount for which the High Court has allowed the mortgage to stand. The mortgagee cannot allege that the witnesses who could prove the necessity, on the existence of which his security depends, are inaccessible, or cannot now be obtained through lapse of time or for other good reason. The proof could have been and ought to have been laid before the Court by the appellants, on whom the burden rests. That burden they have failed to discharge, and in their Lordships' opinion the High Court was perfectly right in deciding that the security stood to the limited extent only of the necessity proved. They will, therefore, humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed.

Bengal Tenancy Act (VIII B C. of 1885), s. 37—Enhancement of rent—Illegal contract for enhancement, whether bars subsequent suit for enhancement.

Section 37 of the Bengal Tenancy Act contemplates a prohibition against enhancement of rent in respect of a contract validly made and binding between the parties; an illegal or invalid contract made within fifteen years of the last enhancement does not come within the provisions of the section so as to operate as a bar to the institution of a suit for enhancement of rent. JUDGMENT.

ATKINSON, J.—These appeals have come before us from a decision of Mr. Ross, the District Judge of Patna. The plaintiffs sued to enhance the rent payable by certain tenants on their property. Thirty-four appeals were taken before the learned District Judge and out of 34 only 28 cases are now pending in second appeal before us. The plaintiffs, who are the zemindars, let the lands in suit to the defendants as tenants. Sometime about the year 1882 they leased the property to a ticcadar, who was entitled to collect from the tenants the rents payable by them.

In the year 1882 the ticcadar sued the tenants for an enhancement of rent. The suit was dismissed; and after the dismissal of the suit while an appeal was pending the parties came to an agreement, the ticcadar on the one side and the tenants on the other. By that agreement, the tenants agreed to pay an enhanced rent for the years 1291 to 1293. In 1294 the agreement was revived and again the tenants entered into an agreement with the ticcadar to pay an enhanced rent from the years 1294 to 1301. In 1301 the ticcadar again came to an agreement to enhance the rent for the years 1302 to 1310. The tenants agreed to pay a further enhanced rent to the ticcadar by an agreement which continued in operation till 1310. In 1311 a further arrangement was come to between the ticcadar and the tenants by which the tenants agreed to pay a further enhanced rent for the years 1311 to 1319. Subsequently when the matter came before the Settlement Officer it was pointed out that the contract that was made between the parties in 1311 was illegal. The grounds on which it was declared to be illegal do not appear. But there are obvious reasons for holding that the agreement was illegal; firstly, because it was an agreement which was made within 15 years of the date of the last enhancement. Such an agreement is prohibited by section 37 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. Therefore, the agreement that was arrived at in the year 1311 between the parties was illegal. No doubt after that agreement was entered into, the tenants did pay the rent provided thereby to be paid, but clearly the rent was in excess of the amount provided in the agreement in 1302.

It is urged now in second appeal that the learned Judge was wrong in holding in point of law that this suit was not barred by the provisions of section 37 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. It was contended before the learned Judge that inasmuch as there was a contract providing for enhancement of rent in the year 1311 that no suit could be instituted by the plaintiffs now to enhance the rent, an enhancement of rent having already taken place within 15 years prior to the institution of this suit. It is right to observe that the ticcadar made the contract in 1311 and not the plaintiffs as zemindars. The learned District Judge, Mr. Ross, has held that the provisions of section 37 do not apply to this case. That section, we think, clearly contemplates a prohibition against enhancement of rent in respect of a contract validly made and binding between the parties; but that if an illegal or invalid contract and one not legally binding is made within the period of 15 years that such a contract does not come within the provisions of section 37 of the Bengal Tenancy Act so as to operate as a bar to the institution of a suit for enhancement of rent. We think the view taken by the learned Judge as to the proper construction to be put upon section 37 was right. The wording of the section runs as follows: "A suit for enhancement of rent of a holding shall not be entertained if within 15 years next preceding its institution the rent of the holding has been enhanced by a contract made between the landlord and the tenants." Giving a legal interpretation and construction to these words, it appears to us that they must mean that the contract then made between the parties to operate as a bar to a subsequent suit for enhancement must be a contract legally binding and operative as between the parties to it; but that these words cannot apply to a contract which is void and illegal. This appears to us to be the correct interpretation of section 37. Therefore, the enhanced rent arrived at by the agreement of 1311 would not operate as a bar to the present suit for enhancement of rent. Accordingly we think the learned District Judge was right in his view of the construction of section 37 and we dismiss these appeals with costs.

It is right to say that the plaintiffs must suffer for the illegal action of the ticcadar in so far as the receipt of rent over and above the rate stipulated by the agreement of 1302 is concerned. After the enhancement is made by the learned Judge on remand, which we confirm, we direct that in the future payment of rent the tenants will be entitled as against future rent to deduct in respect thereof the sums paid by them between the years 1311 to 1316 in excess of the rent provided by the agreement of 1302. The deductions will be without interest. We dismiss the appeals.

CHAPMAN, J.—I agree.

JUDGMENT.—This is a suit by a Mahomadan lady for dower. The defence is that when her husband was on his death bed and she was only 15 years of age she relinquished her right in the dower. The question for consideration is whether this relinquishment debars the plaintiff from suing to recover it. The District Munsif found that the dower was released but the release was brought about by undue influence and fraud and that, consequently, plaintiff was entitled to recover it. The learned District Judge has written an interesting judgment in which, while accepting the conclusion of the District Munsif that there was a release of the dower, he differs from the lower Court on the question of fraud and finds that the release is binding upon the plaintiff.

The question is not covered by any authority and is one of some importance. It has to be decided on first principles. Under the Muhammadan Law, a dower, as pointed out by Mr. Justice Abdur Rahim in his book on Muhammadan Jurisprudence, "is a sum of money or other form of property to which the wife becomes entitled by marriage; it is not a consideration proceeding from the husband for the contract of marriage, but is an obligation imposed by the law as a mark of respect for the wife". In Hamilton's Hedaya, Chapter 15, section 1, the right to dower is said to have been founded upon the text "Let him support her according to his abilities". It is pointed out in this treatise "that when a woman surrenders herself to the custody of her husband it is incumbent upon the latter thenceforth to provide her with food, clothing and lodging because such is the precept both in the Koran and in the traditions and also because maintenance is a recompense for the matrimonial restraint." The author is apparently of opinion that the fixing of dower is a recompense for the surrender. It is stated in Muhammadan Law books that even though no dower may have been fixed on the date of the marriage, the wife is entitled to some dower from the estate of the husband. That is the nature and origin of the dower or mahar in Muhammadan Law.

The character of the obligation to pay the dower is as a debt. The moment that dower is settled, it passes from the domain of a moral precept into an enforceable debt. It has been held that the wife has a lien over the property of her husband in her possession for unpaid dower. It has also been held that she would rank pari pasu with other creditors in the distribution of the estate of her husband. See Meer Meher Ally v. Musammat Amanee (1) and Syud Imdad Hossein v. Musammat Hosseinee Buksh (2). Mr. Tyabji in his principles of Muhammadan Law discusses the case and says that the widow's claim for dower due from the estate of her deceased husband ranks equally and rateably with the claims of other creditors.

Having now arrived at a conclusion as regards the nature and character of dower, the next question is whether a minor can give up her rights to it. There cannot be much doubt that where a Muhammadan female attains an age which according to Muhammadan Law is the age of majority, she can release her rights to dower. In the present case the plaintiff was a major according to Muhammadan Law. But as regards general contractual obligations the Indian Contract Act has superseded the Laws of Hindus and of Muhammadans. If this question were not complicated by the exception contained in the Indian Majority Act to which we shall presently refer, there could be no doubt the renunciation of the dower by plaintiff could not bind her.

Now the question is whether section 2 of Act IX of 1875 has made any difference in this respect. That section lays down that nothing in the Indian Majority Act shall affect the capacity of any person "to act in the matter of dower". It was contended by Mr. Rajagopalachariar for the respondent that in releasing the right to dower the plaintiff was acting in the matter of the dower. There is some justification for this contention in the language employed by the learned Judge of the Bombay High Court in Bai Shirinbai v. Kharshedji (3). That was a case relating to Parsees and the question there was whether a Parsee minor suing to have a marriage declared void was acting in the matter of marriage. The learned Judges seemed inclined to hold that the plaintiff brought herself within the meaning of section 2 of the Indian Majority Act. In our opinion the construction placed upon the word 'act' seems far-fetched. As Mr. Venkatarama Sastriar for the appellant contended, the word 'act' has been used as a comprehensive verb to control the steps to be taken in four specified classes of cases:—marriage, dower, divorce and adoption. It is not very apt as applied to dower, although it is full of meaning as applied to the other three classes. It must be remembered that the primary object of the Indian Majority Act was to reserve liberty to the Indian subjects of the sovereign to exercise their rights in matters specially pertaining to religion or religious usages. No attempt was made in the Majority Act to indicate the legal rights which might flow upon the exercise of these rights. The object was to confer a privilege and not endanger ordinary civil rights. Civil and contractual rights might flow upon the exercise of such rights. The ordinary law was intended to take its course in respect of these correlative rights. Therefore, in our opinion, when the Legislature permitted a person to act in the matter of dower it only intended to allow that person, who was not otherwise competent under the ordinary law, to act in that matter to initiate the religious acts or ceremony which under the personal law of the subject he or she was capable of initiating. In our opinion the legal consequences flowing from this primary act were not intended to be controlled by section 2 of the Indian Majority Act.

(1) 11 W. R. 212; 2 B. L. R. A. C. J. 306.

One other consideration to be borne in mind is this. The Indian Majority Act should not be so construed as to deprive a person of rights which he is otherwise entitled to. What was intended to be a beneficent legislation should not be construed as operating to deprive the ordinary rights of a person. Under the Muhamamdan Law as pointed out by Mr. Justice Abdur Rahim in his book, "generally speaking only such acts and transactions of a minor will be upheld as are of benefit to him and whatever is injurious to his interests will be disallowed". He says again, "but an infant with or without permission of his guardian cannot do any act which is absolutly injurious to his interests, such as divorcing his wife or making a gift or wakf of his property or lending his money. Similarly, a bequest of an infant is void because it is laid down that it is better for a man that he should leave his heirs rich rather than they should beg of people". No doubt, this prohibition against the act of an infant is removed when he or she attains majority as understood by Muhammadan lawyers. But the question still remains whether when the British Government enacted a uniform rule as to the age of majority, it was intended to deprive minors belonging to the Hindu or Muhammadan communities from enjoying the privilege of that legislation by operation of section 2 of the Indian Majority Act. In our opinion the injunction of Muhammadan Law which prohibits injurious acts being done by a minor to his prejudice must be taken to have been preserved till the age at which he or she attains majority under the ordinary law of the land.

There is one other passage in Mr. Justice Rahim's book which is rather significant. He says, "an infant, even if possessed of understanding, is, however, under no obligation with respect to what is regarded in law as a benevolent act, having a semblance of penalty; he is also not liable to penalties which are in the nature of private rights like retaliation." This passage has some bearing upon the finding of the learned District Judge. The act of renunciation by the plaintiff is said to have occurred under the following circumstances. Her deceased husband was suffering from cholera. He was a pious man and was anxious that he should be relieved of all obligations contracted by him prior to his death, as he believed that if he died an undischarged debtor he would not be able to attain salvation. It was apparently to ease the mind of her husband in this behalf, that the plaintiff is said to have cried out that she released her rights of dower. That is undoubtedly a benevolent act intended to secure religious benefit to her husband. In the passage which we have cited from Mr. Rahim's book such a benevolent renunciation would be regarded as not binding upon a person even though he or she be good of understanding. We are not sure whether the learned author intended to lay down that, where the age of majority according to the Muhammadan Law had been attained, such a renunciation would still be not binding. But apart from that question, in our opinion, such a purely gratuitous act on the part of the minor should not bind her when she attains the age of majority. As we pointed out at the beginning, the moment that the marriage is contracted the dower due to her becomes a debt and before a debt can be relinquished the person must be of age according to the law of the land. In our opinion the plaintiff was not acting in the matter of dower when she said that she gave up her rights to it. We are, therefore, of opinion that the decision of the District Judge should be reversed and that of the District Munsif restored with costs in this and in the lower Appellate Court.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXI, r. 38—Execution—Warrant of arrest, whether can be executed outside jurisdiction of execution Court—Jurisdiction.

The jurisdiction to issue a warrant for the arrest of a judgment-debtor in execution of a decree is territorial, that is to say, a warrant of arrest issued by an executing Court must be executed, if at all, within the limits of the jurisdiction of that Court, but the fact that the judgment-debtor, at the time of the application, does not reside within the jurisdiction is not necessarily a sufficient reason for refusing to issue a warrant. In such a case, however, a time must be fixed for the return of the warrant. [p. 296, col. 2]

JUDGMENT

CHAMIER, C. J.—This is an appeal against an order of the District Judge of Patna, affirming an order of the Subordinate Judge, 2nd Court, Patna, dismissing an application for the issue of a warrant for the arrest of the judgment-debtor. The Subordinate Judge says that the decree-holder is not entitled to the issue of a warrant because the judgment-debtor does not reside within the jurisdiction of the Court. This is not a sufficient reason for refusing to issue a warrant. The District Judge says that the jurisdiction of the Court to arrest in execution is territorial only and he, therefore, dismissed the appeal. I agree with the District Judge that the jurisdiction is territorial, that is to say, that a warrant of arrest issued by the Subordinate Judge of Patna must be executed, if at all, within the limits of the jurisdiction of the Subordinate Judge of Patna, but the fact that the judgment-debtor, at the time of the application, did not reside within the jurisdiction is not necessarily a sufficient reason for refusing to issue a warrant. The decree-holder may have information that the judgment-debtor is about to come within the jurisdiction and he may apply for a warrant in order that he may arrest the judgment-debtor as soon as the latter comes within the jurisdiction. By this I must not be understood to mean that it would be proper for the Court to issue a warrant to lie in the office for an indefinite time. A time must be fixed for the return of the warrant. The decree-holder in this Court suggests that it would be possible to execute the Subordinate Judge's warrant outside the territorial jurisdiction of the Subordinate Judge. I cannot accept the suggestion. I would set aside the orders of the Courts below and direct them to dispose of the application according to law. As, however, the intention of the decree-holder seems to have been to execute the warrant outside the jurisdiction I would make no order as to costs.

SHARFUDDIN, J.—I agree.

I, Art. 142—Dispossession and discontinuance of possession of mine—Surrender—Relinquishment.

The mere fact that a mine has not been worked does not amount to a dispossession or discontinuance of possession within the meaning of Article 142, Schedule I of the Limitation Act [p. 298, col. 2.]

In this country a surrender or relinquishment does not require to be in writing but can be inferred from the acts of the parties. [p. 298, col. 2.]

Where a lessee, having been defeated in a suit by a rival lessee for restraining him from exercising his leasehold rights, ceased to pay rent to his landlords and some of the co-sharer landlords then granted a fresh lease to another person:

Held, that the lessee abandoned the lease and that the abandonment was accepted and acted upon by the co-sharer landlords. [p. 299, col. 1.]

Where a lessee of a share in a mine works the mine, the lessees of other shares are not entitled to an account of profits unless it is shown that the defendant has worked more than his fair share or that there has been an actual ouster or destruction of common property by his working the mine, nor can the plaintiffs get a decree for ejectment of the defendant from the mine. The proper remedy of the other lessees is a suit for partition and when such a suit is brought, the Commissioner for partition should be directed to award, if possible, to the lessee who has been working the mine the portion of the property of which he is in possession and on which he has spent money. [p. 299, cols. 1 & 2.]

The claim of a lessee of a share in a mine for accounts of profits from the lessee of other shares who has been working the mine would be barred by acquiescence, if the plaintiff knowing that the other lessee was spending large sums of money to develop the mine did not promptly come in with his claim for an account of the profits. JUDGMENT.

IN R. A. No. 31 OF 1915.

FLETCHER, J.—This is an appeal by the defendant No. 1 from the judgment of the learned Second Subordinate Judge of Burdwan, dated the 18th of September 1914.

The plaintiff brought the suit as assignee of a mining lease for recovery of possession and mesne profits. The leases which have been granted of the property appear to be as follows:—

The first lease (the date of which does not appear) was of 66 bighas granted to one Mr. D. Smith. This interest is now vested in the Bengal Coal Company.

The next lease is dated the 25th of April

1856 and was granted to Messrs. Gordon Stuart and Co. on behalf of the Bengal Coal Co. The lease was by the 16-annas maliks of "approximately 800 bighas of patit danga land" at a rent of 8 annas a bigha. The lease granted both the surface and mineral rights. On the 13th of May 1901 the Bengal Coal Co. underleased their rights to the Barabani Coal Co.

By a lease, dated the 20th of August 1874, the 12-annas co-sharers granted a lease of 300 bighas within the boundaries mentioned in the lease described as "Paddy Shuna and waste land" to Bejoy Nath Chatterjee. On the 1st December 1900, this lease was purported to be assigned to the plaintiff. On the 6th of November 1894 a lease was granted by the 12-annas co-sharers to Hari Charan Singh of 1199 bighas. This on the 17th of October 1901 was assigned to the defendant No. 1. The owners of the remaining 4 annas on the 29th of January 1907 granted a lease to the defendant No. 1. The Bengal Coal Co. had on the 2nd of September 1875 instituted a suit in the Court of the District Judge of Burdwan against Bejoy Nath Chatterjee for the purpose of obtaining an injunction restraining Bejoy from continuing two shafts on about half a cotta of land and from "doing acts of digging coal in the other lands."

By his judgment, dated the 4th of July 1877, the learned District Judge held that the lease to the Bengal Coal Co. included all the "Danga" land and was not limited to the 800 bighas and further that the two shafts that were being sunk by Bejoy were on land included in the lease to the Bengal Coal Co. He accordingly granted an injunction restraining the defendant from taking coal or minerals from any portion of the land comprised in the lease to the Bengal Coal Co. and from working the two shafts.

Bejoy then appealed to the High Court but his appeal was dismissed for default in the year 1878.

Bejoy from that time disappeared from the scene and was not heard of again until the present plaintiff found him out and took an assignment of his lease for the sum of Rs. 250.

It is said that Bejoy continued to pay the rent reserved by his lease. I have no doubt that the evidence purporting to prove payment of rent is false and was put forward with a view to proving that the lease to Bejoy was subsisting.

The defendant No. 1, having acquired the lease to Hari Charan Singh and having taken a lease of the other 4 annas on the 29th of January 1907, began to work the coal. The present plaintiff instituted this suit on the 29th of November 1912.

The learned Subordinate Judge by his judgment, dated the 18th of September 1914, decreed the same.

The present appeal (No. 31 of 1915) has been preferred by the defendant No. 1 against that judgment.

The first argument that was raised on the hearing of this appeal was that the suit was barred by limitation.

The property in dispute being mining rights the mere fact that the minerals had not been worked is not a dispossession or discontinuance of possession within the meaning of the Limitation Act. But it was argued that as the Bengal Coal Co. had brought a suit to prevent Bejoy working the minerals and when that suit was successful Bejoy abandoned the property with the intention of exercising no further dominion over the same and so there was a discontinuance of possession within the meaning of the Limitation Act.

This argument is closely allied to another argument that Bejoy abandoned the holding and, therefore, his lease has long since terminated.

In the view that I take on the second argument it is unnecessary for me to express an opinion on the question of limitation.

In this country a surrender or relinquishment does not require to be in writing but can be inferred from the acts of the parties. This is well illustrated by the case of Chundermoonee Nya Bhooshun v. Sumbhoo Chunder Chuckerbutty (1), a decision which has never been questioned in this Court.

Do the facts then in this case show that Bejoy intended to relinquish the holding?

After the termination of the litigation with the Bengal Coal Co., nothing was heard of Bejoy till he purported to assign his lease to the plaintiff for Rs. 250. During that period I find on the evidence Bejoy paid no rent. Moreover, there is the important fact that in 1894 the 12-annas co-sharers who were Bejoy's landlords granted to Hari Charan Singh a fresh lease; thus recognising that Bejoy had abandoned and relinquished his tenure. It seems fairly obvious that the plaintiff, who was manager and a great friend of Hari Charan Singh's, came somehow to hear of Bejoy's lease which he acquired for a trifling sum and the defendant No. 1 having purchased the lease of Hari Charan the present suit was brought against him as an attempt to compel him to part with a large sum to the plaintiff.

In my opinion Bejoy had abandoned the lease long before the sale to the plaintiff and that abandonment had been accepted and acted upon by the 12-annas co-sharers as the landlords.

But even if the lease was in existence I could not agree to the form of relief granted to the plaintiff. The defendant No. 1 is admittedly the lessee of the 4-annas share in the property. There being no actual ouster or destruction of the common property by the defendant No. 1 working his pits, the plaintiff is not entitled to an account in the absence of proof that the defendant No. 1 has worked more than his fair share. This proposition is in accordance with the decision of this Court in the case of Mahesh Narain v. Nowbat Pathak (2).

The evidence shows that the defendant No. 1 is working the coal under a few bighas. There is nothing to prevent the plaintiff from working his own share if his lease had been found to be subsisting.

Further the evidence shows that the plaintiff knew or must have known that the defendant No. 1 was spending large sums of money to develop the mines and having acquiesced in the defendant's so doing it would in any case be much too late for him to come in and claim an account of the profits. [see Parrott v. Palmer (3)]. The plaintiff himself says he saw the defendant No. 1 in possession from the year 1907 and yet he does not bring his suit till 1912. Nor can the form of the decree ordering ejectment of the defendant No. 1 be supported. If the plaintiff has a subsisting lease his proper remedy is partition and if a partition were to be awarded there should, I think, have been a direction to the Commissioner to award to the defendant No. 1, if possible, the portion of the property he was in possession and on which he has spent so much money.

I think the judgment appealed against cannot be supported. I would, therefore, allow this appeal and dismiss the plaintiff's suit with costs both in this Court and in the Court below.

IN R. A. No. 26 OF 1915.

This is an appeal by the defendants the Bengal Coal Co. against the same judgment as that appealed against in Appeal No. 31 of 1915. The learned Subordinate Judge found that the plaintiff had no cause of action against the Bengal Coal Co. They say, however, that they apprehend that the obervations made by the learned Subordinate Judge may prejudice their position on some future occasion and, therefore, they have filed this appeal. These apprehensions are unfounded as the observations they refer to cannot prejudice their position when the Judge held that there was no cause of action against them. The appeal is dismissed. We make no order as to costs.

Section 2 of Act XV of 1856 does not apply to the case of a widow who has been converted to another religion and while in the second religion marries a husband. [p. 300, col. 1.]

The word 'widow' in the section applies only to such widows who continue to be Hindus at the time of re-marriage. [p. 300, col. 2.]

Mr. B. Somayya, for the Appellants.

Mr. Sultan Mohideen, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The suit is by a reversioner for a declaration that the alienation made by the 1st defendant is invalid beyond her lifetime. The 1st defendant's husband, Ramachandrappa, died 30 years ago. His widow, the 1st defendant, married a Muhammadan in 1894. There is evidence to support the conclusion of the lower Courts that she was a convert to Muhammadanism before she married her present husband and we must accept that finding. On this finding the question is whether the 1st defendant has been in possession of the property for 30 years since her husband's death, and whether the plaintiff's suit is barred by limitation. The Courts below have come to the conclusion that it is so barred because, from the moment of her marriage, her possession was adverse to the plaintiff, but we are unable to agree with them.

There are two Acts to be considered in this connection. The first is Act XXI of 1850, known as the Caste Disabilities Removal Act. By that Act a person who is a convert to another religion does not lose his rights in the estate which he or she inherited while that person belonged to some other religion. The effect of that Act is to remove a disability which conversion was supposed to have imposed under the common law of the country. That is the Act which really governs this case. The second Act to which our attention was drawn is Act XV of 1856. By its preamble and by the tenor of its provisions it is clear that that Act applies only to cases where a Hindu widow re marries as such, because the preamble distinctly says: "Whereas many Hindus believe that this imputed legal incapacity (referring to the re marriage of widows) although it is in accordance with established custom, is not in accordance with a true interpretation of the precepts of their religion, and desire that the civil law administered by the Courts of justice shall no longer prevent the Hindus who may be so minded from adopting a different custom in accordance with the dictates of their own conscience; and whereas it is just to relieve all such Hindus from this legal incapacity of which they complain, and the removal of all legal obstacles to the marriage of Hindu widows will tend to the promotion of good morals and to the public welfare; it is enacted etc." It is clear from this that the Act was intended solely to apply to cases where a Hindu widow had re-married while she still remained a Hindu. Therefore, section 2 of the Act, which speaks of her being regarded as dead on her re-marriage, can have no application to the case of a person who has been converted to another religion and while in the second religion marries a husband. Section 2 was introduced to placate those who pleaded that it was a sacrilege to the memory of the deceased husband that his widow who has sullied his bed by remarrying should be allowed to enjoy his property.

Our attention has been drawn to the decision of the Full Bench in Matungini Gupta v. Ram Rutton Roy (1). In that case four Judges of the High Court including the Chief Justice took the view that section 2 of Act XV of 1856 prevented a Hindu widow, who had become a Brahmo, from inheriting her husband's estate. The learned Chief Justice who delivered the judgment of the Court says: "Section 2 includes all widows who are within the scope of the Act, that is to say, all persons who, being Hindus, become widows, and it must follow from this that if any such widow marries she is deprived by section 2 of the estate which she inherited from her Hindu husband." Justice Princep dissented, and in our opinion the word 'widow' in section 2 applies only to those who continue to be Hindus at the time of re-marriage. We may point out that in the order of reference pronounced by three Judges—Justice Wilson, Justice Banerjee and Justice Princep—Mr. Justice Banerjee took the view that section 2 would not apply to all widows. The learned Judge was further of opinion that a Hindu widow who re-married would be disentitled to inherit the property of her husband not because of Act XV of 1856 but by the precepts of Hindu Law. He says that Hindu text-writers allowed a Hindu widow to inherit her husband's property on the principle that she was the surviving half of her deceased husband and that inheritance should cease when she has become the better half of some other person. It may be anomalous that while a Hindu widow who re-marries is not entitled to the entire estate of her husband, if she is converted and then married she should be allowed to continue in possession of the property. But the Legislature has not intervened in this matter and we are not at liberty to import considerations of this nature in construing the Act.

The view which we take is in accordance with the decision in Abdul Aziz Khan v. Nirma (2). As pointed out in that case, Act XV of 1856 has no bearing upon a case where the widow who marries is not a Hindu at the time of marriage. We entirely agree with this proposition.

As regards the view taken by Mr. Justice Banerjee in Matungini Gupta v. Ram Rutton Roy (1), if the matter were not concluded by the authority of the Privy Council we would hold with him that, under Hindu Law, a woman who has been false to her husband's bed by conversion and by re-marriage should not be allowed to inherit the property of her husband But the decision of the Privy Council in Mouiram Kolita v. Keri Kolitani (3) concludes this matter. There it was held that where property is once vested in a woman her subsequent unchastity would not divest her of the estate. The principle of that decision applies to the present case. At the highest this woman, who was originally a Brahmin widow and has since married a Muhammadan, can only be said to have been false to the bed of her husband. If the property had vested in her before she became a convert to Muhammadanism, the subsequent marriage cannot deprive her of the estate which she had inherited from her Hindu husband.

We, therefore, hold that the decision of the Courts below is wrong, and we reverse their decision. On the other questions the case will be remanded to the Court below for disposal on the merits. Costs will abide the result.

Appeal allowed;
Case remanded.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 144—Application for restitution, nature of—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 182.

Miscellaneous first appeal from the order of the District Judge, Delhi, dated the 26th January 1914, granting the application of the respondent.

Mr. D. C. Ralli and Lala Moti Sagar, R. S., for the Appellants.

Mr. Jai Gopal Sethi, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The main issue in this appeal is whether an application under section 144 of the Code is an application for execution of a decree within the meaning of Article 182 of the Limitation Act; the Court below has held that it is such and the contention for the appellants has been that it is not such an application but an application falling under Article 181 of the Limitation Act, further that if it be deemed to be an application for execution of a decree, the application in question is time-barred.

If the application under consideration was indeed an application to execute a decree, then it is clearly within time and appellants' Counsel admitted after a short argument that he could not really substantiate the plea of time bar under Article 182.

The following are the relevant facts and dates in the case :—

On 20th June 1904 the present appellants Ram Singh and Ram Chand secured an ex parte decree for Rs. 5,627 against Sham Parshad and his two brothers.

On 29th June 1904 application was made for execution and on 15th July 1904 houses in two localities in Delhi were sold and the sales were confirmed on 12th October 1904.

On 9th July 1904 Sham Parshad alone applied for the setting aside of the ex parte decree against him, but the matter was not concluded till 16th May 1906 when this Court on appeal set aside the ex parte decree against Sham Parshad and remanded the case for a decision on his pleas.

On 8th December 1906 the Court of first instance dismissed on the merits the suit against Sham Parshad. In the meantime, however, some property in Gurgaon had been auctioned, but with that property or its restitution this case has no direct concern. It is, however, necessary to mention that on 7th April 1909 an application for restitution of the Gurgaon property was made, for if an application for restitution be held to be unapplication for execution of a decree, then this application in respect of the Gurgaon property brings the present application within time, for the Gurgaon property was auctioned under the authority of the same decree as the Delhi property and both applications must be held to be applications to execute the same decree. Litigation in respect of the Gurgaon property was concluded by this Court's decision reported as Sham Parshad v. Ram Chand (1), but on 16th April 1910 the respondent had applied for restitution of the Delhi property, which application was dismissed for default on the 16th July 1910 and was followed by the present application on 17th October 1910.

The Court below has directed the appellants to refund to Sham Parshad Rs. 3,200, being the value of his interest in the Delhi property, and before us, as set forth above, the sole issue has been that of limitation, and the question calling for decision is whether an application for restitution falls under Article 181 or Article 182 of the Limitation Act.

The Court below holds that proceedings under section 144 are execution proceedings and has quoted in support of its view :—

Venkayya v. Ragavacharlu (2), Nand Ram v. Sita Ram (3), Thakar Mahan Chand v. Lala Ganda Mal (4).

The Madras ruling is a very short one and gives no reasons for the decision, nor is it at all clear whether the appellate decree considered in that case directed restitution in so many words.

The Allahabad ruling appears to be a clear authority in favour of the lower Court's view, although by some strange mistake this ruling is quoted in Asutosh Goswami v. Upendra Prosad Mitra (5) as authority for the view that Article 181 applies.

The Punjab ruling is no direct guide in the matter and has not been discussed before us.

These rulings were passed under the old Code of 1882 with reference to section 583 of that Code and the wording of section 583 was held to justify the conclusion that an application for restitution was an application for execution of the appellate decree.

That section ran :—When a party entitled to any benefit (by way of restitution or otherwise) under a decree passed in an appeal under this Chapter desires to obtain execution of the same, he shall apply to the Court which passed the decree against which the appeal was preferred.

(5) 38 Ind. Cas. 17; 21 C. W. N. 564 at p. 569; 24 C. L. J. 467.

Now, if the Legislature intended by the parenthesis to lay down that an application for restitution was to be deemed an application for execution of a decree, even though the decree did not specifically order restitution, it adopted a very unusual method but we do not think that such was necessarily the meaning of the section.

It will be observed that the section is not in the Chapter of execution but in the Chapter dealing with first appeals and the purpose of the section is to declare in which Court the decree-holder shall seek execution of the appellate decree.

In the Code of 1882 there is no substantive provision regarding restitution and the Courts used to direct restitution under their inherent powers to adjust a wrong caused by themselves. It is hard to say what the precise intention of the Legistature was in inserting the parenthesis in section 583, but it was probably anxious to make it clear that the appellate Court in no conceivable circumstance should act as the executing Court.

Against the view that an application for restitution falls under Article 182 of the Limitation Act are:—

Harish Chandra Shaha v. Chandra Mohan Das (6), a 1900 case in which it was held that Article 181 probably applied, but the question in that case was of academic interest only as whether Article 181 or Article 182 applied, the application was too late.

Kurupam Zemindar v. Sadasiva (7) is a very short judgment of 1886, no reasons are given for the decision and the opposite view was taken in the later XX Madras ruling.

Girdhari v. Sital Prasad (8) decided that Article 181 applied, and it does not appear that the applicability of Article 182 was considered or urged in that case.

We have been referred also to Municipal Council, Kumbakonam v. Sadagopachariar (9), Asha Bibi v. Nuruddin (10).

Had the decree of this Court of 16th May 1906 been issued under the present Code we should have no hesitation in holding, for the reasons succinctly set forth in Asha Bibi v. Nuruddin (10), that the law has now been made clear and that an application for restitution, unless such is expressly ordered by the appellate decree, is not an application for execution but a miscellaneous application in the nature of an execution application under section 144 of the present Code.

As, however, the decree in question was passed under the old Code of 1882, we cannot avoid a decision whether the application for restitution was an application to execute the decree, and though the language of section 583 is very unfortunate, yet we must take it that the Legislature had some definite object in view in couching the section in the form adopted.

The argument that the section applied only when the restitution was expressly granted in the decree appears to us on consideration to have little force, for if the decree expressly granted restitution, restitution was an integral portion of the decree and the parenthesis was quite uncalled for and superfluous, so that we are driven to the conclusion that the Legislature did intend to convey by the parenthetical clause that an application for restitution was an application for execution of a decree.

If then restitution was decreed to the respondent in 1906, that decree is still in existence, for the subsequent alteration of the law of procedure cannot annihilate his decree which came into existence in 1906.

On this aspect of the case we must hold that respondent's application of 17th October 1910 is an application to execute the appellate decree and we dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

SRI KISHUN LAL AND OTHERS—RESPONDENTS.

Bengal Land Revenue Sales Act (XI of 1859), ss. 31, 53—Revenue sale — Encumbrances—Sale-proceeds, disposal of—Purchase by proprietor—Sale brought about by proprietor from dishonest motives—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), ss. 107, 151, O. XLI, r. 33—Appellate Court, power of, to vary decree—Estoppel.

Section 31 of the Bengal Land Revenue Sales Act provides that the purchase money, after paying the public claims, shall be held on account of the recorded proprietor or proprietors, provided that if before payment the same be claimed by any creditor in satisfaction of a debt, it shall not be paid over without a decree of the Court, but the section nowhere transfers any charges on the property from the property to the proceeds, and as the revenue sale conveys a title free from encumbrances to the purchaser the mortgagees are clearly entitled to claim the same as creditors under the section and the Court would undoubtedly direct that such claims, in due order of priority, should be satisfied out of the sums in the hands of the Collector. [p. 307, cols. 1 & 2.]

Where the property is bought by the recorded proprietor and the estate is acquired, under section 53 of the Act, subject to all its encumbrances existing at the time of the sale, the transaction of the sale merely provides money for payment of the Government claims, and the encumbrances are left entirely unaffected and can only be enforced against the property and the rights to the sale-proceeds of the recorded proprietor, who has purchased the property, are those under section 31, notwithstanding the fact that the motives which led him to cause the sale or purchase were dishonest. [p. 307, col. 2.]

In a suit to which a puisne mortgagee was a party the prior encumbrancer prayed for and obtained a decree against the sale-proceeds of a revenue sale. The puisne mortgagee brought two suits, one for a declaration that the recorded proprietor was the benamidar of the purchaser at the sale and that consequently the latter acquired the property subject to encumbrances, and the second to enforce his mortgage against the property. The Court of first instance held that the purchaser was the real owner of the property and decreed both suits in favour of the puisne mortgagee. Against these two decrees the purchaser appealed and the puisne mortgagee appealed against the decree in favour of the prior mortgagee. The High Court heard all the appeals together, and affirming the finding of the Court below dismissed the purchaser's appeals and gave the prior mortgagee a decree against the property in lieu of that against the sale-proceeds:

Held, (1) that inasmuch as on hearing the puisne mortgagee's appeal the High Court had before it all the facts which showed all the circumstances relating to the sale, the Court had abundant power under sections 107 and 151, and Order XLI, rule 33, of the Code of Civil Procedure to vary, as it did, the decree in the prior mortgagee's suit; [p. 308, col. 1.]

(2) that the fact that the puisne mortgagee did not attack the sale in the prior mortgagee's suit did not operate as an estoppel against the puisne mortgagee so as to prevent him from attacking the sale in his own suits and obtaining consequential relief. [p. 307, col. 1.]

Consolidated Appeals from a judgment of the Calcutta High Court (Chitty and Teunon, JJ.), dated the 25th April 1912, modifying one and affirming two other decrees made by the Subordinate Judge, Arrah.

FACTS of the case sufficiently appear from their Lordships' judgment.

Mr. De Gruyther, K. C. (with him Mr. J. M. Parikh), for Tarini Charan, opened his three appeals: Bishun Chand was estopped from impeachingthe revenue sale. He was a party to the suit brought by Sri Kishun but did not plead therein that Tarini Charan and not Sangam was the real owner of the property. Instead of insisting that all mortgages should be paid out of the mortgaged property Bishun Chand allowed a decree to be made against the surplus sale-proceeds only. He cannot say in one suit that the sale encumbrances are enforceable against the sale proceeds and in another that they are enforceable against the estate. Reference was made to the Bengal Land Revenue Sales Act, 1859, sections 31, 37 and 53, and the Transfer of Property Act, 1882 (Act IV of 1882) section 73.

Messrs Dunne, K. C. and B. Dube, for Bishun Chand, were not called upon to argue Tarini's appeal but were asked to open Bishun Chand's appeal: Both Ramratan and Sri Kishun were entitled to be paid out of the sale proceeds only, as they treated the revenue sale as valid in every way. Sri Kishun's decretal money was recoverable under the decree of the Subordinate Judge from sale-proceeds only. The High Court had no jurisdiction to modify the decree and make the mortgaged property liable at the instance of Counsel for Tarini, who had not appealed. Under section 31 of Act XI of 1859 Sri Kishun was entitled to treat the revenue sale as valid and to recover his mortgage money from the revenue sale-proceeds. Tarini fraudulently brought about the revenue sale and is not entitled to any equity. It is not open to the High Court to vary the decree under the Code of Civil Procedure except on an appeal for the purpose. Although the appeals were heard together, the findings in one appeal could not be used to influence the judgment in another appeal.

Mr. De Gruyther, K. C., submitted that the High Court had ample jurisdiction to make a proper decree upon the facts proved before it. All the parties were before the Court. Reliance was placed on sections 107 and 151 and Order XLI, rule 33, of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908. Reference was made to Tricomdas Cooverji Bhoja v. Gopinathji Thakur (1).

JUDGMENT.

LORD BUCKMASTER.—These four appeals have been consolidated by order of the Board, dated the 26th March 1917, and have been brought on and heard together.

In three of them Tarini Charan Sarkar is the appellant and Babu Bishun Chand is one of the respondents, and in the fourth Babu Bishun Chand is the appellant and Tarini Charan Sarkar is a respondent.

All the appeals are against a judgment of the High Court of Calcutta dated the 25th April 1912, and three decrees made by that Court consequent on the judgment

The questions raised arise out of certain mortgage transactions affecting a Tahal Touzi No. 7062 and, though the facts and circumstances are complicated and involved, for the purpose of explaining the real issues that have to be decided they can be briefly summarised.

In the early part of 1904 the registered proprietors of the said touzi were Ram Rattan Sarkar in respect of a 4-anna share, and Sangam Sarkar in respect of the remaining 12-anna share. The touzi, however, was subject to certain mortgages, of which it is only necessary to mention the following: zirpeshgi thicca of the 15th July 1889, in favour of Gajadhar Lal and Sri Kishun Lal to secure Rs. 11,506 and interest at 9 per cent. per annum, a further mortgage in favour of the same mortgagees, dated the 16th July 1889, to secure Rs. 11,000 and interest at the rate of 12 annas per cent. per month and a mortgage of the 10th February 1896 in favour of the said Babu Bishun Chand to secure a loan of Rs. 5,999 with compound interest at the rate of 24 per cent. per annum with half-yearly rests. In the year 1900 a 4-anna share of the estate was sold in execution of a mortgage decree and was bought on the 8th August 1900 by Ram Ratan Sarkar, and on the 7th March 1904 the said touzi estate was purchased on a sale made in execution of a decree at the suit of another mortgagee by one Chatarbhuj Sahai in the name of one Mahanand Sahai, and he, on the 14th May 1904, purported to sell the property to one Sangam Sarkar. Sangam Sarkar was, however, but a mere name, it has been found, and it cannot now be questioned that the real purchaser was the appellant Tarini Charan Sarkar, who thus became the owner of the property subject to the mortgages.

On the 2nd June 1904, the first of the suits, out of which these appeals proceed, No. 39 of 1904, was instituted by Babu Bishun Chand seeking relief in respect of his mortgage of the 10th February 1896 against the representative of the original mortgagor and other parties. It would seem impossible that any estate could bear for long the burden of a mortgage on which the debt was accumulating by a process of compound interest on the principal sum at the rate of 24 per cent. per annum; and it appears that the appellant Tarini Charan Sarkar, instead of adopting what might have then been the inconvenient process of redeeming the mortgage by payment, resorted to the device of causing the mortgaged property to be sold for arrears of Government revenue and himself becoming the purchaser. To secure this object he wilfully allowed the Government revenue to fall into arrear, and the property was in consequence sold by the Government on the 28th August 1906, nominally as the property of Ram Ratan Sarkar and Sangam Sarkar, the registered proprietors, and was purchased for Rs. 29,500 by Tarini Charan Sarkar, the true owner. Had Tarini Sarkar been successful in concealing the fact of his ownership the result of this device would have been that the claim of all the mortgagees would have been thrown on to the balance left of the Rs. 29,500 —after satisfying the Government debt; and he would have held the property free from the inconvenience of the many and heavy charges to which it was subjected. Directly after the sale—on the 22nd October 1906, Sri Kishun Lal and others instituted proceedings (No. 258 of 1906) to obtain payment in respect of the mortgage of the 15th July 1889, seeking to obtain payment out of the surplus proceeds of the money due under the mortgages, the amount of which was stated to be—at the date of the proceedings—Rs. 15,983. To these proceedings Babu Bishun Chand was by an order, dated the 17th January 1907, added as a defendant. On the 2nd December 1907, Bishun Chand instituted his second suit No. 153 of 1907 alleging that the purchase of the estate on the 14th May 1904 was really made by Sangam Sarkar, benami for Tarini Charan Sarkar, that the sale for arrears of Government revenue had been fraudulently effected by the said Tarini Charan Sarkar, and asking either that the sale should be set aside or that his mortgage of the 10th February 1896 should still remain valid and operative against the estate. In the first Suit No. 39 of 1904 the usual mortgage decree was made on the 6th January 1905, but it was set aside on the 18th April 1907, and another trial was ordered. This took place on the 30th June 1909, when the usual mortgage relief was granted.

In the second suit by Sri Kishun Lal and others judgment was delivered on the 23rd December 1907, and a decree made in favour of the plaintiffs directing that the money due on the mortgage with interest and costs should be paid out of the surplus proceeds of sale. At the date of this decree the sale itself had become a subject of attack, and consequently the further provision was introduced that, in the event of the sale being set aside, the mortgage monies, interest, and costs should be realised by sale of the mortgaged property if the sum were not paid within six months from the date of decree.

The said Tarini Charan Sarkar did not appeal against this decree, but Babu Bishun Chand did, and the appeal came on for hearing together with the appeal by Tarini Charan Sarkar in the two suits commenced by Bishun Chand and an appeal by Sangam Sarkar in the Suit No. 153 of 1907.

On the 25th April 1912 the High Court delivered judgment, dismissing all the appeals; but at the instance of Counsel who appeared for Tarini Charan Sarkar they varied the decree of the Subordinate Judge, in the suit by Sri Kishun Lal, by setting aside the direction that his mortgage monies should be paid out of surplus monies of the revenue sale, and made in its place the ordinary decree against the property itself. It is this latter part of the decree that is challenged by the present appeal of Bishun Chand.

Before dealing, however, with his contention it is desirable to dispose, in the first instance, of the appeals of Tarini Charan Sarkar. He stands in this position: He is held to have been the real owner of the estate Touzi No. 7062 at the date of the sale of the 28th January 1906, and it is further established by the findings, both of the Subordinate Judge and of the High Court, that he deliberately allowed the Government revenue to fall into arrear in order that the property might be sold, and that he succeeded in purchasing it himself at an undervalue under circumstances which concealed his original ownership, and appeared to establish an independent sale to an independent third party, so that all the claims of the mortgagees, beyond the amount that would be satisfied by the surplus proceeds of sale, would be wholly defeated.

These grave and serious charges are, therefore, supported by the concurrent findings of both the Courts, and no grounds whatever can be shown for disturbing these decisions. Counsel for Tarini Charan Sarkar undoubtedly realised this difficulty, and refrained from attacking the substance of the judgment, but said that it was one which Bishun Chand had no right to claim because he was estopped by his own conduct from seeking any such relief.

This estoppel is said to be effected by his action as a defendant in the suit brought by Sri Kishun Lal and his co-mortgagees

This suit—it will be remembered—was brought after the revenue sale and sought relief against the proceeds. In that suit the plaintiffs alleged that there had been intentional default in payment of the Government revenue, but they made no reference to the fact that Tarini Charan Sarkar was the real owner, a fact of which they were probably unaware, and which in any event was wholly immaterial to them, since the money in Court was sufficient to satisfy their claims. Bishun Chand was only made a party to this suit as an encumbrancer upon the property. He had no power of controlling the form in which the suit was brought, nor was there any step which he took in the suit irrevocably asserting his intention to rely upon the sale and not impeach the whole proceedings. In these circumstances, it is obvious that no estoppel arises as against him, and as this is the only ground upon which the appeal of Tarini Charan Sarkar is or can be based, it follows that it must fail.

There remains the question of Bishun Chand's appeal, and the question to which that gives rise is one of more general importance. On his behalf it is alleged that Sri Kishun Lal and his co-mortgagees are entitled to be satisfied out of the proceeds of sale, and that, if these are sufficient for the complete satisfaction of their mortgages, their encumbrances are removed from the property, with the result that there is a more abundant security for Bishun Chand's claim; that, in fact, the proceeds of the first sale to the extent of Sri Kishun Lal's claim, are to be added to the proceeds of the sale made under the decree of the High Court, so as to make one fund out of which the mortgage debts may be satisfied.

In order to examine the value of this contention, it is necessary to look at "The Land Revenue Sales Act," No. XI of 1859, by which the rights of the parties are regulated. Section 31 of that Statute provides that the purchase monies, after paying the public claims, shall be held on account of the recorded proprietor or proprietors, provided that if before payment the same be claimed by any creditor in satisfaction of a debt, it shall not be paid over without the decree of the Court.

It is to be observed that this section nowhere transfers the charges from the property to the proceeds; but, as the sale by the Government conveys a title free from encumbrances to the purchaser, the mortgagees are clearly entitled to claim the same as creditors under the section referred to, and the Court would undoubtedly direct that such claims, in due order of priority, should be satisfied out of the sums in Court.

It was a decree under this section that was obtained by Sri Kishun Lal, and it, of course, proceeded upon the assumption that the sale had been made to a bona fide third party. Section 53 regulates what happens when the property is bought by the recorded proprietor, and in that case it is enacted that the estate is acquired subject to all its encumbrances existing at the time of the sale. In such a case, therefore, the encumbrances are left entirely unaffected; the transaction of sale has merely provided money for payment of the Government claims, and the estate remains as it was before. Were such a purchase honestly and openly made, it was not disputed that the claims against the purchase-money could not remain in addition to the claim against the estate. The appellant, however, says that in the present case the owner cannot claim this method of administration. He asserts that as it was by the fraud of Tarini Sarkar that the whole transaction was set on foot, he is in a worse position than if he had become the purchaser on a sale made against his will.

Their Lordships are certainly not prepared to assist in providing any possible benefit for a course of conduct so dishonest as that revealed in this case but, on the other hand, it is not right to punish a man for fraudulent behaviour by making him suffer other penalties than those which are the direct consequence of his fraud. In the present case it is impossible to see how the position has been aggravated by the fact that the sale was effected for the purpose of defeating the mortgagees. The Act distinctly contemplates the purchase of property by a recorded proprietor, and the rights that arise in such a case are those which have been already mentioned. Their Lordships are unable to see why those rights should be increased against the purchaser because of the motives which led him to cause the sale or the purchase. The only effect of the Statute is that, so far as the encumbrances are concerned, the sale is of no effect.

It is then urged that the Court of appeal had no power to vary the order made in Sri Kishun Lal's suit, since he did not request such variation, nor were the facts relating to the sale proved and established in any suit to which he was a party.

Their Lordships think it would have been a matter for regret if the Court of appeal had been thus hampered in making the order, which their Lordships regard as right in all the circumstances of the case. But they think abundant power is given to the Court by sections 107 and 151 of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1908 and Order XLI, rule 33 of the same Statute. Section 107 gives power, if necessary, to take additional evidence; and rule 33 of Order XLI gives power to pass any decree and give any orders which ought to have been passed or made, and to pass or make such further or other decrees or orders as the case may require.

On hearing the appeal in Sri Kishun Lal's suit, the Court had before it the facts that showed all the circumstances relating to the sale. Sri Kishun Lal seems to have raised no objection to the variation of the order, and does not appear here on appeal against it. It is Bishun Chand, in whose suit all the facts were established, who seeks, on the one hand, to retain a judgment based upon the view that the sale was regular, and, on the other, to get the benefit of the decree which determined that it was not. There is certainly nothing in the Statute which gives him such rights, and there is no equity to which he can appeal which entitles him to their possession. This appeal must, therefore, also fail.

It may be doubted whether in the end any property will be left for the real owner. Bishun Chand's mortgage runs at 24 per cent. compound interest with half-yearly rests. It began at Rs. 5,000 and in the hearing before the Court it amounted to 40,000; and the long dealy, amounting to five years, that has elapsed in prosecuting this appeal has more than doubled the amount. Usury and the abuse of legal procedure are a formidable and dangerous combination to the well-being of any community. The former is one which it is not easy to repress, but the latter ought not to be incapable of remedy. There seems to be no lack of expedition in the Courts in disposing of cases when once entered for hearing. The delay is associated with dilatoriness in procedure and apparent unwillingness on the part of persons who have the control of litigation to bring it to a speedy conclusion.

Eleven years have elapsed since Bishun Chand first instituted the proceedings in respect of his mortgage, and more time must pass by before the accounts are finally worked out and his claim ends; and having regard to the rate at which his debt accumulates in a short time the amount might reach the total wealth of the entire province.

All the appeals, therefore, fail and in all the circumstances their Lordships think there should be no costs on either side. They will humbly advise His Majesty to this effect.

MADRAS HIGH COURT.

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No. 1434 OF 1916.

December 14, 1917.

Present:—Mr. Justice Seshagiri Aiyar and Mr. Justice Napier.

THE MUNICIPAL COUNCIL OF VIZAGAPATAM—DEFENDANT—APPELLANT

WILLIAM FOSTER—PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Madras District Municipalities Act (IV Mad. of 1884), ss 172, 173—Misfeasance, liability of Municipalities for—Gravel thrown on public road, injury caused by—Negligence—Damages—Extent of liability—Negligence of contractor, effect of, on relations between Municipality and public.

MUNICIPAL COUNCIL OF VIZAGAPATAM v. WILLIAM FOSTER.

Municipal Corporations in India are liable for acts of misfeasance. [p. 311, col. 2.]

It is the duty of Municipalities to lay and maintain roads so that the public may pass over them safely and they are liable for injuries resulting to the public through the negligent or improper performance of that duty. [p 311 cols. 1 & 2.]

The liability of statutory bodies for negligence is not based on whether a profit is derived by the levy of a cess or toll from the public. The question whether it gives them an income over expenditure is not a criterion for enforcing liability. [p. 311, col. 1.]

(Case-law discussed.)

Municipalities in India do not act in the exercise of sovereign powers or as agents of the State in laying or maintaining roads. [p. 311, col. 2; p. 315, col. 1.]

Secretary of State v. Cockcraft, 27 Ind. Cas. 723; 39 M. 351; (1915) M. W. N. 39, distinguished.

In the case of statutory bodies entrusted with the performance of public duties, their liability cannot be shifted to a contractor employed by them for a particular purpose. They may bargain with the contractor that he shall perform the duty and stipulate for an indemnity from him if it is not performed. But they are not thereby themselves relieved from liability to those injured by the failure to perform it. [p. 312, col. 2; p. 313, col. 1; p. 316, col. 2]

Plaintiff sued the Municipal Council of Vizagapatam for injuries sustained by him by falling on a heap of gravel thrown on to the side of a road and allowed to project 9 feet into the roadway in the course of some repairs which were entrusted to a contractor:

Held, that the Municipal Council was liable in damages for negligence. [p. 313, col. 2; p. 317, col. 1.]

Per Seshagiri Aiyar, J.—Municipal Councils in Madras are statutory bodies with very circumscribed powers and are not self-governing in the sense that Municipal Corporations in England are. Though they are not a department of Government, their powers are derived from the Government and they are controlled by the provisions of the District Municipalities Act. [p. 311, cols. 1 & 2.]

The public have a right to use the full breadth of a public road and any obstruction to such use amounts to misfeasance. [p. 313, col. 2]

Per Napier, J.—Section 173 of the Madras District Municipalities Act does not apply to the case of a contractor executing repairs to a road under the orders of a Municipal Council. The section has reference to temporary obstructions to a thoroughfare by the erecting of pandals or arches by a private person and has nothing to do with the execution of repairs by the employees of the Municipality. [p. 316, col. 1.]

Quære.—Whether a public body can be liable for mere non-feasance?

Whether the making of roads by the Government is an act of sovereign power?

Second appeal against the decree of the District Court, Vizagapatam, in Appeal Suit No. 256 of 1914, preferred against that of the Court of the Temporary Subordinate Judge, Vizagapatam, in Original Suit No. 2 of 1913.

FACTS of the case appear from the judgment.

The Hon'ble B. N. Sarma, for the Appellant.—In the first place, no suit lies for damages against the Municipal Council, as it exercised sovereign functions in laying and repairing the road. Its liability cannot be more than that of the Crown. Secretary of State v. Cockcraft (1). It must be deemed to have acted as an agent of Government and it, therefore, enjoys the same immunity from the consequences of a tortious act that is enjoyed by the Secretary of State and public servants in respect of torts committed by them in the exercise of State functions: 28 American Encyclopædia. Secondly the District Municipalities Act does not expressly create any liability for damages in Municipal Corporations and no right of action, therefore, is vested in the public. Thirdly, the injury was sustained by plaintiff while he was racing on the road on his bicycle for which he did not obtain a license, and this breach on his part of a statutory provision disentitled him from claiming damages from the Council. He was also guilty of contributory negligence, and the amount of damages claimed was excessive. Lastly, the work of executing repairs was entrusted by the Council to a contractor, who alone is liable under the common law. The negligence is directly traceable to the act of the contractor and the Council had nothing to do with the work.

Mr. P. Narayanamurthy, for the Respondent, argued contra that the position of a Municipal Council under the District Municipalities Act was different from the sovereign acts of State and the former was as liable as a private individual for ordinary torts. Nor could their act in repairing a road be deemed to be that of the servants of the Crown. The fact that the work was done by a contractor did not absolve the Council. The ordinary law governing the relations between employer and employee applied to work executed on contract with Municipal Corporations.

MUNICIPAL COUNCIL OF VIZAGAPATAM v. WILLIAM FOSTER.

JUDGMENT.

SESHAGIRI AIYAR, J.—The plaintiff sued the Municipality of Vizagapatam for compensation for injuries sustained by him owing to the negligent stacking of gravel in a Municipal road. The Subordinate Judge awarded damages to the extent of about Rs. 3,200 and odd. The amount was increased on appeal by the District Judge.

In this second appeal, I shall deal with the various questions involved in the case, in the order in which they were argued by Mr. Sarma.

The first contention for the appellant was that Municipalities in India have only delegated powers from the Local Governments and that consequently their liability is subject to the same restrictions as that of the Government. This contention was raised with reference to an observation of mine in Secretary of State v. Cockcraft (1), where I pointed out that in laying out roads, the Municipal Corporations in America were exercising to some extent sovereign functions. I took care in that judgment to reserve my opinion whether the principle on which American Municipal Corporations are exempted from liability can apply to Indian Municipalities. The various sections to which Mr. Sarma drew our attention point to the conclusion that the Municipal Councils in India are statutory bodies whose powers are very much circumscribed. Section 21 as regards constitution, sections 113, 114 and 115 as regards limitations in the application of funds and section 4 (b) which relates to the suspension of Municipalities show that Indian Councils are not self-governing in the sense that Municipal Corporations in England are. As regards the latter, charters have been conferred upon various towns since the days of Henry VI empowering the inhabitants to govern themselves completely. They have power to make laws, they have jurisdiction to administer justice, and they have got their quarter sessions. In most respects the English Corporations are complete governing bodies. Although I do not wish it to be understood that Municipal institutions in this country are a department of Government, there can be no doubt that their powers are derived from the Government and are controlled by the provisions of the District Municipalities Act. I may draw attention in this connection to the Act which created the first Municipality in this country. Act X of 1842 which was passed by the President of the Council of India was an enabling act. The preamble shows that it was intended to enable the inhabitants of any place of public resort or residence under the Presidency of Fort William within the town of Calcutta to make better provision for purposes connected with public health and convenience. This Act was subsequently repealed and Act XXVI of 1850 was passed. In this Act also the powers were very much limited These enactments which have subsequently been repealed and re-enacted in a more comprehensive form show that the powers conferred upon Municipalities are of a very restricted character; they, therefore, do not stand on the same footing as Municipal Corporations in England. To this extent I am in agreement with Mr Sarma

The further question is whether in making roads, the Indian Municipalities are exercising sovereign functions. The extract quoted by the learned Vakil for the appellant from 28 American Encyclopaedia shows that it is only in certain States that the Municipalities in the United States are exempted from liability for injuries caused by the negligence of the Municipal Corporations in maintaining streets. In other States the liability has been enforced, vide page 1340 (19d).

The principle of liability in such cases was laid down in Parnaby v. Lancaster Canal Co. (2). In that case it was laid down that a Canal Company which levied tolls was liable for negligence. Tindal, C. J., said: "We concur with the Court of Queen's Bench in thinking that a duty of this nature is imposed upon the company, and that they are responsible for the breach of it upon a similar principle to that which makes a shopkeeper, who invites the public to his shop, liable for neglect on leaving a trap door open without any protection, by which his customers suffer injury". It was contended before us that it is only where a profit is derived by the levying of tolls that the principle enunciated in this case can be held applicable. I find no justification for this distinction. In most cases where a Corporation is charged with liability for misfeasance in the discharge of its duty, it would be almost impossible to prove that the particular department in administering which the misfeasance was committed was giving a surplus income to the Corporation. It is not denied that a road-cess is included in the general taxes levied by the Municipality. The question as to whether that cess resulted in giving an income over expenditure is not the criterion for enforcing liability. The only question is whether the laying of the road, as in the case in 39 Madras, was a purely Governmental function for which no sort of tax is levied upon persons using that road or whether it is a road for using which some sort of consideration is being paid by persons frequenting it. In Mersey Docks Trustees v. Gibbs (3) it was definitely laid down that a corporate body authorised to perform a work and receiving tolls in respect of it, though obtaining no profit for itself from such tolls but collecting them for the maintenance of the work and the possible future benefit of the public, is responsible for the injuries arising from the improper performance of that work, and that the funds thus obtained must be applied for the discharge of that liability. Lord Cranworth said that a "body of trustees constituted by Statute having the right to levy tolls for their own profit in consideration of making and maintaining a dock or a canal is no doubt under a liability to make good to the person using the dock or canal any damage occasioned by the neglect in not keeping the works in proper repair." The other learned Lords agreed with this view. Reference may also be made to Hartley v. Rochdale Corporation (4), Geddis v. Proprietors of Banu Reservoir (5), Reg. v. Williams (6), Gibraltar Sanitary Commissioners v. Orfila (7), Foreman v. Canterbury Corporation (8), Gilbert v. Trinity House Corporation (9) and to the latest judgment of Lush, J., in Mc'Clelland v. Manchester Corporation (10). The observation in Harris v. Baker (11) that only an indictment lies has no application to this country and I doubt whether it is any longer law in England. In this country the principle of making Corporations liable for neglect of duty has been uniformly enforced. The decision in Corporation of the Town of Calcutta v. Anderson (12) is a strong authority for that proposition; notwithstanding the criticisms of the learned Vakil for the appellant that that decision turned on the language of the particular section therein commented on, I feel no doubt that it enunciated a general principle of liability for neglect by Corporation. Rajendralal Maneklal v. Surat City Municipality (13), Dholka Town Municipality v. Desaibhai (14), McInerny v. Secretary of State (15) all point to the same conclusion. I am therefore of opinion that in laying and maintaining a road, Municipalities in this country are not exercising purely sovereign functions and that consequently they are liable for misfeasance. In this view the decision in P. and O. S. N. Co. v. Secretary of State for India (16), which discriminates between the liability of the East India Company for purely sovereign functions and other functions which involve transactions which can be carried on by private individuals, is fully satisfied in this case.

The next point argued by Mr. Sarma was that as there is no provision for damages in the District Municipalities Act, no claim for damages can lie. I see no force whatsoever in this contention. The Act no doubt directs the application of Municipal funds in a particular manner. That is a direction given by the Government to the statutory body. That direction is not binding upon a person against whom a wrong has been committed by the statutory body. If authorities were necessary for this proposition I may refer to the case in Attorney-General v. Leaes Corporation (17), where it was held by Swinfen Eady, J., that the fact that the Public Health Act of 1875 provides a statutory remedy by complaint to the Local Government Board in the case of a local authority making default "in the maintenance of existing sewers does not preclude a private individual from obtaining damages and an injunction against that local authority in respect of a common law nuisance arising from that default." Vide also Khagendra Nath v. Bhupendra Narayan (18).

One other minor contention of Mr. Sarma may be disposed of in a few words. He argued that as the plaintiff did not obtain a license under the Madras Act I of 1907, he is not entitled to damages. It would lead to startling results to hold that because a person passes in a vehicle in a public highway without obtaining a license for that vehicle he can recover no damages for injuries caused to him by the negligence of the Municipality. No authorities were quoted for this proposition nor is it possible to find any.

The next point on which a great deal of learned argument was addressed to us by Mr. Sarma and by Mr. Narayanamurti related to the question whether the Municipality can be held liable, inasmuch as it had given a contract for the making of the road to a contractor. I am in agreement with Mr. Sarma that the contractor to whom the work was entrusted must be taken to be an independent contractor, notwithstanding the finding of the learned District Judge that supervision was exercised over his work by Municipal subordinates. In Thomas Field Evans v. Trustees, Port of Bombay (19) and Ullman v. Justices of the Peace for the Town of Calcutta (20) it was held that an independent contractor would not be liable for torts. In Steel v. South Eastern Railway Co. (21) Crowder, J., with the concurrence of the other Judges said: "The circumstance of the work being done by Furness under a contract, negatives his being a servant of the Company". The Full Bench laid down that where work is being done for a Railway Company under a contract (parol or otherwise), the company are not responsible for injury resulting to a third person from the negligent manner of doing the work, though they employ their own surveyor to superintend it, and to direct what shall be done. In Overton v. Freeman (22) it was held that if one employs another to do an act which may be done in a lawful manner, and the latter in doing it unnecessarily commits a public nuisance whereby injury results to a third person, the employer is not responsible. The principle of these decisions is that an employer is entitled to expect of the contractor that he will perform the duty lawfully and without negligence. Therefore, if there has been illegality or neglect on the part of the contractor the employer is not ordinarily liable. Reference may also be made to 28 American Encyclopædia page 1280. But, there is an exception to this rule even in the case of private employers and that is this. That where the employer is aware that the doing of a contract work involved a public danger he ought to see that the contractor so discharges his duty as to avoid such a danger. That was the principle enunciated in Corporation of the Town of Calcutta v. Anderson (12). There is another exception which is even more pertinent to the present case, namely, that in the case of statutory bodies entrusted with the performance of a public duty their liability cannot be shifted to a contractor. This principle is pointedly illustrated by the decision of Lindley, L. J., in Harda Ker v. Idle District Council (23). The distinction between the liability of the contractor to the employer and the liability of the employee to the employer in the construction of public works is thus stated by the Lord Justice· "This principle lies at the root of the modern decisions on the subject, and the distinction between the two classes is well illustrated by comparing Reedie v. London and North Western Railway Company (24) with Hole v. Sittingbourne and Sheerness Railway Co. (25). In the first of these cases the defendants employed a contractor to build a bridge. One of his men carelessly let a stone fall on the plaintiff, and the defendants were held not liable. In the second case the defendants' duty was to build a bridge which would open and let vessels pass. They employed a contractor, who built a bridge which would not open. The plaintiff was injured thereby, and the defendants were held liable for the consequences. The principle to which I am referring is further illustrated by Pickard v. Smith (26) (the coal-cellar case) and Gray v. Pullen (27), in which the Court of Exchequer Chamber, reversing the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, held the employer of a contractor liable for injury caused to the plaintiff by the contractor's failure to make good a pavement under which he had constructed a drain." The learned Lord Justice quotes with approval a passage from Lord Blackburn's judgment in Dalton v. Angus (28). On the other hand, a person causing something to be done, the doing of which casts on him a duty, cannot escape from the responsibility attaching on him of seeing that duty performed by delegating it to a contractor. He may bargain with the contractor that he shall perform the duty, and stipulate for an indemnity from him, if it is not performed, but he cannot thereby relieve himself from liability to those injured by the failure to perform it. The present case comes within the principle above enunciated. Story on Agency, section 454, enunciates the same principle.

The next point urged for the appellant was that the stacking of the gravel on the road was not the proximate cause of the injury done to the plaintiff. The finding of the District Judge in paragraph 7 is against this contention. Mr. Sarma referred to the fact that the road was 27 feet in width and that the projection of the stacked gravel only extended to 9 feet from the base. Even though there was a large margin for travellers to go through, the liability of the Municipality is not lessened by that circumstance. It was pointed out in Queen-Empress v. Bolappa (29) that the passer-by has a right to use the full breadth of the road. See also Wednesbury Corporation v. Lodge Hole Colliery Co. (30). The finding of the learned District Judge disposes of any contention regarding contributory negligence. It was not disputed that no red lights warning passers-by were fixed upon the gravel stacked in the road. I find no justification for re-opening the question that the plaintiff was racing along the road when he sustained injury. I must, therefore, disallow this contention also.

The last point related to the amount of damages. A great deal of argument was addressed to us on this subject. There can be no doubt that for two months after the accident the plaintiff was normally discharging his duties. It seems also clear that he neglected a caution conveyed to him by his medical adviser in using his right hand. It was after two months that he was told that he must get his arm set right by a specialist in England. It is open to doubt whether the necessity for going to England would have risen had the plaintiff been more careful or had he been more prompt in getting his injuries redressed. I am, therefore, unable to agree with the District Judge that the cost of going to and returning from England should be charged against the Municipality. On the whole, considering the various items of charges, I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiff's damage should be reduced to Rs. 2,500.

He will be entitled to costs upon the Rs. 2,500 from the appellant. The appellant will bear his own costs. The decree of the District Judge will be modified to this extent. In other respects the second appeal will be dismissed.

NAPIER, J.—This is an appeal from the decision of the District Judge of Vizagapatam, confirming the decision of the Temporary Subordinate Court of Vizagapatam awarding damages to the plaintiff against the Municipal Council of Vizagapatam, in respect of injuries received by the plaintiff through the faulty condition of the road under the defendant's control. The lower Appellate Court has found that the injuries were caused owing to the plaintiff being thrown from his motor-bicycle in consequence of collision with a heap of gravel projecting 9 feet into the roadway which was left unprotected by a light during the night. It has also found that there was no contributory negligence in the plaintiff. The District Judge has awarded him damages to the amount of Rs. 4,180-15 0.

To these findings and to this amount of damages several objections have been raised in this Court. The first is, that no suit will lie against a Municipal Council in respect of any such injuries; the second is that even if a suit will lie, the liability is confined to a narrow class of public or private bodies to which the defendant Municipality does not belong; the third is, that the Council are protected by the fact that they employed a competent contractor and that the most that can be charged against them is a non-feasance; and the fourth is, that the greater part of the damages is too remote. The first objection is said to be based on the decision of this Court in Secretary of State v. Cockcraft (1) which, it is contended, lays down that the making of roads by Government is an act done in exercise of sovereign powers; and it is sought to apply that doctrine to the present case by the argument that Municipal bodies act only as agents of the State in respect of such matters. In my opinion the decision is not an authority for the broad proposition asserted. That case decided that the provisions and maintenance of a military road is a function of Government carried on in exercise of sovereign powers and that accordingly a person who receives injuries owing to the negligence of a servant of Government in stacking gravel on such a road cannot recover in a suit against the Secretary of State. I am not prepared, without further argument, to accept the proposition that the making of all roads and the repairing of all roads by the State is necessarily an act in exercise of sovereign powers. But I reserve my opinion on this subject until the point comes for decision before me. But even if it be so, the proposed extension of the principle to the making and repairing of roads by a statutory body seems to be without foundation.

Mr. Sarma in his able argument before us assumed, I think too lightly, that a statutory body acts as an agent of the State and thus comes within the protection accorded by that decision to the State and its servants. The foundation of this protection is set out in the case under consideration and in the decision in P. & O. S. N. Co. v. Secretary of State for India (16) which was followed. The proposition shortly stated is that by operation of Statutes the same protection is given to the Secretary of State and his servants in respect of torts committed by them in the exercise of the functions of sovereign powers as is granted to the Crown and its servants in respect of all torts, and that a suit will no more lie against the former than a petition of right will lie against the Crown or a suit against its servants. During the course of the argument, I asked for any authority from England that statutory bodies, in whom roads and the right to repair are vested, came under the potection given to the servants of the Crown, and the learned Vakil was unable to give me any. I am unable to see how a statutory body can be said to be either the servant or the agent of the Crown unless it is so constituted by the provisions in the Act.

It may be that prior to the introduction of legislation in this country, where the East India Company granted a charter to a body to exercise such functions, such body might be an agent or servant of the Company, but bearing in mind the cases in which such bodies holding charters from the Crown have been held responsible in England, I should be slow to accept even this proposition. I would especially refer to the case of the Mayor & Burgesses of Lyme Regis v. Henley (31). There the borough of Lyme Regis held by Letters Patent from the King a certain pier on condition, among others, that they should repair and maintain it as necessary. The plaintiff's premises having been injured by the sea in consequence of the disrepair of the pier, he brought a suit against the Mayor and Burgesses. It was held that the obligation to repair being one which concerned the public, an indictment would lie in case of non-repair against the Mayor and Burgesses for their general default, and an action on the case for a direct and particular damage sustained in consequence by an individual. Throughout the argument of Counsel I can find no trace of the theory of agency, nor is it suggested in the judgment of the Court.

With regard to a statutory body it seems to me to be impossible to suggest that they are servants or agents. They are not appointed by Government, but are created by the Legislature. Mr. Sarma argues from the language of the District Municipalities Act that Government has power to suspend. That is undoubtedly so, but that power, like the body itself, is the creation of the Statute and must be exercised within the limits imposed. Without such a statutory power the Government could not dissolve or suspend a statutory body and it seems to me beside the question to examine, as the learned Vakil has asked us to do, the sections of the Act for the purpose of ascertaining the rights that are vested in Government. I, therefore, hold that the doctrine pressed on us has no application to this case.

The next point is that only a narrow class of public or private bodies can be made liable. This argument is founded on observations in two old cases, Parnaby v. Lancaster Canal Company (2) and Mersey Docks Trustees v. Gibbs (3). In the first case it was held that a common law liability arose in a Canal Company which took tolls for navigation to use reasonable care in making the navigation secure, and in the second case, that a private person or a company having a right to levy tolls in respect of performance of a particular work would be liable in damages for injuries occasioned by performing it improperly. In neither case, however, is it stated that the absence of profit or tolls would have made a difference in the decision of the case, and even assuming that that view was taken in these earlier cases, and even if that is good law at the present time, it can have no application to public bodies as appears from other decisions by the House of Lords to which I shall now refer. The first is a decision of the Privy Council in the Bathurst Borough v. Macpherson (32). That was a suit arising out of injuries caused to the plaintiff by a non-repair of a drain. Some doubt has been cast on this case in later decisions, but not on the point now under consideration. The next is another decision of the Privy Council in Gibraltar Sanitary Commissioners v. Orfila (7). In this case, the Board repudiated the liability of the Commissioners, but in neither case did their Lordships consider the bearing of the question whether these public bodies levied a toll. Later cases are Cowley v. Newmarket Local Board (33), Pictou Municipality v. Geldert (34) and Sydney Municipal Council v. Bourke (35), the last two being decisions of the Privy Council. In none of these was this ground even argued. If, therefore, this principle has any application in these days, it must be confined to private bodies, such as the Canal Company and the Dock Company.

The next point taken was that the Municipality had been at most guilty of a mere non-feasance for which they are not legally responsible, and that any misfeasance found was that of a contractor for which the Municipality was not responsible, Mr. Sarma argued that the only breach of duty which could be laid in this case was under section 172 of the District Municipalities Act, which requires that a Municipal Council shall during the repair of any street take proper precautions for guarding against accidents and shall cause every such street during its repair to be sufficiently lighted and guarded during night. He wished us to read that section with section 173 as applying to the facts of this case. Section 173 provides that no person shall cause any obstruction in any street, without the written permission of the Chairman and that when such permission is granted, such person shall take proper steps to prevent accidents. His argument was that a contractor executing repairs to a road under the orders of the Council was a person to whom section 173 applied. I am clearly of opinion that this section has no application. It has reference to temporary obstructions to a thoroughfare by the erecting of pandals or arches by a private person, a procedure with which we are familiar. All the sections grouped together under Chapter IV, streets (a) refer to projections and obstructions created by private persons, and have nothing whatever to do with execution of repairs by employees of the Municipality itself. This argument therefore fails, and in this view I do not think it necessary to discuss at any length the difficult question whether a public body is liable for mere non-feasance. It was undoubtedly so held in a case above referred to, Bathurst Borough v. Macpherson (32), where the liability was put on the broad proposition that neglect to repair a drain caused a nuisance in the highway for which the borough was liable, and their Lordships expressly say that there is no principle upon which a distinction in this respect between non-feasance and misfeasance can be supported. There are, however, later cases, such as the Pictou Municipality case (34) and the Sydney Municipality case (35) above referred to, which directly negative that view, and draw a distinction which, the Board in the earlier case said, should not be drawn. The question will require fuller consideration in the light of the latest decisions of the Board when it arises necessarily for decision before this Court. In my opinion the liability of the Council must rest on the admitted fact that a heap of gravel was thrown on to the side of the road and allowed to project 9 feet into the roadway. This is an undoubted misfeasance. The question is, whether the fact that it was done by an independent contractor will protect the defendant. Mr. Sarma relied strongly on the case of Daniel v. Metropolitan Ry. (36). The injury caused to the plaintiff in that case was due to the fall of an iron girder on a train, which girder was being erected by a contractor. The decision was that the accident was not one which the company was bound to anticipate and against which it was bound to take precautions. Although there are observations in the judgments of the learned Lords about persons over whom the railway contractors have no control, I have no doubt that the basis of the decision in that case was absence of any negligence, that being at all events the only ground on which Lord Colonsay bases his decision. At all events all the learned Lords agree in holding that there was no misfeasance by the contractor. The true proposition seems to me to be contained in the proposition laid down in Gibraltar Sanitary Commissioners v. Orfila (7), with the corollary to be found in the language of Lord Blackburn in Dalton v. Angus (28). The first case decides that the powers conferred on a body created by Statute must be executed with due care. In the absence of contrary intention its duties and liabilities are the same as those imposed by the general law on a private person doing the same thing. And the corollary is as follows:—A person causing something to be done, the doing of which casts on him a duty, cannot escape from responsibility attaching on him of seeing that duty performed by delegating that to a contractor. He may bargain with the contractor that he shall perform the duty and stipulate for an indemnity from him if it is not performed. But he cannot thereby relieve himself from liability to those injured by the failure to perform it. This proposition of law was quoted by Lindley, L. J. in Harda Ker v Idle District Council (23) and treated as an authoritative exposition on the law. In that case the District Council employed a contractor to construct a certain sewer. In consequence of his negligence in carrying out the work a gas main was broken with the result that an explosion took place by which injury was caused to the wife of the plaintiff and to his premises. The Court of Appeal presided over by that eminent Judge mentioned held that the District Council were responsible for the contractor's negligence. Lindley (L. J.) in paraphrasing Lord Blackburn's view says, that in Hughes v. Percival (37), Lord Blackburn points out that the employer's duty was to see that his contractor did his work properly and adds, "Lord Watson, in the same case, said the same thing." The doctrine was applied to a later case which is on all fours with the present case. That is Penny v. Wimbledon Urban District Council (38), which is also a decision of the Court of Appeal. There their Lordships pointed out the limitation to the doctrine which will also be found in Lord Blackburn's judgment. They say that where the act of negligence is a mere casual or collateral act, such as a workman employed on the work negligently leaving a pick-axe or such like on the road, the Council would not be responsible for that negligence of the contractor's servant. That is the proposition of law stated in Pickard v. Smith (26). But the Court held it had no application to a case where a statutory authority has power to do something to a road which will make it dangerous while it is being done, for then there is a duty cast upon them to take care that the Queen's subjects are not injured by any carelessness in the doing of that which has to be done, whether that action be the action of their own servants or of an independent contractor. This decision and the principles stated in it cover the present case exactly. I am therefore of opinion that the employment of a contractor did not relieve the Council of their liability.

On the question of remoteness of damage I do not think it necessary to say anything more than that I agree with my learned brother on this point, that the damages should be reduced to the sum of Rs. 2,500. The decree will be in the terms proposed by him.

DINABANDHU PANDA—PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

C. P. Tenancy Act (XI of 1898), ss. 35, 36, 46, 47, 95—"Transfer," meaning of "Surrender," whether transfer—Surrender of tenancy in favour of co-sharer landlord—Lambardar, whether can apply for possession—Suit for possession by landlord who obtained surrender, whether barred—Jurisdiction.

The transfer contemplated by section 46 of the Central Provinces Tenancy Act must be either a sale or a gift or a mortgage or a sub-lease, and the words "otherwise transfer" must be limited to transactions of a similar nature. A surrender is in no sense a transfer, much less a transfer within the meaning of section 46. [p. 318, col. 2.]

The Central Provinces Tenancy Act, while making provision for the recovery of possession of a holding by the heir of a surrendering tenant, makes no provision for such recovery by a co-sharer landlord. [p. 318, col. 2.]

The institution of a suit for ejectment against a purchaser of a holding is not one of the duties which a lambardar can be held to have to perform as the representative of the proprietary body. He has no authority to represent the co-sharers for the purpose of ejectment before a Revenue Officer. [p. 319, col. 1.]

Plaintiffs Nos. 1 to 8 were co-sharer landlords with defendant who was also the lambardar. Certain tenants surrendered the lands in suit to plaintiffs Nos. 1 to 8, and the latter leased them to plaintiffs Nos. 9 to 12. Defendant then applied to the Revenue Officer under sections 46 and 47 of the Central Provinces Tenancy Act to be put in possession as landlord of the disputed lands, and his application was allowed. Plaintiffs then brought a suit in a Civil Court for declaration and possession.

Held, (1) that the surrender was not a transfer within the meaning of section 46 of the Central Provinces Tenancy Act and that the defendant had, therefore, no right to make an application under sections 46 and 47 of the Act; [p. 318, col. 2; p. 319, col. 1.]

(2) that section 95 of the Central Provinces Tenancy Act was no bar to the suit. [p. 319, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.

MULLICK, J.—The plaintiffs Nos. 1 to 8

are co-sharer landlords of a Gaontiahi village with defendant No. 1, who is also the lambardar appointed by Government.

It appears that certain tenants surrendered the lands in suit to plaintiffs Nos. 1 to 8, and that these plaintiffs thereupon leased the lands to plaintiffs Nos. 9 to 12. When that was done defendant No. 1, the lambardar, applied under sections 46 and 47 of the Central Provinces Tenancy Act to be put in possession as landlord of the disputed lands. The Revenue Officer allowed the prayer, and the present suit has been brought by the plaintiffs in the Civil Court for a declaration that they have a proprietary right in the lands and are entitled to recover them from defendant No. 1; and in the alternative there is a proposal for joint possession with the defendant No. 1 to the extent of the shares of plaintiffs Nos. 1 to 8.

The Munsif found that the Civil Court had no jurisdiction to entertain this suit by reason of section 95 of the Central Provinces Tenancy Act.

The learned Subordinate Judge in appeal was of a contrary opinion and held that the suit was maintainable, and he has remanded it to the Munsif for further hearing.

Now section 35 of the Central Provinces Tenancy Act makes provision for the surrender of a holding by a tenant.

Section 36 provides that in cases of surrender the next heir of the surrendering tenant will, upon application to the Revenue Officer, be entitled under certain circumstances to be put in possession. It is to be noticed that this section makes no provision for surrender by a tenant to a co-sharer landlord and recovery of possession by the remaining landlords.

Then section 46 of the Act provides that when an occupancy tenant sells his holding or makes a gift of it or mortgages it or sub lets it for a period exceeding one year, or otherwise transfers his rights in the holding or in any portion thereof, every such sale, gift, mortgage, sub lease, or transfer shall be voidable in the manner and to the extent provided by the section.

Section 47 provides that when a transfer is made by an occupancy tenant, contrary to the provisions of section 46, the landlord from whom the tenant held the land may, on application to a Revenue Officer made within two years from the date on which the transfer was made, be placed in possession under certain circumstances.

On behalf of the appellant before us it is contended that he was competent as lambardar to make an application under section 47, and that the order of the Revenue Officer being final, and no civil suit being allowed by the Act for the purpose of setting aside that order, section 95 is a complete bar to the present suit.

In order to bring himself within the provisions of section 46 it is necessary for the learned Vakil for the appellant to establish that the surrender in this case was a transfer within the meaning of section 46. Now the transfer contemplated by that section must be either a sale or a gift or a mortgage or a sub-lease, and the words "otherwise transfer" must be limited to transactions of a similar nature. A surrender is yielding up by the tenant of his rights to a person who is entitled to the immediate reversion or remainder; in no sense can it be called a transfer, much less a transfer within the meaning of section 46. The Act, while it makes provision for the recovery of possession by the heir of a surrendering tenant, makes no provision for such recovery by a co-sharer landlord, and to read section 43 as creating such a right would, in my opinion, lead to an absurd result. For if this section applies then the co-sharer who accepts a surrender can only be ejected if he joins in his own ejectment, inasmuch as the word "landlord" in the section means the whole body of joint owners.

But then it is contended that the lambardar, representing the whole body of landlords, is entitled to eject, upon his own authority, without the consent or leave of the co-sharer who has accepted the surrender.

There is no justification for this contention. So far as the prayer for ejectment is concerned, be it in a suit before a Civil Court or an application before a Revenue Officer, the entire body of landlords must be represented; and, if the lambardar seeks to prosecute such a claim, he can only do so as the agent for the entire body. In the case under consideration he must, therefore, represent the very co-sharer who accepted the surrender in the first instance, and the same absurdity results.

Moreover, the position of the lambardar has been the subject of judicial authority and it is only necessary to refer to the case of Nilmani Guntia v. Jogendra Guntia (1), where their Lordships of the Calcutta High Court have ruled that section 138 of the Central Provinces Land Revenue Act does not give the lambardar power to eject trespassers from lands or to eject tenants. Section 11 of the Act defines a lambardar as a person appointed in the manner prescribed by the Act to represent the proprietary body of a mahal in its relations with Government. The institution of a suit for ejectment against a purchaser is not one of the duties which the lambardar can be held to have to perform as the representative of the co-sharers. In my opinion, therefore, it is clear that the lambardar has no authority to represent the co-sharers for the purpose of ejectment before the Revenue Officer.

The result is that upon the ground that the surrender by the plaintiffs Nos. 1 to 8 was not a transfer within the purview of sections 46 and 47 of the Central Provinces Tenancy Act, I hold that section 95 has no application. The order putting defendant No. 1 into possession was ultra vires, and the plaintiff is entitled to maintain the suit. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Contract Act (IX of 1872), ss 30, 65—Wagering contract—Suit for recovery of deposit made as security for performance of contract, maintainability of—Void contracts, money paid under, when recoverable.

A suit lies for recovery of money deposited by a party to a wagering contract as security for the performance of his part of the contract. The direct prohibition contained in section 30 of the Contract Act does not cover such a claim. [p. 320, col. 1.]

The words 'entrusted to any person to abide the result of a game etc.,' in section 30 refer only to moneys deposited with stakeholders. [p. 320, col. 1.]

The general principle is that a plaintiff whose hands have not been tainted by corruption and who has not committed any act which fixes him with having been a party to a fraud is entitled to get back the money which he left with another. [p. 320, col. 2.]

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge, Cocanada, in Appeal Suit No. 129 of 1914, preferred against that of the Court of the District Munsif, Cocanada, in Original Suit No. 338 of 1912.

Mr. T. R. Ramachandra Aiyar, for the Appellant.

Mr. B. Narasimha Row, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—We accept the finding that the contract was a wagering one. The further question is whether the money deposited by the plaintiff with the defendant as the security for the performance of his part of the contract is recoverable. There is no question of limitation.

The lower Courts held that section 65 of the Contract Act was applicable to he transaction. We are unable to agree with them. Section 30 makes a wagering contract void ab initio and to such a class of contracts section 65 has no application. In Ledu v. Hira Lal Base 1) this view was taken. Despite the inclination of the learned Judges of the Bombay High Court in the earlier cases to apply section 65 to such contracts, the later view is in agreement with the Calcutta view. See Parshottam Veribhai v. Chhotrasangji Madhavsangji (2). In this Court, Oldfield and Bakewell, JJ., held in Srinivasa Aiyar v. Sesha Iyer (3) that section 65 does not cover monies paid under a marriage brokerage contract. That principle is applicable to the present case. The question still remains whether the plaintiff is entitled to sue for the recovery of the money paid by him in furtherance of the contract of wager. We are clear that the direct prohibition contained in section 30 does not prevent such a claim. This is not a suit to recover any money "won on any wager", nor is the suit to recover money "entrusted to any person to abide the result of any game or other uncertain event on which any wager is made." In our opinion this latter clause applies only to cases of monies left with stakeholders. It may be, as Mr. Ramachandra Iyer suggested, that the money is sometimes left with one of the parties to the contract on account of his solvency or respectability. But the position he would occupy with reference to the money so paid will be that of a stakeholder. The entrustment referred to in the section can have no meaning when the money is left as a security for the due performance of the contract. We, therefore, hold that section 30 does not prohibit the maintainability of such a suit.

(1) 29 Ind. Cas. 625; 43 C. 115; 21 C. L. J. 537; 19 C. W. N. 919.

This takes us to the general right of parties whose monies are in the hands of another without the latter having any right to retain them. Ordinarily the person who paid the money is entitled to claim it back. But there may be such a conduct on the part of the person paying it as to disentitle him from recovering it; one instance is that of being a party to the perpetrated fraud. Another instance is where moral turpitude is attributable to the person who paid the money. The decision in Ledu v. Hira Lal Bose (1) is an illustration of the latter class of cases. The observations of the learned Judges in that case show that if there is no moral delinquency, the plaintiff can sue to recover. Gulabchand Paramchand v. Fulbai Harichand (4) and Haribhai Hansji v. Nathubhai Ratnaji (5) lay down the same principle.

These decisions derive support from a catena of English decisions which have held that even against a stakeholder a suit for money will lie if he had not parted with the stake money and the claim is founded not on the result of the wager. It is an a fortiori conclusion from these authorities that where money is not left with a stakeholder nor entrusted on condition that its disposal is to be determined by the result of the uncertain event, the money deposited as security must be returned. Hampden v. Walsh (6), O'Sullivan v. Thomas (7), Burge v. Ashley (8) enunciates the proposition we have referred to.

In our opinion the general principle that a plaintiff whose hands have not been tainted by corruption and who has not committed any act which fixes him with having been a party to a fraud is entitled to get back the money which he left with another is applicable to the present case. We uphold the judgment of the Courts below on this ground and dismiss the second appeal with costs.

The memorandum of objections is also dismissed with costs.

EMPEROR—RESPONDENT.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 298, 299, 164—Trial by Jury—Functions of Judge and Jury—Misdirection—Expressions assuming guilt of accused, propriety of—Evidence Act (I of 1872), ss. 24, 25, 26, 27—S. 27, whether controls s. 24—Confession of co-accused, admissibility of—Supplementary statements by accused during verification proceedings, admissibility of.

In a trial by Jury the Sessions Judge admitted as evidence confessional statements of the accused made to the Police which were not strictly within the limits laid down by section 27 of the Evidence Act, and also allowed the Committing Magistrate to depose to statements made by the accused in the course of a proceeding undertaken by him for verifying the confession—statements which were at no time recorded by the Magistrate in accordance with the provisions of section 164, Criminal Procedure Code:

Held, that the trial was vitiated by misdirections so that the conviction of the accused and the sentence passed upon him must be set aside and the case re-tried by the Sessions Court. [p. 324, col. 2; p. 326, col. 2.]

Per Teunon, J.—In a trial by Jury the Judge's treatment of a confession, though onesided to some extent, may not by itself be a sufficient misdirection to the Jury to necessitate a re-trial. [p. 322, col. 2.]

The Judge's instruction to the Jury to take into consideration against an accused statements of co-accused as their "confessions or confessional statements or confessions of a sort", when as a matter of fact those statements were not self-incriminating, amounts to a misdirection. [p. 322, col. 2.]

It is a misdirection for a Judge to leave it to the Jury to decide whether certain statements or confessions made by the accused and how much thereof are admissible in evidence. It is for the Judge to admit or exclude evidence in accordance with the law on the subject and for the Jury to weigh and value the evidence admitted. [p. 323, col. 2.]

A Judge in his charge to the Jury should avoid, as far as may be, the use of expressions which assume the guilt of the accused and must not indulge in the use of slang or colloquial phrases [p. 324, cols. 1 & 2.]

Verification proceedings undertaken by a Magistrate in the presence of the accused, with a view to testing the truth of his confession and to obtain evidence either corroborating the confession or indicating its falsity, are not wholly illegal; but the verifying Magistrate cannot be permitted to depose to statements said to have been made to him by the accused in the course of the verification proceedings, where such statements are not recorded by him in the manner provided by section 164, Criminal Procedure Code. [p. 322, col 2; p. 323, col. 1.]

Section 27 of the Evidence Act qualifies not only sections 26 and 25 but also section 24. Therefore, when a confession as a whole is excluded, whether by reason of the provisions of section 26 or of section 25 or of section 24, so much of the information given by the person making the confession when he was an accused and in custody as distinctly relates to a relevant fact thereby discovered becomes admissible. [p. 323, col. 2; p 324, col. 1.]

Under section 27 of the Evidence Act so much of the information as set the Police in motion and led to the "discovery" is admissible. It does not matter whether the accused himself produced the articles said to be discovered by his statement or confession. [p. 324, col. 1.]

Per Shamsul Huda, J.—Section 24 of the Evidence Act does not control section 27. If a single statement made by the accused contains more information than what is contemplated in section 24, the statement is not to go in as a whole nor is it to go in as a statement at all, but what is admissible is the particular information given by the statement which has led to the discovery. [p. 325, cols. 1 & 2.]

The verification of a confession by taking the accused to various places referred to in the confession lends itself to great abuses and should be avoided. There is perhaps nothing objectionable if a verification is made independently of the confessing accused and unaided by him. [p. 326, col. 1.]

It would be difficult to hold that the supplemental statements made by the confessing accused in the course of the verification proceedings were voluntary even where they are recorded by the Magistrate in the manner provided in section 164, Criminal Procedure Code. [p. 326, col. 1.]

Appeal against the conviction and sentence passed by the Second Additional Sessions Judge, Mymensingh, dated the 9th May 1917.

Babus Dasarathi Sanyal and Jotindra Mohan Choudhury, for the Appellant.

Mr. Orr (Deputy Legal Remembrancer), for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

TEUNON, J.—In this case the appellant before us has been convicted of dacoity and sentenced under section 395, Indian Penal Code, to rigorous imprisonment for five years.

The trial was by Jury in the Court of the 2nd Additional Sessions Judge of Mymensing and what has been urged before us is that the trial has been vitiated by the erroneous admission of evidence and by serious misdirections in the learned Judge's charge.

It appears that on the night of the 24th of November 1916, at a village called Rajoi, a serious dacoity took place in the houses of two cousins Rajendra and Debendra Bhoumik. From the house of Debendra cash, currency notes, ornaments and other articles to an aggregate value of over

Rs. 9,000 and from Rajendra's house cash and other property to the value of some Rs. 800, are said to have been removed.

In connection with this dacoity and with a dacoity that took place in village Baliapara about a month before, the appellant, it appears, came into touch with the Police on the 26th of November. On the 28th of that month two persons of the name of Zahir and Piru, and on the 29th a third man named Maniruddin were arrested. Thereafter also on the 29th, the appellant was himself arrested.

It is next said that all the four persons so arrested made confessions to certain Police Officers, and that the confessions so made led to certain discoveries.

On the following day, 30th November, all four were produced before a Deputy Magistrate to whom appellant made a confession and Zahir and Piru made statements. On the 3rd of December, the Deputy Magistrate, who recorded the statements, next proceeded to verify the appellant's confession and in the course of these verifications proceedings, which continued to the 5th December, appellant, it is said, made additional statements.

Ultimately all four accused were placed on their trial, and all four have been convicted. We are, however, not concerned with Piru, Zahir and Maniruddin, whose cases are not before us.

I shall now deal with the objections that have been taken before us to the trial as conducted by the learned Judge.

The 1st objection or series of objections refers to the confession made by the appellant himself on the 30th November. It is urged in the 1st place that the Sessions Judge has not sufficiently placed before the Jury the circumstances which militate against the value of the confession, such as (a) the interval between arrest and the making of the confession, in other words, the period spent in Police custody, (b) facts indicating that the appellant had been led to believe that he would be made an approver, (c) the attempts made in portions of the confession to extenuate the appellant's own share in the crime and (d) the discrepancy between the sums or value stolen and the sums recovered. It has also been urged that the Judge should have excluded or directed the Jury to discard from their consideration the first portion of the confession in which the appellant speaks of the earlier dacoity at Balipara. In my judgment the Judge would have grievously erred had he excluded any portion of the confession, and the fact that he put the whole of the confession before the Jury detracts from the argument that he did not invite special attention to passages in which, for instance, he speaks of persuasion or of his rescue of a child from spoliation. Similarly the learned Judge has in fact dealt with the question of inducement. Thus, though it may be said with some reason that the Judge's treatment of the confession is to some extent one-sided, for instance in putting to the Jury such questions as these, "is not the production.....material corroboration" ....."do they not afford sufficient corroboration", and in treating the use in the confession of English expressions (which is merely consistent with evidence previously obtained) as having the value of independent corroboration, yet such misdirections as there are in this connection would not in my opinion have been sufficient by themselves to necessitate a re-trial.

It is next urged that the Judge has erred in instructing the Jury to take into consideration as against the appellant the statements made by Zahir and Piru to the Magistrate on the 30th of November. He has throughout spoken of these statements as "confessions", "confessional statements" or "confessions of a sort," but when we examine them we find that they are not self-incriminating statements. In speaking of them as confessions and in saying that they "should" be taken into consideration as against the appellant, the Judge, it is clear, must have misled the Jury.

In the third place it is contended that the so-called verification proceedings are illegal and that no evidence regarding them should have been admitted. This contention is based largely on the observations to be found in the judgments in the case of Emperor v. Radhe Halwai (1), but I do not understand that case or any other case to lay down that such proceedings are wholly illegal. They are undertaken, it would seem, with a view to testing the truth of a confession and to obtain evidence either corroborating the confession or indicating its falsity. In so far at least as such evidence may be obtained, for instance, in ascertaining that the prisoner is familiar with, or wholly ignorant of, the localities of which he has spoken, or in furnishing clues to further enquiry, such proceedings may be useful. In connection with such proceedings the main concern of the Courts would seem to be to ensure that evidence not strictly admissible is not admitted. In the present case that precaution has not been taken, for we find that the verifying Magistrate has been permitted to speak to statements said to have been made to him in the course of his proceedings. Such additional statements being statements made in the course of an investigation, when not recorded in the manner provided in section 164 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, are, in my opinion, inadmissible. If further authority for this proposition is required it is to be found in the cases of Queen Empress v. Bhairab Chunder Chuckerbutty (2) (though I am not to be understood as agreeing in the distinction therein drawn between a statement and a confession); Emperor v. Radhe Halwai (1) and King-Emperor v. Rajani Kanto Koer (3).

Lastly very serious objection has been properly taken to the manner in which the Sessions Judge has dealt with the confessions said to have been made by the appellant and the co accused to the Police in the course of the Police investigation. It is unnecessary and it would be all but impossible to enumerate in detail the errors committed by the learned Judge in this connection. He has admitted in evidence and placed before the Jury the whole history so to speak of the investigation. He has permitted the Police Officers and other witnesses, introducing inter alia much hearsay matter, to describe the steps and processes by which they obtained and worked up clues and finally succeeded, in the Judge's language, "in tracking and trapping the culprit" and finally in "bagging" the accused on their trial.

The confessions having led, it is said, to discoveries, he has next admitted in evidence not merely so much as led directly to the discovery or related directly to the fact discovered but practically the whole of each such statement, including such matter as this, "Maniruddin named one Amiruddin (i.e. the appellant), while Zahir did not... Maniruddin and Zahir were confronted and Zahir when thus confronted had to admit that Amiruddin was also in the gang," and again, "Amiruddin asked to be confronted with Piru, Zahir and Maniruddin, to tell them to their faces what articles they each had got in their shares."

He has next in effect directed the Jury that the statements which he has thus erroneously admitted could and should be used not merely against the maker but against his co-accused. In another respect also the Sessions Judge has dealt erroneously with this part of the case. He has expounded to the Jury the provisions of sections 24 to 30 of the Evidence Act, and has next left it to the Jury to "scrutinize the confessions and the other evidence" in the light of that exposition. If in this portion of the charge he intended, as he apparently did, to leave it to the Jury to decide, whether the statements or confessions made to the Magistrate and how much of the confessions said to have been made to the Police Officers were admissible, he has clearly thrown upon the Jury the duty which the law lays on him. It is for the Judge to admit or exclude evidence in accordance with the law on that subject, and for the Jury to weigh and value the evidence admitted.

I have next to consider two criticisms which have been advanced in connection with this part of the case and do not appear to me to be well founded.

It is said that the Sessions Judge is wrong in his view that section 27 of the Evidence Act applies to and qualifies section 24 and section 25, as well as section 26. Whether as regards section 24 the question strictly arises has not been made clear, inasmuch as it has not been shown to us that discoveries resulted or are said to have resulted from confessions other than confessions made to Police Officers, or when in the custody of Police Officers and not in the immediate presence of a Magistrate. If, however, the question does arise, in that case I am of opinion that section 27 qualifies not only section 26 and section 25, but also section 24. All three sections lay down general rules excluding confessions. It is, in my opinion, unnecessary to discuss the policy which has led to the enactment of these rules. It is sufficient to say that the same broad grounds or principles appear to underlie all three. In section 27 follows an exception. The reason for making or providing this exception applies alike to each of the three preceding general rules. If the exception had been intended to apply only to section 26 or only to sections 26 and 25, we should have expected to find this intention expressly stated or to find the exception embodied in those two sections or in section 26 alone. Further the position of section 28, which is also in the nature of an exception to section 24, supports this view. I, therefore, hold that when a confession as a whole is excluded, whether by reason of the provisions of section 26 or of section 25 or of section 24, so much of the information given by the person making the confession, when accused and in custody, as distinctly relates to a relevant fact thereby discovered becomes admissible.

(2) 2 C. W. N. 702 at p. 703.
(3) 8 C. W. N. 22; 1 Cr. L. J. 10.

It has next been contended that when an accused himself produces the articles said to be discovered, any anterior statement made by him is inadmissible. I am unable to assent to this contention. On the contrary I agree with the view taken in Queen-Empress v. Nana (4) and in Legal Remembrancer v. Chema Nashya (5) that in such cases so much of the information as "set the Police in motion and led to the discovery" is admissible. Even so, that does not in the present case render admissible evidence to the effect that when a certain pot had been fished out, Amiruddin, when pouring out the ornaments, said: "I got these ornaments in my share in the Rajoi dacoity." That statement obviously led to the discovery.

In conclusion I have to point out to the Additional Sessions Judge that in his charge to the Jury he should avoid as far as may be the use of expressions which assume the guilt of the accused. I have already had occasion to deprecate his use of the interrogative method, and more particularly his addressing to the Jury questions couched in the form "is not this" or "does not that" and the like. Lastly, I cannot condemn too strongly his use of slang or colloquial phrases such as "tracking and trapping" or "bagging" culprits; more especially when applied to the persons then on their trial.

For the reasons given in our several judgments we agree that we have no alternative but to set aside the conviction and sentence in the present case and direct that the appellant be re-tried. The re-trial will be in the Court of the Sessions Judge.

SHAMSUL HUDA, J.—In this case three important questions of law have been argued before us. The first question is whether section 24 of the Evidence Act controls section 27 or is controlled by it or in other words, whether information given to a Police Officer by an accused person which may have led to a discovery within the meaning of section 27 can be used as evidence in case such information is proved to have been obtained by any inducement, threat, or promise, such as under section 24 would make a confession inadmissible. The question is res integra so far as this Court is concerned, but there is an important decision of the Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court in Queen-Empress v. Babu Lal (6), in which the question whether section 27 controls section 25 of the Evidence Act was fully discussed and that decision has an important bearing on the decision of the present question. It was held by the majority of the Full Bench that section 27 controlled section 25, while the opposite view, viz., that it was a proviso to the next preceding section only was maintained in an equally exhaustive judgment by Mahmood, J. The reasons given for and against the view that section 27 controls section 25 also apply with equal force to the question whether that section likewise controls section 24. Although at first sight it may appear somewhat anomalous that an accused person should be prejudiced by a statement made by him even against his own will, for it infringes one of the fundamental principles of law that an act done by a person against his own will is not his act, there is on the other hand the consideration that by whatever means obtained, the statement receives a guarantee of its authenticity by the corroboration which the discovery lends to it. The considerations for and against the admissibility of such statement may be said to be equally balanced. If the policy of exclusion embodied in sections 25 and 26 is based on the unreliability of Police Officers deposing to incriminating statements made by accused persons, by reason of their being specially interested in the detection of crime and by reason of the corrupt practices that prevailed in those days, the danger is largely removed by the confirmation afforded by the 'discovery.' If, on the other hand, the exclusion is based on a desire to remove all temptations in the way of Police Officers to obtain confessions by inducement, threat or torture the 'discovery' does not remove the danger. That both these considerations had their share in determining the provisions of sections 25 and 26 cannot be doubted. The fact, however, that sections 25, 26 and 27 existed in the Code of Criminal Procedure uncontrolled by any express provisions such as we now have in section 24 of the Evidence Act, may suggest the inference that by transferring those three sections from the Code of Criminal Procedure to the Evidence Act, no change in the law was intended to be introduced. But this argument is clearly fallacious, as section 24 laid down no new principle but embodied a well established principle regulating the admissibility of confessions, and even before it was formally enacted as a rule of law in this country the principle governed these provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code even before their transfer to the Evidence Act of 1872. It appears, however, that the general principle derived from the English law was even under that law modified, so as to negative its application to confessions leading to 'discovery.'* I think, therefore, we ought to be guided by the decision of the majority of the Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court and hold that section 24 does not control section 27.

(4) 14 B. 260 (F. B.); 7 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 632.
(5) 25 C. 418; 2 C. W. N. 257; 13 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 274.

The next question for consideration is the extent to which information falling under section 27 can be given in evidence. The section itself is clear on that point and no discussion seems necessary. It lays down that only so much of such information, whether it amounts to a confession or not, as relates distinctly to the fact thereby discovered, may be proved. It is noticeable that the word used is not "statement" but "information", and this seems to suggest that even if a single statement contains more information than what is contemplated in section 24, the statement is not to go in as a whole nor is it to go in as a statement at all, but what is admissible is the particular information given by the statement which has led to the discovery. If, therefore, an accused person were to state to a Police Officer that he killed A with a knife and concealed the dead body at a particular place, all that is admissible is the information that he had concealed the dead body in that place, but the further information that he himself had killed A is not admissible under section 27.

It was pointed out by Straight, J., in the case of Queen-Empress v. Babu Lal (6) that "where a statement is being detailed by a constable as having been made by an accused in consequence of which he discovered a certain fact or certain facts, the strictest precision should be enjoined on the witness, so that there may be no room for mistake or misunderstanding." This question was fully discussed by a Full Bench of the Bombay High Court in Queen-Empress v. Nana (4). In the present case it is clear that the investigating Police Officer was allowed to disclose in his evidence a great deal more than is contemplated by section 27.

The last question for consideration is the propriety of the procedure adopted by the Deputy Magistrate Maulvi Abu Ali Chowdhury for the purpose of verifying the confession of the accused Amiruddin. It appears that after recording the confession of the accused in the regular manner this officer took the accused with him to various places referred to in the confession for purposes of verification, and in the course of such verification Amiruddin seems to have supplemented his former recorded confession by other statements of an incriminating nature, and the learned Deputy Magistrate was allowed at the trial to depose to these other statements of Amiruddin though they were never recorded at any time under section 164 of the Criminal Procedure Code. I am clearly of opinion that these additional statements could not be used as evidence against the accused. As authorities for this view, I may refer to the decisions of this Court in Queen-Empress v. Bhairab Chunder Chuckerbutty (2) and King-Emperor v. Rajani Kanto Koer (3) and of the Madras High Court in Queen-Empress v. Viran (7). Apart from the question of legality of the procedure I think I would not be going out of my way if I expressed my concurrence with the views expressed by Prinsep and Geidt, JJ., in the case of Emperor v. Radhe Halwai (1) on the utility and, propriety of such a procedure.

It seems to me that such a procedure for purposes of verification, confined as such verification must be to facts already stated in a confession recorded in accordance with law would seldom require the presence of the accused. At any rate it was not required in the present case. The presence of the accused naturally leads to questioning, and to an effort to get out of him incriminating statements which under pressure of circumstances he finds himself compelled to make and as to which it cannot be said that it is voluntary. Even, therefore, if the Deputy Magistrate had in this case tried to make these statements admissible in evidence by recording them under section 164, Criminal Procedure Code, after the verification had been completed, I would have found it difficult to hold that the confession was voluntary. I think 'verification' under conditions such as these lends itself to very great abuses and should be avoided. There is perhaps nothing objectionable in a verification made independently of the confessing accused and unaided by him. An accused person should not be placed in a position which necessitates his making incriminating statements and which leads to the creation of evidence against himself. It is the privilege of an accused to say as little as he likes regarding the offence with which he is charged or to say nothing at all, if he is so minded, but it seems to me that the procedure adopted by the verifying officer is an infringement of the privilege. In this respect the Police are in a position materially different from that of a Magistrate, for whereas a statement made to a Police Officer, unless it falls within the provision of section 27 of the Evidence Act, can never be used against an accused, a Magistrate may, if he chooses, record these statements in the manner required by law after the verification procedure is over, and thereby give such record an air of validity which in reality does not attach to it.

I think, therefore, that there was misdirection to the Jury in so far as the learned Judge admitted as evidence confessional statements made to the Police which were not strictly within the limits laid down by section 27 of the Evidence Act and also in so far as he allowed the Deputy Magistrate Mr. Abu Ali Chowdhury to depose to statements made by the accused in the course of the procedure adopted by him for verifying the confession of the accused—statements which were at no time recorded by him in accordance with the provisions of section 164 of the Criminal Procedure Code, and it is highly likely that the admission of such evidence, not legally admissible, has prejudiced the accused in the trial. For these and for other reasons given in the judgment of my learned brother I agree with him in directing a re-trial.

Re-trial ordered.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 14—"Any local area", meaning of—Special Magistrate powers of—Punjab Government Notification No. 99, dated 23rd February 1883.

The words "any local area" in section 14 of the Code of Criminal Procedure can be extended to cover, if necessary, all the territories administered by the Local Government issuing the notification, and are not restricted in their meaning to a local area within a specified District or Sessions Division. [p. 327, cols 1 & 2.]

The Punjab Government Notification No. 99, dated 23rd February 1883, applies equally to a Special Magistrate of the first class appointed under section 14 of the Criminal Procedure Code. [p. 327, col. 2.]

HIRA LAL v. EMPEROR.

Petition for revision of the orders of the Special Magistrate, 1st Class, at Ludhiana, dated the 24th September and the 4th October 1917, framing charges against the petitioner and rejecting his objection that the Court was without jurisdiction.

Mr. Beechey, for the Petitioner.

Lala Mul Chand, R. S., for the Government Advocate, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The petitioner Hira Lal Kapur is being tried by Mr. D. J. Boyd, Magistrate, 1st Class, Ludhiana, upon charges under (1) sections 162 and 163, Indian Penal Code, and (2) sections 162/109 and 168/109, Indian Penal Code, for offences alleged to have been committed by him at Simla. He has applied to this Court through his Counsel, Mr. Beechey, for revision on the ground that the Magistrate trying the case has jurisdiction merely with regard to offences committed within the District of Ludhiana and is, therefore, incompetent to try petitioner upon the present charges and further that in any event he has no jurisdiction to take cognizance of this case on the information of Sardar Bahadur Sukha Singh, Deputy Superintendent of Police, without the consent of the accused. In our opinion neither of these contentions is tenable. Mr Boyd was appointed by the Local Government a "Special Magistrate" under the provisions of section 14, Criminal Procedure Code, and all the powers of a Magistrate of the 1st Class in regard to cases generally throughout the Punjab were conferred upon him for a period of two months from the date of the Notification No. 3548-S., dated the 25th August 1917. Mr. Beechey contends that this notification of the Local Government was ultra vires inasmuch as the words 'any local area' under section 14 of the Code cannot be extended to cover a whole province and ought to be restricted in their meaning to a local area within a specified District or Sessions Division. This argument is, however, no longer open in view of the opinions to the contrary expressed by all six Judges in Lakhmi Chand v. Emperor (1). In that case the Judges were unanimous in holding that the words "local area" could be extended to cover, if necessary, all the territories administered by the Local Government issuing the notification. It is perhaps true that the actual point now in question was not expressly before the learned Judges for determination, but they all considered it and the opinions expressed by them must necessarily carry the greatest weight. The notification which was before them for consideration in 1901 was far wider in its terms inasmuch as no local area at all was specified, but even so the learned Judges by a majority held that the proceedings of the Special Magistrate, Mr. J. G. M. Rennie, ought not to be set aside. On the other hand, they were (as we have already remarked) quite clear that a notification expressed in terms such as those of the notification now before us would be valid and confer jurisdiction on the Special Magistrate throughout the province. The difficulty suggested by Mr. Beechey as regards appeals from the orders of a Special Magistrate having jurisdiction throughout the Punjab does not at present arise, but we see no reason to doubt the correctness of the Madras High Court decision in a similar case, where it was held that the appeal would lie to the Sessions Judge within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the Magistrate was in any particular case holding his Court: Valia Ambu Poduval v. Emperor (2). The principle underlying that decision might well be held to apply to a case such as that before us.

As regards the second objection, we need say no more than that it is disposed of by the ruling of this Court in Piyare Lal v. Emperor (3) and Notification No. 99, dated 23rd February 1883. There is no ground for holding that that notification does not apply equally to Special Magistrates of the First Class appointed under section 14 of the Code.

We accordingly reject this petition.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 16, 350—Difference of opinion between even number of Magistrates—Procedure—Rules framed by Bengal Government under s. 16, Criminal Procedure Code, r. 6—Trial, de novo—Jurisdiction.

Rule 6 of the Rules framed by the Bengal Government under section 16, Criminal Procedure Code, provides that in case of a difference of opinion between an even number of Honorary Magistrates the case shall be referred back to the District Magistrate or Sub-Divisional Officer, as the case may be.

Where a case is thus referred back under this rule to the Sub-Divisional Officer, the provisions of sections 350, Criminal Procedure Code, apply to the case, so that the Magistrate does not act without jurisdiction if in the absence of any demand for a de novo trial on the part of the accused he hears arguments and passes judgment without holding a de novo trial.

Babus Dasarathi Sanyal and Provat Chandra Dutta, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—In this case the petitioner Chand Tarafdar was charged under sections 147 and 324 of the Indian Penal Code before a Bench of two Honorary Magistrates exercising 3rd Class powers. The two Magistrates differed in opinion and the case was under rule 6 referred back to the Sub-Divisional Magistrate. He did not try the case de novo but heard arguments and passed judgment convicting the accused under sections 147 and 324, Indian Penal Code, and sentencing him to six months' rigorous imprisonment. The accused appealed and his appeal was heard by the 2nd Additional Sessions Judge of Mymensingh. He held, on the authority of Ulfat Sheikh v. Emperor (1), that the Sub-Divisional Magistrate had no jurisdiction, and that the case should have been decided by the casting vote of the Chairman of the Bench of Honorary Magistrates, though at the same time he pointed out that no Chairman ppeared to have been chosen. He accordingly set aside the conviction and sentence and remanded the case for re-trial by a Stipendiary Magistrate. Against that order the accused applied for and obtained this Rule. We must at once point out that the learned Judge was in error in supposing that the old rule 6 of the Rules framed by the Local Government under section 16, Criminal Procedure Code, was still in force in Mymensingh. The new rule 6, which provides that in case of a difference of opinion between an even number of Magistrates the case shall be referred back to the District Magistrate or Sub-Divisional Officer, has been made applicable to the whole of the Presidency of Bengal, as now constituted, by Government Notification 950-A, dated 30th January 1914. The Sub-Divisional Officer had, therefore, jurisdiction to deal with the case. The difficulty, however, does not end there. It is not quite clear what is meant by the concluding words of rule 6, "the case shall be referred back to the District Magistrate or the Sub-Divisional Officer, as the case may be." Does it mean that he is merely to hear arguments and record his opinion, as was done in this case, or is he to try the case again de novo? Though the word "back" might be taken to indicate that the case was to be sent back as an untried case, we do not think that this is the only possible interpretation. In any case we see no reason why the provisions of section 350, Criminal Procedure Code, should not apply to this case. Here the accused did not demand a de novo trial before the Sub-Divisional Officer: nor does he now express any such desire. On the contrary he begs that he may not be tried all over again, but that his appeal may be heard on the merits. To this the complainant, whose Pleader we permitted to address us on the point, has no objection. We accordingly make the Rule absolute, set aside the order of the 2nd Additional Sessions Judge and direct that the appeal be heard on its merits. The accused may remain on bail pending the hearing of the appeal.

Rule made absolute.

Railways Act (IX of 1890), s. 120, scope of—Railway officials, applicability of section to—'Person', meaning of—Removing passengers from compartments in which they are entitled to travel—Offence.

The word 'person' in section 120 of the Railways Act includes Railway officials. [p. 329, col. 2.]

The section applies to acts mentioned therein, even if they are committed by Railway servants. [p. 330, col. 1.]

Where a Railway guard removed two gosha ladies from a first class compartment in which they were entitled to travel and forced them to occupy another compartment:

Held, that he was guilty of an offence under section 120 of the Railways Act. [p. 330, col. 1.]

Case referred for the orders of the High Court, under section 438 of the Criminal Procedure Code, by the Sessions Judge of North Arcot, in his letter No. 4435, dated the 20th October 1917.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Mr. Satyamurthi Ayyar, for the Complainant argued that the language of section 120 of the Railways Act is not restricted to acts done by ordinary passengers on the Railways, but is comprehensive enough to include the acts of Railway servants as well. It is significant that the word 'person' is used in the section as distinguished from the word 'passenger' in other sections which impose liabilities on ordinary passengers.

Mr. C. Narasimha Chariar, for the Public Prosecutor, argued contra.

ORDER.—The Magistrate in this case found that the accused, who was a Railway Guard, made two Mahomedan gosha ladies who were travelling in a first class compartment in which there were two European ladies get out of that compartment and get into a coupe compartment at Arkonam. He also found that the ladies did not consent to changing their compartment. It would appear that the two European passengers or at least one of them objected to the gosha ladies travelling in the same compartment and that was the reason why the guard interfered and made the gosha ladies go into another compartment against their will. This he had no right to do, as the gosha ladies had agreed to pay the excess fare which was chargeable for the difference between the second class ticket which they possessed and the first class fare. The Station Master and the guard himself had given them this accommodation in consideration of the excess fare which they had promised to pay and which was actually paid at Arkonam. The action of the guard was not justified by the law and it necessarily interfered with the comfort of these gosha ladies who were entitled, upon the facts found, to travel in the compartment in which they were.

The learned Sessions Judge has gone elaborately into the evidence and has come to the conclusion that the prosecution had exaggerated the facts. But he was not entitled to reconsider the case on the evidence and to come to a different finding from that arrived at by the Magistrate. There was no appeal to him and he was acting in exercise of the powers of revision. He also holds that the action of the accused did not amount to an offence under section 120, Indian Railways Act, on the ground that the section does not apply to a Railway guard or other Railway employees. But the section itself is in general terms. It says: "If a person in any Railway carriage or upon any part of a Railway .....wilfully and without lawful excuse interferes with the comfort of any passenger or extinguishes any lamp, he shall be punished, etc." It also covers the case of any such person being in a state of intoxication or committing any nuisance or act of indecency or using obscene or abusive language. There is no apparent reason why, if a Railway employee or Railway guard commits any of these acts, he should be exempted from the punishment provided by the section.

The word used in section 120 is 'person', and there is nothing in the section to indicate that a Railway guard or other Railway officials are intended to be excluded from the purview of the section. It is perfectly true that there are special classes of offences dealt with in the Act which may be committed by Railway servants,

But that does not at all lead to the inference that the other offences dealt with in the Act may not be committed by Railway servants, where the offence is defined in general terms. It may also be pointed out that there are a number of sections which deal with offences by passengers travelling in a Railway train. But in all these sections, the word 'passenger' is specifically used. Contrary to that, the word used in section 120 is 'person', and not 'passenger'. We think that section 120 applies to an act mentioned in that section, if committed by a Railway servant. The conviction of the accused was, therefore, justified and there is no reason to interfere with the sentence.

This is the answer which will be returned to the Sessions Judge's reference.

Mr. Badr-ud-Din Kureshi, for the Petitioners.

The Assistant Legal Remembrancer, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The facts as found by the Magistrate and by the Sessions Judge on appeal are that in Mauza Qila Amir Singh the Sikhs killed some fowls by the process known as jhatka in the vicinity of a mosque, thereby causing annoyance to the Muhammadans of the village who in retaliation killed a cow with the knowledge that the Sikhs would be likely to consider such killing an insult to their religion. Several of the Muhammadan party were convicted upon these facts of an offence under section 295, Indian Penal Code, and their convictions were upheld by the learned Sessions Judge upon the authority of Hakim v. Empress (1). A petition for revision was presented to this Court and the question of the correctness of the Division Bench ruling above quoted was referred to a Full Bench.

The judgment in Hakim v. Empress (1) is very brief and does not attempt to discuss the question whether upon the strict construction of a Penal Statute the language employed in section 295, Indian Penal Code, can be reasonably held to cover cases such as that with which we are concerned. On the other hand, the question has been elaborately considered by a Full Court in Allahabad [see Queen-Empress v. Imam Ali (2)] and also by Norris and Macpherson, JJ., in Romesh Chunder Sannyal v. Hiru Mondal (3). It is unnecessary for us to say more than that we entirely agree with the reasoning of Edge, C. J., and Brodhurst, J., in the Allahabad case and that we must accordingly overrule the previous decision of our Court.

It was urged that if the killing of a cow with the intention of offending the religious susceptibilities of Hindus is held to be no offence under section 295, Indian Penal Code, there is no other provision of law which can be applied to prevent the commission of such an act, while on the other hand grave danger to the public may arise if such acts are to go unpunished. This is an argument which should be addressed rather to the Legislature than to a Court of Justice, but with reference to it we might point out that the decisions of the Allahabad and Calcutta High Courts were published nearly thirty years ago and that the Legislature has taken no steps that we are aware of to amend section 295, Indian Penal Code, so as to cover acts of the kind referred to. Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 195—"Court," meaning of—Tribunal constituted under Calcutta Improvement Act, 1911, whether Court—Sanction to prosecute.

The word "Court" in section 195, Criminal Procedure Code, has a wider meaning than a Court of Justice as defined in the Penal Code. It may include a Tribunal empowered to deal with a particular matter and authorised to receive evidence bearing on that matter in order to enable it to arrive at a determination. [p. 332, col. 1.]

The Tribunal constituted under the Calcutta Improvement Act of 1911 is a "Court" within the meaning of section 195, Criminal Procedure Code. Therefore, a person who has given false evidence before the Tribunal cannot be prosecuted for perjury without its sanction. [p. 332, col. 1.]

JUDGMENT.—An application was made to the President of the Tribunal constituted under the Calcutta Improvement Act, 1911, for sanction to prosecute one Khetra Mohan Ghose for giving false evidence before the President of the Tribunal in two apportionment cases. The President held that he had no jurisdiction to entertain the application, on the ground that the Tribunal was not a Court within the meaning of section 195, Criminal Procedure Code. Against that decision the applicant obtained this Rule, and Khetra Mohan Bose has appeared by Pleader and shown cause against it. The opinion of the President appears to be based upon the decision in Hari v. Secretary of State (1), where it was held that the Bombay Tribunal was not a Court but merely a body of arbitrators not subject to the supervision of the High Court. It was no doubt on account of this decision that Act XIV of 1914 was passed by the Imperial Legislative Council. In the case of Calcutta the Tribunal is constituted by the Calcutta Improvement Act of 1911, but the finality of its decisions is regulated by that Act as modified by the Calcutta Improvement (Appeals) Act, 1919, passed by the Imperial Legislative Council. It is unnecessary for us to discuss the question whether in view of the subsequent legislation the Bombay decision is still good law, as we have no doubt whatever that the Calcutta Tribunal is a Court within the meaning of section 195 of the Criminal Procedure Code. By section 70 of the Calcutta Improvement Act, the Tribunal is constituted for the purpose of performing the functions of a Court in reference to the acquisition of land for the Board under the Land Acquisition Act, 1894. By section 71 (a) the Tribunal shall (except as to appeals which are specially provided for) be deemed to be the Court and the President the Judge under the said Act. Section 71 (c) gives the President the powers of a Civil Court with regard to the summoning and attendance of witnesses and production of documents By section 77 (b) apportionment cases may be tried by the

(1) 27 B. 424; 5 Bom. L. R. 431.

President sitting alone and his decision is then to be deemed to be the decision of the Tribunal.

It has been held by the Court that the word "Court" in section 195 has a wider meaning than a Court of Justice as defined in the Indian Penal Code. It may include a Tribunal empowered to deal with a particular matter and authorised to receive evidence bearing on that matter in order to enable it to arrive at a determination. See Raghoobuns Sahoy v. Kokil Singh (2), where the question arose whether a Collector acting under sections 69 and 70 of the Bengal Tenancy Act was a Court. That case was followed in Chandi Charan Giri v. Gadadhar Prodhan (3), where the question was to what Court the Collector was subordinate. We may also refer to the definition of "Court" in section 3 of the Evidence Act. It includes all Judges and Magistrates and all persons except arbitrators legally authorised to take evidence.

We do not think that the Tribunal as "the Court" under the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, for the purposes of the Improvement Trust can be regarded simply a body of arbitrators. It is the Court under that Act, and the President is the Judge. It follows that it must also be regarded as a Court for the purposes of section 195 of the Criminal Procedure Code. We may point out that if the contrary view were to prevail, the deplorable result would follow that any private person who alleged that false evidence had been given before the Tribunal might institute a prosecution without any control on his action by the Tribunal before whom the evidence was given.

The Rule is accordingly made absolute, the order of the President is set aside and the application remanded to him for adjudication upon the merits.

Rule made absolute.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 421—Appeal, summary dismissal of—Judgment, writing of, necessity of—Revision.

Section 421 of the Criminal Procedure Code empowers an Appellate Court to dismiss an appeal summarily without writing a judgment or giving reasons, but it is within the power of the High Court in revision to say after having regard to the facts of each particular case whether or not the Appellate Court has exercised a proper discretion in acting under that section. If the High Court finds that the case is one which should not have been dealt with summarily, the High Court will send the case back ordering the Appellate Court to hear it on its merits and pass a judgment. [p. 334, col. 2]

Case-law considered.

Review of the order of the Sessions Judge Tenasserim, confirming that of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, Thaton, dated the 27th September 1916, passed in Criminal Regular Trial No. 16 of 1916.

JUDGMENT.—Four bullocks were stolen from a grazing ground on the 28th February 1916. Subsequently a bullock was found in the possession of one Po Thaung, who had bought it in March 1916 from one Po Tok in the presence of Ba Myit, the applicant. In the same month were also found two other bullocks in the possession of one Tun Lin, who had bought them from the applicant. All these bullocks were proved to be those of the stolen cattle. It was also proved that the purchases by Po Thaung and Tun Lin were bona fide and that they were from Po Tok and Ba Myit respectively. The Sub-Divisional Magistrate who tried Po Tok and Ba Myit, discharged the former and convicted the latter of theft of the three bullocks.

Ba Myit's defence was that he was hired by an Indian called Babugale to drive the bullocks and that at his request he drove them to Po Tok's house. He denied having anything to do with the sale of the bullocks.

Ba Myit appealed to the Sessions Judge of Tenasserim who passed the following judgment:—

"Read memorandum of appeal and record of the lower Court.

I see no grounds for interfering and dismiss the appeal summarily."

Ba Myit has now applied for revision to this Court upon the following grounds:—

1. That, considering the nature of the defence set up by him, the Sessions Judge erred in law in summarily dismissing this appeal and not giving any reasons of his own for confirming the conviction and sentence.

2. That the Sessions Judge does not show that he has considered the evidence in the case and that his judgment is consequently bad in law.

I may at once say that the second ground is untenable, as it is clear the learned Sessions Judge must have considered the evidence, for he stated in his judgment that he had read the record.

I shall now deal with the first ground.

I am satisfied that the order of the learned Sessions Judge was passed under section 421 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

In Rash Behari Das v. Balgopal Singh (1) a Bench of the Calcutta High Court (Trevelyan and Rampini, JJ.) held that an Appellate Court rejecting an appeal under section 421 of the Code of Criminal Procedure of 1882 need not give its reasons for the decision. The learned Judges observed: "We think that the question really depends upon the meaning of the word 'summarily' in section 421 of the Code. In the absence of that word there would seem from the Code to be no reason why a judgment is more required in a case where an appeal is heard and dismissed than in a case where it is rejected under section 421, but the word 'summarily' differentiates the cases. The word 'summarily' ordinarily means in an informal manner and without the delay of formal proceedings. This we think would seem to show that the Judge was entitled to reject the appeal without any formality at all; therefore without the formality of either a recorded judgment or reasons of any description." This case has been followed in Queen-Empress v. Warubai (2), a Bombay case, King-Emperor v. Krishnayya (3), a Madras case, and Nitya Pal v. Beni Madhab Ghose (4), another Calcutta case. In the last case it was held, following the other Calcutta case cited above, that the language of section 421 is quite clear and that in dismissing an appeal summarily under it, the Appellate Court must be taken to have considered that there were no sufficient grounds for interfering. This and the Madras case were decided after the passing of the present Code and there was nothing said as to whether there is a difference in meaning between the word "reject" in section 421 of the old Code of 1882 and the word "dismiss" in the corresponding section of the present Code, apparently because there is really no difference. In my opinion there is obviously no difference at all.

The learned Counsel for the applicant has cited Damri Toaraha v. Emperor (5) and Ekcowri Mukerjee v. Emperor (6), both Calcutta cases. In the former the Appellate Court after hearing the Pleader for the appellant summarily rejected the appeal, and on revision the learned Judges of the High Court observed as follows: "We think from the nature of the defence which was set up in the Court of first instance the appeal was one which the Judge should have heard on the evidence and not have summarily dismissed". In the latter, the Appellate Court had not expressly stated that the appeal was dealt with under section 421 and it could not be certain that it was so dealt with. The record was voluminous and hearing must have taken some considerable time and several points must have been raised. The Appellate Court dealing in a general way had held that the complainant was not worthy of credit. The learned Judges held that it was desirable that the objections should have been noticed showing how they were disposed of without writing an elaborate judgment. The case of Queen-Empress v. Nannhu (7), a Full Bench case of the Allahabad High Court, might also have been cited for the applicant together with another case of the same High Court, namely, Kundan v. Emperor (8). In the first of these two cases the Bench held that, in view of the possibility of the order of the Appellate Court being challenged by an application for revision, it is advisable that such a Court when rejecting an appeal under section 421 should record shortly its reasons for such rejection. But the learned Judges also stated that they came to that view without deciding the question whether in acting under that section it is necessary for the Court to express its views beyond stating that it considers that there is no sufficient ground for interfering. In the second case Piggott, J., said that broadly speaking he was in agreement with the decision of the Bombay High Court above cited that the Appellate Court was not bound, when dismissing an appeal summarily under section 421, to write a judgment as defined in section 367 of the Code but that he had no desire to dissent from the Full Bench case of his own High Court. He went on to say, after considering the nature of the pleas set up by the defence in the case, that the order of the Appellate Court (which stated no reasons) was not a commendable one. He then examined the evidence and came to the conclusion that there was no reason for interfering.

The case of Ekcowri Mukerji v. Emperor (6) was a case where it was uncertain whether the Appellate Court had acted under section 421 and under the circumstances, having regard to the voluminous nature of the record and the probability of several points having been raised, it appears to have been thought that the Appellate Court had not sufficiently dealt with it. I am not disposed to dissent from these two Calcutta cases, because having regard to their particular circumstances the Appellate Court was held to have been wanting in discretion. The Allahabad cases, however, stand on a different footing. It appears according to those cases that the Appellate Court should in every case state reasons for its decision though it is acting under the provisions of section 421. Now it appears to me that the requirement that reasons should be stated means the same thing as requiring a judgment, for before the reasons are stated, the point must be stated and decided. That being so, the ruling in those cases is contrary to the plain provisions of the law and does away with the effect of the word "summarily" which, the Calcutta High Court has held in the case of Rash Behari Das v. Balgopal Singh (1), enables the Appellate Court to reject an appeal without any formality at all.

I find, however, that there is an appreciable conflict between the cases which have followed the Calcutta case of Rash Behari Das v. Balgopal Singh (1) and the two Calcutta cases of Damri Toaraha v. Emperor (5) and Ekcowri Mukerji v. Emperor (6) and in my judgment, what I may call an intermediate view will be the most reasonable and just view. Section 421 of the Code of Criminal Procedure empowers an Appellate Court to dismiss an appeal summarily without writing a judgment or giving reasons, but it is within the power of the High Court in revision to say after having regard to the facts of each particular case whether or not the Appellate Court has exercised a proper discretion in acting under that section. If the High Court finds that the case is one which should not have been dealt with summarily, the High Court will send the case back ordering the Appellate Court to hear it on its merits and pass a judgment.

In the case before me I do not find any special features in the case which justify me in thinking that it is one which should not have been dealt with summarily. I think that the case is quite simple and that the learned Sessions Judge was quite right in dismissing the appeal summarily. The application is dismissed.

Application dismissed.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), ss. 299, Exp. (1), 300 (2)—Accelerating death of person suffering from disorder—Knowledge of disorder—Offence—Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s 207—Commitment to Court of Session—"Ought to be tried by such Court," scope of.

Explanation (1) to section 299 of the Penal Code assumes that the bodily injury was inflicted with the intention of causing death or the knowledge that it would be likely to cause death. It was intended to repeat the English rule that an injury which accelerates the death of a dying man is deemed to be the cause of it, and where death has been caused it is no defence that the deceased was suffering from a complaint which would have caused his death in any event. Section 300 (2) of the Code makes it clear that the offender is not responsible for death in such a case unless he knew that the condition of the deceased was such that his act was likely to cause death. [p. 335, col. 2.]

The Criminal Procedure Code does not require that all cases of assault ending in death should be committed to the Court of Session. The expression "ought to be tried by such Court" in section 207 of the Code is limited to cases which the Magistrate is not competent to try or cases in which he is unable to inflict an adequate punishment. [p. 336, col. 1.]

Reference by the Sessions Judge, Hyderabad, that the commitment made by the 1st Class Magistrate, Chachro, be quashed.

Mr. E. Raymond, Public Prosecutor, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—This is a reference by the Sessions Judge, Hyderabad, asking us to quash the commitment made to him by the First Class Magistrate, Chachro, of the accused on a charge of culpable homicide not amounting to murder under section 304, Indian Penal Code.

No question of appreciation of evidence s involved, because the facts are simple. The accused was annoyed with the deceased because his cattle trespassed into his land and beat him with a stick and kicked him. The deceased died a few hours later and the medical evidence makes it clear that the injuries inflicted were slight and only amounted to simple hurt, but that death had ensued because the heart of the deceased was weak and dilated and the shock of the assault had stopped its beating. On these facts the Magistrate considered that the accused was guilty of culpable homicide because he had accelerated the death of the accused. The Magistrate apparently had in mind explanation (1) of section 299, Indian Penal Code, that "a person who causes bodily injury to another who is labouring under a disorder, disease or bodily infirmity, and thereby accelerates the death of that other shall be deemed to have caused his death." This explanation, however, assumes that the bodily injury was inflicted with the intention of causing death or the knowledge that it would be likely to cause death. It was only intended to repeat the English rule that an injury which accelerates the death of a dying man is deemed to be the cause of it and where death has been caused, it is no defence that the deceased was suffering from a complaint which would have caused his death in any event. Section 300 (2), Indian Penal Code, makes it clear that the offender is not responsible for death in such a case, unless he knows that the condition of the deceased was such that his act was likely to cause death.

Here it is not suggested that the accused knew that the deceased was suffering from heart disease and, therefore, when he assaulted him he had no intention either to cause death or to cause such bodily injury as is likely to cause death. The offence, therefore, does not amount to culpable homicide and does not fall under section 299, Indian Penal Code.

The Public Prosecutor suggests that all cases of assault ending in death should be committed to the Court of Session. But the only case he has been able to cite in support of his proposition is that of Queen Empress v. Rupaya (1). But that case does not support the inference the Public Prosecutor seeks to draw from it. The accused had violently assaulted his wife and caused her death and there was no evidence in support of the Magistrate's assumption that the death was due to a diseased spleen. The Bombay High Court, therefore, on these facts reversed the conviction under section 323, Indian Penal Code, and directed the accused to be committed to the Court of Session on charges of culpable homicide and voluntarily causing grievous hurt.

On the other hand, the Criminal Procedure Code makes no such distinction and the expression "ought to be tried by such Court" in section 207, Criminal Procedure Code, is limited to (1) cases which the Magistrate is not competent to try or (2) cases in which he is unable to inflict an adequate punishment. This is the view taken by the Bombay High Court in the case of Porna Ranchod (2), where a commitment for an assault which had caused death was quashed.

The present case is one of simple hurt under section 323, Indian Penal Code, and that is an offence which the Magistrate was competent to try and to punish adequately. He has, therefore, erred in law in committing the accused to the Court of Session.

We accordingly quash the commitment under section 215, Criminal Procedure Code, and direct the Magistrate to proceed with the trial himself.

Commitment quashed.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 107, 145—Proceeding under s. 107 converted into one under s. 145—Procedure—Evidence, recording of.

Where a proceeding is started under section 107 of the Crininal Procedure Code and evidence is taken under that section, but the Magistrate subsequently converts the proceeding into one under section 145 of the Code, he must call for the written statements of the parties and record evidence under the latter section. If he omits to do so, any order passed by him under section 145 of the Code would be illegal.

Criminal revision from an order of the Deputy Magistrate, Purulia.

Mr. Abani Bhushan Mukerji, for the Petitioners.

JUDGMENT.—The petitioners in this case were originally proceeded with under section 107 of the Code of Criminal Procedure and the case continued to be treated as a case under that section till the 6th November 1917, when on the conclusion of the evidence of the second party the learned Deputy Magistrate fixed the 10th of November 1917 for order. He, however, supplemented that by adding the words 'proceeding changed to section 145 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.' On the 10th November 1917, the learned Deputy Magistrate took up this case and simply passed an order declaring the first party to be in possession of the land in dispute.

The learned Vakil appearing on behalf of the petitioners contends that the order of the 10th November 1917 passed by the learned Deputy Magistrate is without jurisdiction. He urges in support of his contention the failure on the part of the learned Deputy Magistrate to draw up proceedings under sub-clause 1 of section 145. He also contends that even if he had done so, the order passed by him would still be without jurisdiction inasmuch as the Magistrate was bound not only to take the written statements of his clients, but also such evidence as they might be disposed to offer after action under sub-clause 1 of section 145 of the Code of Criminal Procedure was taken. The proceedings taken under section 107 of the Code and the evidence recorded thereunder could not be accepted as sufficient ground to dispense with the necessity of taking fresh action under sub-clause 1 of section 145. Sections 107 and 145 are intended by the Legislature to serve two distinct purposes and the learned Vakil appearing on behalf of the petitioners has rightly contended that unless and until the proceedings were duly initiated and his clients were given an opportunity of filing written statements and offering evidence, the order passed by the Magistrate would be ultra vires. I agree. The order in question is set aside and the case is sent back to the learned Deputy Magistrate to deal with it in accordance with law.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 350—Transfer of Magistrate—Trial de novo—Procedure.

The right of claiming a trial de novo on the transfer of a Magistrate is given to an accused person in order that he may have the very great benefit of the Trying Magistrate having the witnesses examined and cross-examined in his presence, so that he may see and note their demeanour and manner of giving evidence. When the right is claimed the Magistrate must re-commence the trial

In a criminal trial the Magistrate was transferred after the prosecution evidence was heard and a charge framed. The accused claimed a trial de novo before the succeeding Magistrate. Thereupon the witnesses were re-summoned, their statements were read over to them and they were further cross-examined. No fresh charge was framed nor was the accused examined by the Magistrate:

Held, that the provisions of section 350 of the Criminal Procedure Code were not complied with and that a new trial must be ordered.

King-Emperor v. Nga Pe, 2 L. B R. 17 and Sobh Nath Singh v. Emperor, 12 C. W. N. 138; 6 Cr. L. J. 431, relied upon.

Mr. Maung Kin (Assistant Government Advocate), for the Applicant.

Mr. J. A. Maung Gyi, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This case has been referred by the District Magistrate. The evidence was heard and a charge framed and all but one witness for the defence were examined by Maung Shin. He was then transferred and Mr. . . . . took up the case. The accused exercised his right to have all the witnesses re-summoned and re-heard. They were re-summoned but they were not re-heard. Their statements were merely read over to them and they were then further cross-examined. No fresh charge was framed nor was the accused examined by Mr. . . . .

This is clearly no compliance with the law. The right is given to an accused person in order that he may have the very great benefit of the Magistrate having the witnesses examined and cross examined in his presence, so that he may see and note their demeanour and manner of giving evidence. When the right is so claimed, the Magistrate must re-commence the trial [King-Emperor v. Nga Pe (1)].

( ) 2 L. B. R. 17.

In Sobh Nath Singh v. Emperor (2) the facts were the same as in the present case and it was held that the provisions of section 350, Criminal Procedure Code, were not duly complied with and further that it was impossible to say that the accused had not been materially prejudiced. A re trial was ordered.

With this I entirely agree.

It is urged that the accused has been very lightly sentenced to fine only and that if a re-trial is ordered he may be convicted again and sentenced to imprisonment and that if so, he would be materially prejudiced. I cannot assume that he would be convicted nor that if he is he would be imprisoned, and the mere fact that he may be has nothing to do with the matter before me. A direct contravention of an express provision of law has been committed and is an illegality. This being so, section 537 cannot cure the defect [Gomer Sirda v. Queen-Empress (3)].

The convictions and sentences are set aside and a new trial is ordered.

It is not a good reason for an Appellate Court to set aside a conviction for criminal trespass and acquit the accused without discussing the evidence or coming to any conclusion thereon, on the mere ground that the case is of a civil nature especially where the first Court has tried out the matter and has come to the conclusion that the accused is guilty of the offence charged. accused but without really going into the case or discussing the evidence or coming to any conclusion thereon. He says that the Trying Magistrate may have been right in believing the prosecution witnesses instead of the defence witnesses, but, as he considered that it was a matter where the complainant ought to have gone to the Civil Court and availed himself of the procedure laid down for Civil Courts, he acquitted the accused. That was obviously not a good reason in a case where the matter had been tried out in the first Court and the Magistrate had come to the conclusion that the accused was guilty of criminal trespass. FOR PROFESSIONAL MISCONDUCT.

Sind Courts Act (XII Bom. of 1866), s. 16—"Misbehaviour," scope of—Pleader, duty of—Letter containing personal attack on Judge, whether misbehaviour.

The jurisdiction of the Judicial Commissioner under section 16 of the Sind Courts Act extends not only to professional misbehaviour but to general misbehaviour; but while this jurisdiction is unlimited, the Court is reluctant to take cognizance of misconduct not connected with the office of Pleader unless it is morally disgraceful or shows that the individual is not a proper person to hold that office. [p. 339, cols. 1 & 2; p. 340, col. 1.]

A Pleader by virtue of his sanad has certain rights and privileges, but he is not a chartered libertine and those rights and privileges carry with them corresponding duties and restraints. [p. 341, col. 1.]

A Pleader is an officer of the Court and is bound to assist the Court in the administration of justice. Criticism which is permissible to a private individual is not permissible to a Pleader. The co-operation of Pleader and Judge would be impossible if the Pleader were attacking the Judge in the public press. Nor would it be possible for the business of the Court to be conducted with dignity, decorum and impartiality when the Pleader is posing in public as the chastiser of the Judge. Such conduct is not only a breach of the Pleader's duty to the Court but must also result in an actual obstruction to the administration of justice. [p. 341, col. 2.]

A letter published by a Pleader, alleging that a certain Judge is indolent and takes credit for cases not tried but compromised, even if written in good faith and even if it does not constitute the offence of libel, amounts to misbehaviour under section 16 of the Sind Courts Act. [p. 341, col. 2; p. 342, col. 1.]

Mr. E. Raymond, Government Pleader, for the Crown.

Mr. T. G. Elphinston, for the Opponent.

JUDGMENT.—This is a Rule to Mr. M., Pleader, to show cause why he should not be dealt with under section 16 of the Sind Courts Act for misbehaviour on the following charge:

"That you wrote and published in the issue of the 'Hindvasi' newspaper of the 21st January last a letter calculated to bring into contempt the administration of justice in the Court of the Sub-Judge, First Class, Hyderabad."

The Rule was granted on a report by the District Judge, Hyderabad, that Mr. M. had published a letter in a newspaper scandalizing the Court of the First Class Sub-Judge. The letter runs thus:

"But it is your duty not only to bring to the notice of the superior officers but also to the notice of the litigants how much and what work is daily done in this Judge's Court. On several occasions daily those who come to Court return disappointed in the evening without any work being done, after sitting in Court the whole day and having wandered and spent money. If all men knew properly, they would not file suits, nor wander, nor incur unnecessary expenses and would privately settle with defendants. I give you the account of one case from which it will be seen that it is useless to file suits in this Court during the time of this Judge. Parties wander and incur expenses and settle between themselves and then the Judge Sahib reports that he has decided those cases."

Then follows the statement of a case in which Mr. M.'s firm represented one of the parties. This statement is admittedly inaccurate and was corrected in a subsequent letter.

From this statement Mr. M. deduced the conclusion stated in the last paragraph of his letter, which is as follows:—

"You will see from the above table what ill-fated man will file a suit in this Court, and which Pleader will get proper remuneration that he will be wasting his time in Court the whole day on so many hearings. It is hoped that superior officers will give full consideration to this subject and make such arrangement that Hyderabad should get proper justice at proper expense."

In this letter Mr. M. puts aside all words of glozing courtsey at once without any equivocation and informs the public that it is useless to file suits in this Court. These words carry their own condemnation, for they are calculated to bring the administration of justice in that Court into contempt.

The letter is signed by Mr. M. and he admits having written it.

Mr. Elphinston who appeared for Mr. M. began by tendering an apology but when asked whether his client pleaded guilty he replied he did not. An apology coupled with words of justification is not only ungracious but insincere. It is not a token of repentance but a subterfuge to escape punishment. We, therefore, declined to accept the apology and called upon Mr. Elphinston to enter upon his defence.

Mr. Elphinston then sought to repel our jurisdiction over Mr. M. and to justify the writing of the letter. We shall now deal with the points raised.

Our jurisdiction is conferred by section 16 of the Sind Courts Act, which is as follows:—

"It shall be competent to the Court of the Judicial Commissioner with the sanction of the Local Government to make rules for the qualification and admission of proper persons to be Pleaders in any Court in the Province of Sind and it shall also be competent to the Court of the Judicial Commissioner to remove or to suspend from practice for misbehaviour any person so admitted to be a Pleader."

We have, therefore, to see that proper persons are admitted to be Pleaders and after they have been so admitted, we have to supervise their conduct and in case of misbehaviour to suspend or remove them from practice. The intention of the Legislature was expressed by Sir Comer Petheram in the case of Khuda Bux Khan, In re (1) in words which I quote: "Now it is clear that so far as the Courts are concerned, the Legislature has to a great extent made these persons (Pleaders) officers of the Court, and of course the object of doing that is, that the Courts may have a control over them as their own officers, and may see that in their dealings with the public they were fit to be entrusted with the responsible duties which they had to perform." We cannot, therefore, admit the construction which seeks to limit the word misbehaviour to conduct in the strict course of the Pleader's professional duties. A similar contention was raised Weare, In re (2) and was characterised by Lord Esher as a monstrous doctrine, for it would appear to lead to this conclusion that, however disgraceful be the conduct of a Pleader, yet if that conduct were unconnected with his professional duties he might continue to be a member of a profession which, Lord Mansfield, said "should stand free from all suspicion." Lord Esher referred to the case of Brounsall, In re (3), where in the case of an attorney who had been convicted of felony it was said that the whole question was whether he was a proper person to be continued on the roll or not. These two cases were cited with approval by the Privy Council in the case of Rajendro Nath Mukerji, In re (4). There can be no doubt, therefore, that our jurisdiction extends not only to professional misbehaviour but to general misbehaviour. A similar construction has been put by the Bombay High Court on the almost identical words occurring in section 55 of the Bombay Pleaders' Regulation, II of 1827—Government Pleader v. Annaji Narayan Deshpande (5) and by a Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court on section 14 of the Legal Practitioners Act, XVII of 1879—Le Mesurier v. Wajid Hossain (6).

But while our jurisdiction is unlimited it may be conceded that we should be reluctant to take cognizance of misconduct not connected with the office of Pleader, unless it were morally disgraceful or showed that the individual was not a proper person to hold that office. It was on this ground that Lord Westbury based his judgment in the case of Wallace, In re (7), where an attorney who was a suitor wrote a letter to the Chief Justice reflecting on the other Judges of the Court. But here Mr. M. was not himself a party to any proceeding in the Court of the Sub-Judge. He did not write as an aggrieved suitor but on knowledge acquired during the course of his practice as a Pleader. His letter was an attack by a Pleader on a Judge. The case of Wallace, In re (7) was distinguished on this ground by the Privy Council in a case similar in many respects to the present one. Sashi Bhushan Sarbadhicary, In re (8).

In justification of the letter Mr. Elphinston argues that it does not constitute the criminal offence of contempt of Court punishable by summary procedure and that it is not a libel on the Sub-Judge, for the administration of justice is a fit subject for public criticism. Hence he contends that not being an offence if written by a private individual it cannot be an offence if written by a Pleader, for the rights of a Pleader, he says, are at least as high as those of any other citizen.

Now the reference to the jurisdiction to commit for contempt seems quite irrelevant. It is true that this Court has no jurisdiction to commit for contempt except contempts in its immediate presence. The power is sparingly used and only when the contempt is such as to cause an actual obstruction of public justice. But these proceedings have not been taken by way of contempt.

Whether or not it is a libel on the Sub-Judge is not a matter for decision on the hearing of this Rule. The administration of justice is, no doubt, a matter of public interest and criticisms in good faith on a Judge are entitled to the privilege of exceptions 1 and 2 of section 499, Indian Penal Code. The latest pronouncement on this point is that of the Privy Council in Channing Arnold v. Emperor (9) and is expressed in no ambiguous language. Lord Shaw said: "Upon the other side it would appear from certain observations of the learned Judge that this false and dangerous doctrine may have been hinted at, that some privilege or protection attaches to the public acts of a Judge which exempts him, in regard to these, from free and adverse comment. He is not above criticism, his conduct and utterances may demand it. Freedom would be seriously impaired if the Judicial Tribunals were outside of the range of such comment."

But the vital condition of this privilege is that the criticism should be in "good faith." Considering the letter written by Mr. M. as a statement of fact it is not written with due care and attention, for some of the statements are admittedly inaccurate. And treating it as an expression of opinion, the excess of language gives a severe shock to the plea of "good faith."

But the vice of Mr. Elphinston's argument is the assumption that whatever is not a criminal offence is not misbehaviour. Counsel seeks to draw a line which surely falls far below the extreme low watermark of professional conduct. In the case of Blake, In re (10), Mr. Justice Blackburn said: "It is not necessary in order to induce the Court to interfere in a summary manner that the misconduct should amount to an indictable offence." More recently in the case of Krishna Sawmi Aiyar, In the matter of (11) a Pleader was suspended for gross negligence in the performance of his duties and in the control of his office. Lord Shaw said: "Their Lordships, while not interfering with his acquittance of direct and personal fraud, did not see their way to acquit him of conduct in the management of the appeal, and of his clients' affairs, which caused the procedure of the Court to be the very opposite of what it should be, namely, responsible, orderly and pure;" and they also laid it down that it was the duty of the Bar to co-operate with the Court in the orderly and pure administration of justice.

Again the assumption that a Pleader has all the rights of a private individual is equally fallacious. A Pleader by virtue of his sanad has certain rights and privileges but he is not a chartered libertine and those rights and privileges carry with them corresponding duties and restraints. Some restraints are imposed by Statute. Under section 557, Criminal Procedure Code, a Pleader cannot sit as a Magistrate in any district in which he practises. Under section 135 of the Transfer of Property Act, a Pleader may not buy or sell an actionable claim. It was with reference to this latter restriction that the Chief Justice of the Madras High Court in the case of Munireddi v. Venkata Rao (12) said: "A Pleader holds a privileged position in connection with the administration of justice, and the law imposes on him certain restrictions and disabilities by reason of the position or office which he holds, and in order to safeguard the interests of the litigants and the pure administration of justice." And there is another restraint not imposed by Statute but equally well settled by judicial authority which arises out of his duty to the Court. In the case already cited Sir Comer Petheram said that the Legislature has made Pleaders officers of the Court. In the case of Government Pleader v. Jagannath (13) the Bombay High Court said: "Pleaders are a privileged class enrolled for the purpose of rendering assistance to the Court in the administration of justice. Their position, training and practice gives them influence with the public and it is directly contrary to their duty to use that influence for the purpose of bringing the administration of justice into contempt." In the case of Krishna Sawmi Aiyar, In the matter of (11) the Privy Council said of Pleaders that "they have also the general function, applicable not only to the Bar in general but also to solicitors at large, thatthey must in the conduct of all suits entrusted to them co-operate with the Court in the orderly and pure administration of justice."

A Pleader is an officer of the Court and is bound to assist the Court in the administration of justice. Criticism which is permissible to a private individual is not permissible to a Pleader. The co-operation of Pleader and Judge would be impossible if the Pleader were attacking the Judge in the public press. Nor would it be possible for the business of the Court to be conducted with dignity, decorum and impartiality when the Pleader is posing in public as the chastiser of the Judge. Such a writing is not only breach of the Pleader's duty to the Court but must also result in an actual obstruction to the administration of justice.

Here, even if the letter were written in good faith and even if it did not constitute an offence of libel, it would still be reprehensible in that it was a personal attack on the Sub-Judge alleging that he was indolent and took credit for cases not tried but compromised. The impropriety of such attacks was the subject of a forcible appeal by Sir Lawrence Jenkins, C. J., in the case of Governor of Bengal v. Moti Lal Ghose (14). His Lordship said: "The responsibility of a Judicial Tribunal is at all times great, and I do not think I ask too much when I ask in the interests of Judicial Officers working in the Mofussil Districts of this Presidency that the weight of that responsibility should not be increased, however unwittingly, by comments on the cases before them or on themselves in connection with those cases." Blackburn, J, in Skipworth's case (15) said: "It is not right that a Judge,...when personal attacks are made on him; should come forward and meet them and explain them and that is well-known to those who make the attack and certainly that knowledge does in any mind render the conduct of those who attack a Judge in that way, to use the mildest term, neither just nor decorous." The learned Judge was speaking of those who could in some measure protect themselves; how much more forcibly do his words apply to those who have not the power.

ABDUL RAHIMAN, In re.

Mr. Elphinston admits that his client committed an error of judgment in writing to the public press, but urges that he acted in "good faith" and with an honest desire to expedite the business of the Court. But if Mr. M. really desired to improve the conduct of business in the Court he would have made a representation first to the District Judge and next to the Judicial Commissioner and in the last resort to the Local Government by whom the Sub-Judge was appointed. Mr. M., made an incidental reference to the conduct of business in the Court to the District Judge on the 15th January, but before orders were passed in that matter the letter appeared in the newspaper on the 21st January. He made no complaint to the Judicial Commissioner or to the Commissioner-in Sind. Mr. M. as his letter shows, was aware that his grievances—real or imaginary—could only be remedied by the superior officers of the Sub-Judge, for he asks the newspaper to bring the matter to their notice. Why does he address the superior officers through a public press? Why does he appeal to the public? Was it necessary to bring the administration of justice into contempt by warning the public not to file suits in that Court? The mode in which he sought redress, the inaccuracy of statements, the excessive language, all repel the notion of "good faith" or honesty of purpose, and seem to us to indicate a spirit radically opposed to that required of a Pleader whose duty it is to co-operate with the Court in the orderly and pure administration of justice.

We, therefore, find Mr. M. guilty of misbehaviour under section 16 of the Sind Courts Act.

In awarding punishment we cannot but feel that leniency would be misplaced. Mr. M. cannot plead youth or inexperience and this is not the first time that he has been before us for misbehaviour. In Varanbai's case (16) he was reprimanded for breach of duty to a client. He has now been guilty of a breach of duty to the Court. His offence is not mitigated by his insincere apology and his attempted justification. He claims to have the approval of other Pleaders. We are glad to be assured by the Government Pleader, who represents the Bar in this proceeding, that that is not the case. And indeed if it were, we should with regret consider that a reason for making the punishment exemplary. We also think that another reprimand would not suffice to mark our sense of the gravity of Mr. M.'s misconduct.

The least sentence that we can pass is that Mr. M. should be suspended from practice for a period of three months. He should deliver up his sanad to the Registrar of this Court or to the District Judge, Hyderabad, and may apply for it again after three months.

Pleader suspended from practice.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 344—Adjournment of case—Costs, order for, validity of.

The Criminal Procedure Code does not make special provision for costs in the course of a criminal trial and if section 344 of the Code is to be regarded as justifying an order as to costs, it can only be where the circumstances are exceptional and where for some reason or another the ordinary everyday method of conducting criminal cases must be departed from. [p. 343, col 1.]

Criminal application for revision from an order passed by the Magistrate, First Class, Thana.

Mr. B. V. Desai, for the Applicant.

JUDGMENT.

HEATON, J.—This is a case in which a Magistrate, when making an order for the adjournment of the case he was trying, made also an order that the accused should pay the day's costs of the complainant, which he assessed at Rs. 30. We are not prepared to say that this order was illegal. It will be seen from the case of Mathura Prasad v. Basant Lal (1) that the Allahabad High Court has come to the conclusion that such an order is permitted by the terms of section 344 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The same conclusion, we gather, has been reached by the High Courts of Calcutta and Madras. But the Criminal Procedure Code does not make special provision for costs in the course of a criminal trial, and one thing seems to me to be perfectly clear, and it is this: that if section 344 is to be regarded as justifying an order as to costs, it can only be where the circumstances are exceptional and where for some reason or another the ordinary everyday method of conducting criminal cases must be departed from. I say this because I feel sure that if our criminal law intended orders as to costs to be a normal part of our criminal proceedings, it would be clearly provided for. We should not be compelled to seek for authority for making such an order in a section like 344 and in such words as those in which that section is framed. Taking it, therefore, as I do take it, that our common everyday practice, which is in accordance with the intentions of the Code, does not contemplate an order as to costs, then one has to see, whether, when an order as to costs has been made, the circumstances are so peculiar as to justify the order. In this case they do not seem to me to be in any way peculiar. It is an ordinary case, one with which we are very familiar. A party applies for a transfer and then applies for an adjournment of the case. Such an adjournment is commonly granted, and in certain cases, as the law provides, must be granted.

(1) 2 A. L. J. 831; 28 A. 207; A. W. N. (1905) 256; 2 Cr. L. J. 803.

I think, therefore, that the order as to costs in this case should be set aside. The amount, if paid, should be refunded.

I quite realize the inconvenience that arises when one party makes an application for a transfer or for an adjournment without giving previous notice to the other side. Personally I should be very pleased to see that the legal profession recognized the desirability of always giving such notice.

SHAH, J.—I agree.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 208 (2)—Cross-examination, whether can be postponed till all witnesses have been examined—Procedure—Evidence Act (I of 1872), s. 138.

The proper time for cross-examination of a witness is immediately after the examination-in-chief, and an order by a Magistrate allowing an accused, without any special reason, to postpone cross-examining the prosecution witnesses until they have been all examined-in-chief is a proceeding not contemplated by the Code of Criminal Procedure. [p. 344, col. 1.]

An accused has no right under section 208 (2) of the Criminal Procedure Code to postpone his cross-examination of the witnesses for the prosecution until they have been all examined-in-chief, but the Magistrate has power to re-call witnesses for further cross-examination if the circumstances of the case call for it. [p. 344, col. 1.]

Mr. G. B. Dawson, for the Applicant.

Mr. Sutherland, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The petitioner was being prosecuted for an offence of abetment of attempt to murder and the enquiry was being held under Chapter XVIII of the Code by the 2nd Additional Magistrate, Kyaikto. Eleven prosecution witnesses were examined-in-chief and the diary shows that the cross-examination was reserved until the Sessions. Then the doctor was examined as the 12th prosecution witness and the Pleader for the accused wished to cross-examine him but the Magistrate refused to allow it then, as the cross-examination of the previous witnesses had been postponed. This order was clearly wrong. Two other witnesses were then examined-in-chief and the diary shows that the cross-examination was reserved till the Sessions. Mr. Dawson then appeared for the accused and a discussion took place as to whether the cross-examination of the witnesses had been postponed till the Sessions or until the witnesses for the prosecution had all been examined-in-chief; and he obtained leave to re-call the witnesses for cross-examination, after the remaining witnesses had been examined. Mr. Sutherland who appeared for the complainant then applied ex parte to the District Magistrate to set aside the order of the Additional Magistrate and his application was granted. The petitioner now applies in revision against that order of the District Magistrate.

It is clear that the District Magistrate had no power to cancel the order of the Additional Magistrate. He had power to call for the record and to submit the proceedings to this Court. But Mr. Sutherland contends, upon the authority of Po Win v. Crown (1), that if the order that was made by the District Magistrate without jurisdiction would be a proper order for this Court to pass, it is the duty of this Court to go into the case and to pass such an order. The first question, therefore, is:—was the order of the Additional Magistrate allowing an accused to re-call witnesses for the prosecution for the purposes of cross-examination a proper order or not. The proper time for cross-examination is no doubt immediately after the examination-in-chief—section 138, Evidence Act—and an order by a Magistrate allowing an accused without any special reason to postpone cross-examining the prosecution witnesses until they had been all examined-in-chief, is a procedure not contemplated by the Code. The following authorities bear out this view:—In re Mohamed Kasim (2), Durga Dutt v. Emperor (3) and Emperor v. Channing Arnold (4). On the other hand Mr. Dawson refers me to the case of Fazar Ali v. Mazaharulla (5), where it was held that the accused has the right to re call the prosecution witnesses for cross-examination so long as the prosecution case is not closed; and to the case of Jogendra Nath Mukherji v. Moti Lal Chakravarti (6), where it was held that it was open to the Magistrate under section 213 (sub-clause 2) of the Code to re-call witnesses for the prosecution if required by the defence for cross-examination. Upon the balance of authorities I am of opinion that the accused has no right to postpone his cross-examination of the witnesses for the prosecution until they have been all examined in-chief. But this is far from saying that the Magistrate would not be right in re-calling witnesses for further cross-examination if the circumstances of the case called for it. The Manual of this Court in paragraph 123 expressly lays down that it is the proper course, if the accused wishes it, for all the witnesses for the prosecution after having been examined-in-chief to be re-called for cross-examination. That direction has not the force of a judicial decision—though the Magistrate can hardly be blamed for acting under it; and as pointed out above it is not, I think, in accordance with the practice contemplated by the Code.

Now assuming that the order of the Additional Magistrate was not a proper order, what order should this Court pass? By prohibiting the accused from cross-examining the prosecution witnesses this Court would be prejudicing the accused's right in consequence of the accused having acted according to the direction of the Magistrate who acted under the direction of this Court's Manual. The utmost this Court could order would be to put the parties so far as is possible in status quo, which would be to allow the cross-examination to take place now. There are still ten witnesses to be examined for the prosecution. The order of the District Magistrate is set aside as having been made without jurisdiction and the Additional Magistrate is directed to allow the accused to re-call all or such of the 14 witnesses already examined as he may wish to cross-examine. They will be cross-examined and re-examined, if necessary, after which the remaining ten witnesses will be examined and cross-examined and the cross-examination of each witness will follow immediately after the examination-in-chief.

The case was sent up on the 10th April and evidence was not taken until the 23rd August, which seems to be an unnecessarily long time, and the Magistrate is directed to proceed with the case without delay.

Case sent back.

EMPEROR—RESPONDENT.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 496, 498, 112, 118—Security for good behaviour, proceedings for—Bail, excessive - Fair trial.

When a man is arrested who is not accused of a non-bailable offence, no needless impediments should be placed in the way of his being admitted to bail. The intention of the law is that in such cases the man is ordinarily to be at liberty and it is only if he is unable to furnish such moderate security, if any is required of him, as is suitable for the purpose of securing his appearance before a Court pending enquiry, that he should remain in detention. [p. 345, col. 2; p. 346, col. 1.]

An order was made against the accused under section 112 of the Code of Criminal Procedure and he was then told that he would be admitted to bail only if he furnished his own recognisance for Rs. 10,000 and a surety for the same amount, these being the particular sums which were also stated in the order under section 112. The result was that owing to his inability to furnish such heavy security the accused remained in custody during the greater part of the enquiry. Finally an order was made against him under section 118 of the Code of Criminal Procedure:

Held, that the order requiring security for bail in such large sums was oppressive and that the accused had not, therefore, had a fair trial and that the order under section 118 must consequently be set aside. [p. 346, col. 1.]

Criminal application for revision from an order passed by the District Magistrate, East Khandesh, confirming that of the First Class Magistrate, Jalgaon.

Mr. Binning (with him Mr. G. N. Thakor), for the Applicant.

Mr. S. S. Patkar, Government Pleader, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

HEATON, J.—In this case the applicant has been required to give security for good behaviour by an order made under section 118 of the Criminal Procedure Code. He has been required to give his own recognizance for Rs. 10,000 and one surety for Rs. 5,000. He has been unable to provide the surety. He appealed to the District Magistrate against the order who dismissed the appeal, and now he has applied to us in revision.

A good many points of some nicety have arisen in the course of the argument. The net result is, however, that in my opinion the order must be set aside, because I think the applicant has not had a fair trial. I use the word trial, although perhaps it is not technically the correct word to apply to proceedings under Chapter VIII of the Criminal Procedure Code. The reason why I think he did not have a fair trial is this: He was arrested under the provisions of section 55 of the Criminal Procedure Code, was taken before a Magistrate, and a complaint was presented by a Police Officer to the Magistrate demanding that security for good behaviour should be taken from him. So far the proceedings apparently were perfectly regular. But the applicant was then told that he would be admitted to bail only if he furnished his own recognizance for Rs. 10,000 and a surety for the same amount, these being the particular sums which were stated in the order made under section 112. Now it may be perfectly right to require security of that kind for future good behaviour from a person who is proved to be, or proved to be reputed to be, by habit a robber or receiver of stolen property and so forth. That is one thing, but it is quite a different thing when you have to consider what security a man should give for his appearance before the Magistrate during the progress of the inquiry which is to determine whether he is or is not such a person or reputed to be such a person. Having fixed this large security of Rs. 10,000, as the proper amount under section 112, it seems to me that when the Magistrate decided that he would only admit the applicant to bail during the inquiry on a surety for that same large amount, he was in fact, as the events proved, compelling this man by force of circumstances to remain in custody during the enquiry. After events showed that the applicant here was able to give very substantial security for his appearance, because he applied to the Sessions Judge, and the Sessions Judge modified the order and directed that he should be admitted to bail with a surety for Rs. 2,000 and this, after some time, the applicant was able to furnish. It is the intention of the law, as I understand it, that when a man is arrested, as this man was, who is not accused of a non-bailable offence, no needless impediments should be placed in the way of his being admitted to bail. The intention of the law undoubtedly, as I understand it, is that in such cases the man is ordinarily to be at liberty, and it is only if he is unable to furnish such moderate security, if any is required of him, as is suitable for the purpose of securing his appearance before a Court pending inquiry, that he should remain in detention. And that is I believe the almost universal application of the law on this point. Therefore, I think that to require this security for Rs. 10,000, merely in order to ensure that this man should be present during the inquiry, was an oppressive act which resulted in this: that the man was in custody, under detention, during the more important part of the inquiry when he ought to have been at large. This seems to me to constitute an unfair trial. In this case, therefore, the applicant has not had a fair trial, and I think the order made against him ought to be set aside.

A very interesting point arose in the course of the argument, and it was as to whether the Magistrate had power to order detention at all in the case of this applicant. The question may be stated thus: whether the applicant having been arrested as he was and being brought before the Magistrate for the purpose for which he was brought, that Magistrate had power to direct his detention if he failed to give bail; or whether the Magistrate was not bound forthwith to release him and treat him as a person who is merely required to attend the proceedings, that is to say, to treat him as a person on whom a summons has been issued. In the view I take of the matter it is unnecessary to decide this interesting and, it may be, somewhat difficult point, and, therefore, I express no opinion whatever on that point.

SHAH, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Order set aside.

EMPEROR—RESPONDENT.

Bombay District Municipal Act (III of 1901), ss. 92, 96—Re-construction of old building—Failure to give notice—Offence—Scope and object of s. 96.

The reference to section 92 in section 96, clause (1), of the Bombay District Municipal Act does not govern the whole of the clause but is limited to the clause describing projecting portions of buildings in respect of which the Municipality are empowered by that section to enforce a removal or set-back, so that notice or permission is requsiite in case of all buildings whether on a public road or in a private mahala. [p. 347, col. 1.]

Section 96 of the Bombay District Municipal Act does not empower the Municipality to deprive owners of the legitimate use of their land or to refuse permission to build at all, but it does confer on the Municipality a very wide power of regulating buildings. The object of the power is to secure the safety and sanitation of buildings to be newly erected. This power, though an encroachment on private rights, is not inconsistent with the Act. [p. 347, col. 1.]

Application for revision against the order of the Resident Magistrate, Tatta.

Mr. G. A. Kikla, for the Applicant.

Mr. E. Raymond, Public Prosecutor Sind, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

PRATT, J. C.—The applicant has been convicted under section 96 (5) of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901, of erecting a building without giving the notice to the Municipality required by section 96 (1) and fined Rs. 10.

The applicant contends that he has only re-constructed an old building, but under the explanation to the section the re-construction of an old building is included in the phrase "erect a building."

It is next contended that the reference to section 92 in section 96 (1) governs the whole clause and that notice or permission is only requisite in cases of buildings on a public street and that applicant's building is in a private mahalla. But the section is perfectly plain and does not bear this construction. Section 92 only refers to the clause describing projecting portions of buildings in respect of which the Municipality are empowered by that section to enforce a removal or set-back. The very wide words "Any building" also forbid this construction which is opposed to the plain words of the section.

Lastly, it is contended that it is inconsistent with the Act that the Municipality should pass orders in respect of private buildings and so interfere with private rights. The section does not empower the Municipality to deprive owners of the legitimate use of their land. It does not empower the Municipality to refuse permission to build at all, but it does confer on the Municipality a very wide power of regulating buildings. This was recognised in Nagar Valab Narsi v. Municipality of Dhandhuka (1), Municipality of Thana v. Fazal Karim (2), Tribhovan Chunilal v. Ahmedabad Municipality (3); Municipality of Karachi v. Mahomed Alli Essaji (4) and in respect of a similar section of the Madras Act in Queen-Empress v. Veerammal (5). The object of the power is, as indicated in the section itself, to secure the safety and sanitation of buildings to be newly erected. This power, though an encroachment on private rights, is not inconsistent with the Act. The section, therefore, applies in the present case and the conviction is legal.

We, therefore, reject this application.

CRIMINAL REVISION No. 267A OF 1917.

EMPEROR—PROSECUTOR

versus

U GYAW—CONVICT.

Burma Forest Act (IV of 1902), rr. 22, 98—License to fell timber, breach of condition of—Licensee, liability of, for acts of servants.

A licensee or other person permitted to fell timber in accordance with certain conditions under rules framed under the Forest Act is liable to be punished under those rules for the acts of his servants, whether authorised by him or not, and even if the acts are in contravention of his instructions, provided that those servants were acting within the scope of their master's authority and unless the master can show that he acted in good faith and did all that could be reasonably expected of him to prevent the breach of the conditions under which he is permitted to fell the timber. [p. 348, col. 2.]

Mr. Gaunt, Assistant Government Advocate, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—U Gyaw has been convicted under rule 98, read with rule 22, of the Burma Forest Act for having felled undersized kamaung trees in contravention of a license issued in the joint names of U Mra Tha Tun and himself. The case was tried summarily, and the facts are not as clearly stated as is desirable. They have not, however, been challenged, and the only point argued is whether on the Magistrate's finding, the accused is liable to be convicted of any offence. The Magistrate found that three undersized kamaung logs were cut by coolies employed by the accused; that the accused did not remove the logs (possibly because he had already been fined for a similar offence) and that in any case, whether the cutting was authorised by the accused or not, he was responsible and liable to the punishment prescribed by rule 98.

Rule 22 is as follows:—

"No person shall fell, cut, girdle, mark, lop, tap or injure by fire or otherwise..... any teak tree or any other tree of the kinds specified in the First Appendix and within the areas therein specified.....save under and in accordance with the conditions of a special agreement with Government or a license, etc...." This Rule is framed under the powers conferred on the Local Government by section 31 of the Act. Section 31 is in Chapter III, which is headed "General Protection of Forests and Forest Produce." The object of the Forest Act is to enable the Local Government to control the administration of forest areas by declaring some areas to be reserved forest, by regulating the felling of trees and the extraction of forest produce, and by imposing duty to be paid for privileges granted to individuals to trade and work within areas under forest. To secure this control, rules have been framed, and licenses are issued. It is wellknown that licensees seldom fell trees themselves and employ coolies for such work. The accused probably held a license under Form III, the 8th condition of which is that any breach of the conditions of the license will render him liable to lose his license and to the punishment prescribed in the Act or the rules made thereunder. In Shin Gyi v. Emperor (1) a Full Bench of this Court held that a licensee of a liquor shop whose agent or servant permits drunkenness is punishable under the provisions of section 50 of the Excise Act. The principle on which the decision in that case proceeded is that the object of the Excise Act would be defeated if a licensee was permitted to excuse himself on the ground that his servants had disobeyed his orders, provided that the servants were acting within the scope of their authority. This principle is very clearly stated in the Metropolitan Police Commissioner v. Cartman (2) by Lord Russell, C. J., in the following passage: "How do they (the licensees) carry on their business? From the nature of the case it must be largely carried on by others...; it is true that sometimes the licensee keeps in his own hands the direct control over his own business, but in the great majority of cases it is not so, the actual direct control being deputed to other persons: are the licensees in these cases to be liable for the acts of others? In my opinion they are, subject to this qualification, that the acts of the servant must be within the scope of his employment... It makes no difference for the purposes of this section that the licensee has given private orders to his manager not to sell to drunken persons; were it otherwise, the object of the section would be...defeated." A similar principle was applied in Strutt v. Cliff (3), which was a case under the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888, in which case the appellant was held liable for the unauthorised act of his bailiff in bringing back his family from the station in a milk cart and using the milk cart thus without a license. It seems to me that having regard to the objects of the Forest Act a similar responsibility must be attached to persons felling timber by coolies, otherwise the provisions of that Act would be rendered nugatory. The correct rule seems to be as follows:—A licensee or other person permitted to fell timber in accordance with certain conditions under rules framed under the Forest Act is liable to be punished under those rules for the acts of his servants, whether authorised by him or not, and even if the acts are in contravention of his instructions, provided that those servants were acting within the scope of their master's authority, and unless the master can show that he acted in good faith and did all that could be reasonably expected of him to prevent the breach of the conditions under which he is permitted to fell the timber.

There is no reason for interference with the conviction in the present case, and the proceedings are returned.

Conviction upheld.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 195 (1) (b)—Offence committed before First Class Magistrate—Sanction to prosecute, application for—Magistrate transferred—Court, proper.

An offence of abetment of perjury was committed during an enquiry into a murder case before a First Class Magistrate. An application for the grant of sanction to prosecute the accused was made to the Magistrate, but before the application could be disposed of the Magistrate was transferred and was succeeded by a Second Class Magistrate who had not the power to commit to the Court of Session. Before giving over charge the First Class Magistrate sent the papers to the District Magistrate, who granted the sanction required:

Held, that the District Magistrate had jurisdiction to dispose of the application, inasmuch as he was the successor of the First Class Magistrate to the extent that he had power to commit to the Court of Session, and was "such Court" referred to in section 195 (1) (b) of the Criminal Procedure Code. [p. 349, col. 2.]

RAMRAO N. BELLARY, In re.

Mr. S. S. Patkar, Government Pleader, for the Crown.

HEATON, J.—The applicant in this matter has asked us to set aside the sanction given by the District Magistrate of Dharwar to prosecute him for abetting the giving of false evidence. On the merits of the case we say nothing. But a question has been raised as to whether that District Magistrate had jurisdiction to make this order, a question the answer to which it is not so easy to give.

What happened is this. The First Class Magistrate of Ranebennur enquired into a case of murder and committed it to the Court of Session, and it is in relation to the proceedings of this First Class Magistrate's Court that the alleged offence was committed. Before the alleged offence of abetting the giving of false evidence can be enquired into by a Magistrate, there must be a sanction either of the Court in which were pending the proceedings in relation to which the alleged offence was committed or of some Court to which that Court is subordinate. The Court before which the proceedings were pending when the offence, if any, was committed, was the Court of the First Class Magistrate. But some time after the murder case had been disposed of by the Court of Session and after a question arose as to whether sanction should be granted and before that question was settled, the First Class Magistrate was transferred, and it seems he was succeeded in office by a Magistrate who had only a Second Class Magistrate's powers and had not power to commit to the Court of Session. It seems to me that the incoming Magistrate had no power to grant sanction in this case for these reasons.

We are dealing with a Court, and not with an officer. The Court of the Magistrate of Ranebennur which had power to commit cases to the Court of Session was not a Court of which the incoming Magistrate could take charge. For that reason the incoming Magistrate could not, in my opinion, succeed to any jurisdiction relative to a case which had been committed to the Court of Session. This difficulty seems to have been anticipated by the outgoing Magistrate, who before he left sent the papers to the District Magistrate. The latter took the matter on to his own file, issued the necessary notices, held an inquiry and gave the sanction

It is argued that this sanction was without jurisdiction. It seems to me that it was not without jurisdiction, for this reason. There was somewhere a successor to the outgoing Magistrate in the Court which, as regards the Ranebennur Taluka, had power to commit cases to the Court of Session, and that successor to this Court wherever he might be, would, in my opinion, be the Judge of the "such Court" referred to in sub-clause (b), clause 1, of section 195 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

I have already explained that this Court would not be the Court of the incoming Magistrate. It would be either the Court of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate or the Court of the District Magistrate. For either of them would have the power of committing to the Court of Session cases occurring in the Ranebennur Taluka, and as either of them would have that power, it seems to me that either of these Courts would be the "such Court" referred to and could grant the sanction.

It may be said that in the ordinary course of events cases in the Ranebennur Taluka which had to be committed to the Court of Session would go to the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, and not to the District Magistrate. That, no doubt, is true. In the ordinary course of events they would go to the Sub-Divisional Magistrate. Nevertheless, the District Magistrate had jurisdiction. Any such case might be sent to his Court and he could call for and himself deal with any such case, and as it happened, his was the Court to which these papers came and he was the Magistrate who dealt with the matter. I myself am unable to see that it can properly be said that he was without jurisdiction to grant the sanction. I am not at all sure but that the jurisdiction could also be upheld as being based on a transfer of the case to his own Court made by the District Magistrate in accordance with the powers he possesses under section 528, but I prefer definitely to base my conclusion on the other ground. This is that the District Magistrate was clearly at least one of the officers on whom devolved the disposal of committal of cases in the Ranebennur Taluka. So he was an officer who had jurisdiction to give sanction in this particular case.

As I have said, we say nothing on the merits, and as the only point of law of any substance has been decided against the applicant, we must discharge this Rule.

SHAH, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Rule discharged.

ABDUL ALI FAKIR AND ANOTHER—PETITIONERS

versus

NETALI FAKIR—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 378—Trees in possession of landlord cut by tenant—Offence.

Where trees standing on a demised land are in the possession of the landlord, it is theft on the part of the tenant to sever them from the ground, apart from any question of the possession of the land itself.

A clause in a kabuliyat provided that if the tenant cut any trees he would pay to the landlord compensation at a certain rate. The tenant knowing this clause mala fide cut the trees in order to injure the landlord:

Held, that the tenant was guilty of theft.

Maulvi Mahommad Mustapha Khan, for the Petitioners.

Mr. S. P. Sinha and Babu Ramani Mohan Chatterjee, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—The substantial question in this Rule is whether on the facts found the offence of theft was committed.

The facts are that the petitioners cut down a large number of valuable fruit trees—mango, jack, areca—on the land of one Jamir who, it is said by the defence, had conveyed his right to the petitioners. In Jamir's kabuliyat there is a clause to the effect that if he cut any trees he would pay to the landlord compensation at the rate of Rs. 10 per tree. It has been found that the petitioners, knowing this clause perfectly well, mala fide cut the trees in order to injure the landlord.

There can be no question that cutting down a large number of valuable fruit trees is a wanton act and the question in the present case is whether it amounts to theft.

Now it is clear from Explanation 1 to section 378, Indian Penal Code, that as soon as a tree is severed in order to the taking thereof, theft is committed; and it has been found that the petitioners severed these trees and removed some or all of them. They do not justify having cut down the trees. They say that they did not cut the trees and that if they did they had a right to. We take it that they did cut the trees. The question is whether they acted dishonestly.

The only reported case to which our attention has been drawn regarding the cutting down of trees is the case of Emperor v. Sabalsang (1). There the subject-matter of the charge was a babul tree and Aston, J., pointed out that to cut and remove such trees might be theft and was in that case to be regarded as theft because of the finding of dishonest intention of the accused person. It was held that the assertion of a bona fide belief in the claim set up by the accused ousts the jurisdiction of the Criminal Court; but it cannot be said on the facts of the present case that there was any such bona fide belief; rather the defence is a denial of cutting the trees and an assertion of claim to the land itself. But assuming that the land is in the possession of the petitioners, that does not give them a right to cut the trees which are in the possession of the landlord; because the trees cannot be dealt with by the tenants without the permission of the landlord. This is clear from the clause in Jamir's kabuliyat. The trees were wholly and solely in the possession of the landlord and it was theft to sever them from the ground, apart from any question of possession of the land itself.

We think, therefore, that the conviction is correct but, having regard to the dispute which exists between these parties, we think the ends of justice will be met by reducing the term of rigorous imprisonment to one of one month in the case of each of the petitioners. The fines will stand.

The Rule is discharged with this variation.

The petitioners will be remanded to jail.

Order modified.

JHANDA SINGH—RESPONDENT.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), ss. 415, 420—Cheating—Disposing of woman by misrepresenting caste and obtaining money—Offence.

To palm off a woman as belonging to a caste different to the one to which she really belongs with the object of obtaining money amounts to the offence of cheating as defined in section 415 of the Penal Code.

Appeal from the order of the Sessions Judge, Gurdaspur, dated the 13th March 1917.

Mr. Mul Chand, for the Appellant.

Mr. Anant Ram, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

SCOTT-SMITH, J.—The finding of the Magistrate in the case out of which the present appeal arises was that Musammat Santi, a sweeper woman whose husband is alive, was represented by Jhanda Singh, accused, to be a Jat by caste and a widow, and that thereby complainant was induced to pay Rs. 300 to Jhanda Singh which he would not have done but for the deception practised upon him. In accordance with this finding the Magistrate convicted Jhanda Singh of cheating under section 420, Indian Penal Code, and sentenced him to one year's rigorous imprisonment and to a fine of Rs. 50. Jhanda Singh appealed to the Sessions Judge, who held that the facts as found constituted no offence. He, therefore, accepted the appeal and acquitted the accused. From this order of acquittal the Local Government have filed an appeal in this Court.

The Sessions Judge's view is that no person has any right to sell an adult woman and as such a sale is void, that what the complainant purchased was a worthless or imaginary title to the woman, that he himself knew this perfectly well and that the misrepresentation, if any, made no difference to him. No doubt a woman cannot legally be sold, but in the Punjab at all events it is common knowledge that women are practically sold by persons who consider that they have a right to dispose of them in marriage, and both parties to such transactions look upon them as perfectly valid according to custom and the woman herself usually acquiesces in the arrangement. Whether such transactions are legally valid or not does not appear to us to be material. In our opinion the sole question for decision in the present case is whether Jhanda Singh, by deceiving the complainant as to whether the woman was a widow and as to her caste, fraudulently or dishonestly induced him to pay Rs. 300 to him, by which act he caused, or was likely to cause, damage or harm to the complainant in body, mind, reputation or property. In our opinion, if Jhanda Singh by representing Musammat Santi to be a Jat widow, when she was really a sweeper whose husband was alive, induced the complainant to pay Rs. 300 to him, he committed the offence of cheating as defined in section 415, Indian Penal Code, for there can be no doubt that the complainant's payment of Rs. 300 was likely to cause him loss. If any authority is needed in support of our conclusion it will be found in the cases reported as:—

Durga Das v. Emperor (1), Empress v. Sheeram (2), Queen v. Komul Dass (3), Queen v. Puddomonie (4) and Queen v. Dabee Singh (5).

In all of these cases it was held that to palm off a woman as belonging to a caste different to the one to which she really belongs with the object of obtaining money amounts to the offence of cheating.

The learned Sessions Judge has not gone into the evidence or recorded any finding on the merits. We, therefore, accept the appeal and setting aside the order of acquittal remand the appeal for re-decision to the lower Appellate Court.

Appeal remanded.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 182 - False information—Suspicion, expression of, whether amounts to giving false information.

Accused made a complaint to the Police that a hukka had been stolen from his house and that he suspected two persons. It was found that the hukka had really been stolen:

Held, that the stating of his suspicion by the accused did not amount to giving false information.

Babus Manmatha Nath Mukherjee and Sasadhar Roy (for Babu Upendra Kumar Roy), for the Petitioner.

JUDGMENT.—In this case a Rule has been issued to show cause why the prosecution of the petitioner under section 182, Indian Penal Code, should not be quashed. It appears that in his complaint the petitioner made no statement which can be said to be false. It is not denied that the hukka was stolen from his house. As to the person or persons who stole it, all that he said in his complaint was that he suspected two persons. That does not amount to giving false information. The Rule is accordingly made absolute and the proceedings against the petitioner are quashed.

versus

EMPEROR RESPONDENT.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 106—Security on conviction—Appellate Court, when can order security—Conviction by Second or Third Class Magistrate.

One of the essentials for justifying an Appellate Court in requiring security under section 106 of the Code of Criminal Procedure is that the accused must have been tried and convicted by a Court of the description mentioned in the first paragraph of the section, i.e, a Magistrate not inferior to a Magistrate of the First Class, and an appellate Court is, therefore, not competent to require security while hearing an appeal from a conviction by a Second or Third Class Magistrate.

LAL KHAN v. EMPEROR.

Revision from the order of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, Pindigheb, with appellate powers, dated the 13th March 1917.

JUDGMENT.—It is very doubtful whether the Appellate Court could make an order under section 106, Criminal Procedure Code, requiring the convict to furnish security for keeping the peace, considering that he was convicted by a Magistrate of the 3rd Class. One of the essentials for justifying the Appellate Court in requiring security is that the accused must have been tried and convicted by a Court of the description mentioned in the first paragraph of section 106, i. e., by a Magistrate not inferior to the Magistrate of the 1st Class, and Appellate Court is, therefore, not competent to require security while hearing an appeal from a conviction by a 2nd or 3rd Class Magistrate. This is the view taken by the Calcutta High Court, vide, inter alia, Emperor v. Momin Malita (1) and also by this Court, vide Gopal Singh v. King-Emperor (2). The Bombay High Court has, however, held that the word "also" in sub-section (3) of section 106, Criminal Procedure Code, means that an order may be made by an Appellate Court irrespective of the powers of the original Court, Emperor v. Bhausing (3). The matter is not free from doubt, but I see no sufficient reason to dissent from the view taken by this Court.

Further, the lower Appellate Court itself finds that "the whole affair was a very petty one" and that being the case, I do not think there was any necessity for passing an order under section 106, Criminal Procedure Code. Accordingly I accept the application for revision so far as to set aside that order. In all other respects the order of the lower Appellate Court is upheld.

Appeal from the decree of the Subordinate Judge, Unao, dated the 30th November 1916.

Babus Puttoo Lal and Mukund Behari Lal, for the Appellants.

Babu Ajit Prasad, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—Beni Madho Singh, Bijai Singh and Dulam Singh instituted a suit in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Unao against the Tahsildar of Unao as liquidator of the Dewara Bank on the following allegations:—The Dewara Bank was a village bank established in 1907. It was a society deemed to be registered under Act II of 1912, although it went into liquidation on 22nd June 1910. The provisions of section 42 of Act II of 1912 have application. The Tahsildar defendant was appointed as liquidator and he had the powers under section 42 of the Act from the date that it came into operation. On 8th October 1915 he passed an order under the provisions of section 42 (b) and (d), by which he directed Sheoratan Lal, Beni Madho Singh and Bijai Singh, members of the society, to contribute Rs. 5,632-8-9 towards the assets. This order was under the provisions of section 42 (5) enforceable by a Civil Court having local jurisdiction in the same manner as a decree of the Court.

The three plaintiffs instituted this suit for a declaration that the order in question was ultra vires and without jurisdiction and that it could not be executed. The Subordinate Judge dismissed the suit, partly on merits but mainly on the ground that under the provisions of section 42 (6) a Civil Court had no jurisdiction in respect of any matter connected with the dissolution of a registered society under the Act. The present appeal is preferred.

It is quite clear from reading the order in question that the Tahsildar, who was the liquidator under the Act, basing his authority on the provisions of the Act, has made what on the face of it is a perfectly legal order. He was well within his authority in making this order. It has been argued before us that he had passed this order against the plaintiffs not as members of the society but as officials and that under the provisions of the section he had no right to determine contributions to be made by the officials. This plea would in any circumstances have no effect in the case of persons who are also members. The plaintiffs were officers under the Act but they were liable to contribute. Other points have been taken in appeal to the effect that the liquidator did not give the benefit of some unspecified rule of limitation to the plaintiffs, and that he has saddled them with a greater liability than that they should justly bear. The appellants have asked the Civil Courts to decide in effect whether the order of the Tahsildar was a fair and just order based on correct legal principles. This is what the Civil Courts are not allowed to decide. The section is perfectly clear. The order of a liquidator cannot be questioned in the Civil Court in the ordinary way. The Local Government under section 43 (t) may make a rule permitting an appeal from the order made by a liquidator to the Court of the District Judge. Up to date no such rule has been made. Thus the order of a liquidator cannot be questioned at present, by way of an appeal to the Court of the District Judge and Civil Courts are expressly barred from interfering with such an order. The learned Subordinate Judge rightly decided that he had no jurisdiction to hear the suit.

ASGAR ALI v. DOST MOHAMMAD.

There is only one point to be added. The appellants attack the order awarding costs on the ground that the Government Pleader of Unao who appeared for the defendant in lower Court did not file a certificate. The rule applicable is rule 272 of the Oudh Civil Digest. The rule in question is clear upon the point. A legal practitioner appearing for the Crown, or Government, or the Court of Wards, or a local authority need not file a certificate. All other Pleaders must file a certificate. If they do not do so the fee cannot be entered as taxed costs. Here the defendant was neither the Crown, the Government, nor the Court of Wards, nor a local authority. The circumstance that the Pleader was the Government Pleader did not remove the necessity of filing a certificate. The rule is mandatory and we have no discretion. It must be applied. We, therefore, cut out the item for Pleader's fee from the decree. But as the appellants have failed on all the main points we direct that they pay thier own costs and those of the respondent in this appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

Registration Act (XIX of 1843), s. 2—Registration Act (XVI of 1908), s. 50—Unregistered sale-deed accompanied by delivery of possession—Subsequent registered deed—Priority.

A prior unregistered sale-deed, which is not compulsorily registrable and which is accompanied by delivery of possession, is not invalidated by a subsequent registered sale-deed of the same property either under section 2 of the Registration Act of 1843 or under section 50 of the Registration Act of 1908. The person claiming under the prior unregistered deed, however, must not only prove the deed but also the delivery of possession. [p. 356, col. 1; p. 357, col. 1.]

A title which has once vested by virtue of a deed, be it unregistered, cannot be divested by a subsequent registered document. [p. 356, col. 1.]

Appeal from a decision of the Subordinate Judge, Shahabad, dated the 21st September 1916.

FACTS appear sufficiently from the judgment.

Mr. Parmeshwar Dayal, for the Appellants, contended that the defendants' sale-deed of 7th June 1863 was executed when the Registration Act XIX of 1843 was in force. It was an unregistered document. Section 2 of Act XIX of 1843 provided that a registered deed of sale would invalidate any deed which was unregistered, whether the latter document was executed prior or subsequent to the registered one. The plaintiff's document was a registered one. The defendants' unregistered sale-deed had no force as against the plaintiff especially when there was no finding of the Court below that the defendants got possession of the property under their unregistered deed. He relied on Sibendrapada Banerjee v. Secretary of State for India in Council (1), Boikuntonath Sett v. Russick Loll Burmono (2), Nathu Ram v. Phulchand (3). Section 54 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, provides that a sale of immoveable property of a value below Rs. 100 could be effected by registered instrument or by delivery of possession. An unregistered sale-deed could pass no title in the property from the vendor to the vendee unless it was accompanied by possession. Delivery of possession was an essential element to pass title where the sale was sought to be effected by an unregistered document. This was the law prior to 1882 when the Transfer of Property Act was passed and at the time when the defendants' unregistered document was executed. It was, therefore, necessary for the defendant to prove that he got possession in 1863 by virtue of his unregistered document. Relied on Bhyroo Chunder Misser v. Ramchunder Bhuttacharjee (4), Salim Shaikh v. Boidonath Ghuttuck (5).

Jadubans Sahai), for the Respondents, contended that at the time when the sale-deed of 1863 was executed, the registration was not compulsory. The execution of an unregistered deed was sufficient to pass title from the vendor to the vendee. The sale-deed, although it was an unregistered document, completely passed the ownership in the property to the vendee. The fact that the vendee was in possession of the property at the time of the institution of the suit, sufficiently proved that the possession was also delivered along with execution of the sale-deed in 1863.

[JWALA PRASAD, J.—It must be proved that the respondents got possession under the unregistered document in their favour.]

Yes, but because the respondents are in possession of the property, the presumption would be that they got possession of it at the time of the execution of the sale-deed and since then they are in possession by virtue of it. The plaintiffs sue for possession. They must prove that they have been in possession of the property in dispute within 12 years.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiffs are the appellants. They brought a suit in the Court of the Additional Munsif of Buxar for declaration of their title to and recovery of possession over the lands marked in the sketch attached to the plaint as K and L. The learned Munsif gave a decree to the plaintiffs in respect of both the plots.

On appeal the learned Subordinate Judge of Shahabad, by his judgment dated 21st September 1916, upheld the judgment of the Munsif as regards the plot marked L and dismissed the suit as regards the plot marked K. We are, therefore, concerned in this appeal only with the plot marked K.

The claim of the plaintiffs is based upon a sale-deed executed by one Ibrahim on the 24th of Kuar 1307, corresponding to 21st September 1900. This deed is a registered one. The plaintiffs alleged that they were in possession of the land under the kabala referred to above; that their names were entered in the Survey Record-of-Rights and that they were interfered with in their possession by the defendants trying to construct a wall upon a portion of the land which caused their dispossession in Magh 1322 Fasli. The suit is, therefore, for recovery of possession after declaration of the title of the plaintiffs.

The defendants, on the other hand, inter alia, contend that the vendor Ibrahim had no right to sell the disputed land to the plaintiffs and challenge the plaintiffs' sale-deed as being collusive and fraudulent, and further allege that the land in suit was purchased by Faqira, the ancestor of the defendants, from Sohait, the father of Ibrahim, on 6th Asadh 1270, corresponding to 7th June 1863, under a sale deed. The defendants' sale-deed is not a registered one. The Munsif held that the defendants' sale-deed was not executed by Sohait as alleged by them and the deed was a fraudulent one in order to defeat the title of the plaintiffs based upon the registered document. The Munsif further held that the oral evidence of possession adduced by the plaintiffs is superior to that adduced on behalf of the defendants.

Upon the above findings the Munsif gave decree for possession to the plaintiffs. The learned Subordinate Judge held that the sale-deed of the defendants was a genuine one and duly executed by Sohait, father of Ibrahim, and that Ibrahim had no subsisting interest in the property in 1900 when the land purports to have been sold to the plaintiffs.

The learned Vakil, for the appellants, contends that the finding of the Subordinate Judge is wrong in law. The defendants' sale-deed of 7th June 1863 was executed when the Registration Act XIX of 1843 was in force. Section 2 of that Act provided that a registered deed of sale or gift of real property would invalidate any other deed of sale or gift for the same property which may not have been registered, whether the second or other document was executed prior or subsequent to the registered one. It is needless to go into the history of the legislation on the point as to the various changes that took place from 1843 to the present moment. In the interval between 1864 and 1877 registration did not take priority as is provided for under section 2 of the aforesaid Act of 1843, but thereafter the state of law as existed in 1843 was restored in Act III of 1877 and in the present Act XVI of 1908 whereby "every document shall, if duly registered, take effect as regards the property comprised therein, against every unregistered document relating to the same property." No doubt there has been some change in the expression used in section 2 of Act XIX of 1843, namely, "invalidate" in that section has been substituted in the present section by the words: "Shall take effect against a document." But neither under the old Act of 1843 nor under Act III of 1877, nor under the present Act of 1908, I am prepared to hold that the effect of subsequent registration of the plaintiffs' sale-deed would be to annul and invalidate the defendants' sale-deed, though unregistered, executed long prior to that of the plaintiffs, if possession was delivered to the defendants under the deed. It is a well-known principle that the title once vested by virtue of a deed, be it unregistered, cannot be divested by a subsequent registered document. It must be remembered that in this particular case the document was not compulsorily registrable, the value of the property sold being less than one hundred rupees. The principle is recognized in section 54 of the Transfer of Property Act, IV of 1882, which provides that transfer of a property of the value of less than a hundred rupees may be made by an unregistered sale-deed provided possession is delivered under the deed. Delivery of possession has always been considered in every country as an effective mode of transfer of any property, as has been fully discussed and demonstrated in the case of Salim Shaikh v. Boidonath Ghuttuck (5). It is needless to go over the ground again. Suffice it to say that I am entirely in agreement with the view expressed in that ruling. In the recent case of Sibendrapada Banerjee v. Secretary of State for India in Council (1) it was held that delivery of possession under an unregistered deed must be proved under section 54 of the Transfer of Property Act. The position appears to be the same prior to the Transfer of Property Act and in respect of documents governed by the Registration Act of 1843. The case of Bhyroo Chunder Misser v. Ramchunder Bhuttacharjee (4) is a direct authority on the point. The facts of that case are on all fours with the present one. I may with propriety quote the language of that ruling in support of my view:—

"The gift having been made seven years prior to the sale, and the gift having been fully proved, as well as the possession under it, no question arises as to which of these deeds is entitled to preference. Had these two deeds been contemporary transactions, and had evidence as to each been equally balanced, then the provisions of Act XIX of 1843 would have decided in favour of the registered deed. But in the case now actually before us, the vendor had divested himself of the proprietary right in the lands in suit seven years before he executed the deed of sale to the defendant. The mere fact of the petitioners obtaining the registration of the deed of sale cannot entitle them to annul every preceding transaction, in respect to the same property, done in good faith and carried out in its provisions years before. The sale, by reason of the prior alienation by gift, was not a valid sale, and registration can have no benefit in such a case."

The sale-deed in favour of the plaintiffs would not be of any avail against the sale deed in favour of the defendants though unregistered, provided effect to it was given and possession was held under it.

The plaintiffs alleged in the plaint that they were in possession since their purchase in 1900 and that the Survey Record-of-Rights of 1912 recorded their possession and that they were dispossessed by the defendants in 1322 (1915). The defendants on the other hand asserted their possession under their sale-deed of 1863 but did not deny that the Survey entry in respect of the land was made in favour of the plaintiffs. The Munsif held that the plaintiffs had proved their possession. The Subordinate Judge, while holding that the document in favour of the defendants was a genuine one, did not find whether the defendants' ancestor or the defendants were, in terms of the aforesaid authority, in possession of the land in dispute under that sale-deed. This brings us to the second contention of the plaintiffs, viz., that the finding of the learned Subordinate Judge that the defendants' document is genuine is not enough to give title to the defendants unless possession was delivered to the defendants under that sale-deed. This contention of the plaintiffs must prevail.

The defendants ought, therefore, not only to prove that they had an unregistered sale-deed in their favour, but that under that it was completed by delivery of the property to them. Their having obtained possession on dispossessing the plaintiffs in 1322 will not give them title. The defendants or their ancestors must show that they obtained possession under the deed. Their possession prior to the plaintiffs' deed of 1900 might afford a good presumption in their favour of having obtained possession under the deed of 1863. The finding of the Court below is, therefore, not sufficient to dispose of the appeal.

The case must, therefore, be remitted to the Court below in order to find whether effect was given to the transaction embodied in the sale-deed of the defendants, namely, the deed of June 1863, and whether the defendants are in possession under that deed. The finding of the Court below should be returned to this Court by the second week of February 1918. The costs will abide the result.

Case sent back.

Jurisdiction of Civil and Revenue Courts—Landlord and tenant—Under-proprietary right, claim for—Evidence—Proof—Suit, maintainability of—Oudh Rent Act (XXII of 1886), s. 108 (10).

At the time of the first regular settlement in 1877 a suit was brought by certain persons claiming to be under-proprietors of an entire village. The Settlement Court dismissed the suit on the ground that each under-proprietor should bring a separate suit for the sir plots in his possession. One of those persons then brought a separate suit for a declaration of his rights to certain sir plots, impleading the superior proprietors as defendants in his suit. His allegation was that he was one of the old proprietors of the village and had been in possession of the plots in dispute in proprietary right on payment of a certain amount of annual rent to the superior proprietors. Some of the superior proprietors admitted the claim. The suit was, however, dismissed otherwise than on merits, and it was left open to the said person to sue for his rights after the bar to the trial of the suit was removed. No such suit was thereafter filed by that person or his successors-in-interest. But, in 1882, the then superior proprietor issued a notice of ejectment against that person, who contested it and succeeded in getting it cancelled on the ground that he was a zemindar and that his right as such had been admitted by the persons from whom the then superior proprietor derived his title. In 1902 the superior proprietors sought to eject the successors-in-interest of the said person, i. e., the present plaintiffs, from the said plots, by notice through the Revenue Court. The plaintiffs contested the notice on the ground that they were under-proprietors, but the finding of the Revenue Court was against them and they were ejected in 1903. Then they brought a suit for possession of the plots in the Civil Court, alleging that they were under-proprietors and had been wrongfully ejected by the Revenue Court, but their suit was dismissed on the ground that they should first seek their remedy under section 108 (10) of the Oudh Rent Act. They accordingly went to the Revenue Court, but that Court dismissed their suit on the point of limitation. Then followed the present suit for possession and damages, filed in the Civil Court in 1915, similar to the previous suit dismissed by that Court:

Held, (1) that under the above circumstances the plaintiffs' under-proprietary title was satisfactorily established. [p. 359, col. 1.]

(2) that the present suit in the Civil Court was not barred by reason of the fact that the plaintiffs' remedy under section 108 (10) of the Oudh Rent Act had been found by the Revenue Court to be barred by time. [p 359, col. 2.]

The Hon'ble Pandit Gokaran Nath Misra, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The dispute in this case relates to six plots of land, of which the plaintiffs claim to be the under-proprietors. The defendants are the superior proprietors of the village, in which the said plots stand. They sought to eject the plaintiffs through the Revenue Court under section 54 of the Oudh Rent Act (XXII of 1886). The present plaintiffs contested that notice on the ground that they were under-proprietors, but the finding of the Revenue Court was against them, and they were accordingly ejected on the 5th June 1903. They then brought a suit for possession of the said plots in the Civil Court alleging that they were under-proprietors and had been wrongfully ejected by the Revenue Court; but their suit was dismissed on the ground that they should first seek their remedy under section 108, clause (10), of the Oudh Rent Act. The decision of this Court in that case is contained in Khadim Husain v. Jamil Bibi (1). They then went to the Revenue Court and sued for the recovery of the occupancy of the land from which they had been dispossessed, alleging that they were under-proprietors of the same. But that suit was dismissed by the Revenue Court on the ground that it was not brought within one year from the date of dispossession, as required by section 129 of the Oudh Rent Act. The present suit then followed, in which a claim was made for possession and damages. It was filed on the 14th May 1915 within 12 years from the date when the dispossession originally took place.

The Courts below dismissed the suit on the ground that the plaintiffs had failed to establish that they were under-proprietors or had acquired under-proprietary rights by adverse possession. The lower Appellate Court further held that the suit was not maintainable, inasmuch as the remedy of the plaintiffs under section 108, clause (10), of the Oudh Rent Act was found to be barred by time.

In regard to the under-proprietary right set up by the plaintiffs, it is not disputed that in 1877 a suit was brought by certain persons claiming to be under-proprietors of the entire Chak Satar, in which the plots in dispute are situated. The Settlement Court dismissed the suit on the ground that each under-proprietor should bring a separate suit for the sir plots in his possession. Mohammad Hussain, who was one of the claimants before the Settlement Court and is the predecessor-in-interest of the present plaintiffs, then brought a separate suit for a declaration of his rights to certain sir plots, including those now in dispute, impleading the superior proprietors, Har Prasad, Hanoman Prasad and Sarju Prasad, as defendants in his suit His allegation was that he was one of the old proprietors (zemindar qadim) of the village, and had been in possession of the plots in dispute in proprietary right on payment of a rental of Rs. 33 per year to the superior proprietors. Har Prasad appeared in person and admitted the claim, stating that Mohammad Husain was entitled to a decree by virtue of his zemindari right. The statement made by Har Prasad appears to have been supported by Sarju Prasad also, whose signature it purports to bear, though his name is not mentioned in the body of the statement. The Assistant Commissioner, who was trying the case, found that the entire village was held kham by the Deputy Commissioner who was no party to the suit, and that so long as the village was held kham, the plaintiff could not sue for his rights. He, therefore, dismissed the suit leaving it open to the plaintiff to sue for his rights after the village was released.

No suit appears to have been thereafter filed by Mohammad Husain or his successors-in-interest; but it is significant that in 1882 Sheo Charan Lal, the then superior proprietor, issued a notice of ejectment against Mohammad Husain, who contested it and succeeded in getting it cancelled on the ground that he was a zemindar and that his right as such had been admitted by the persons from whom the then superior proprietor had derived his title (Exhibit 7). This order was passed on the 8th June 1882 and covered all the plots now in dispute except Nos. 71/2 and 71/3 khasra.

The Courts below do not treat the admission made by Har Prasad in 1878 as binding on his co-sharers or as evidencing the under-proprietary title claimed by Mohammad Husain. They also treat the order cancelling the notice as insufficient to invest Mohammad Husain or his successors-in-interest with an under-proprietary title by adverse possession. But as pointed out in Raja Bhagwan Bakhsh Singh v. Mazhar Husain (2), an acknowledgment by the taluqdar may be sufficient proof of an under-proprietary title, particularly when it is made in a suit in which the plots in question were claimed as having been held by the claimant as his sir by virtue of his being an old zemindar. The finding of the Revenue Court in the suit filed by Mohammad Husain to contest the notice of ejectment issued by Sheo Charan Lal also supports the same conclusion. The plaint filed by Mohammad Husain is not available, but the fact that such an adverse order was passed against the predecessor-in-interst of the present superior proprietors was enough to set limitation running as against him and as held in Harnandan v. Raja Bhup Indar Bikram Singh (3) and Har Dayal v. Udit Narain Singh (4), the right of Mohammad Husain and his successors-in-interest as under-proprietors, even if it did not originally exist, has been perfected in respect of the land comprised in the notice of ejectment by adverse possession since 1882. In the lower Appellate Court defendant No. 2, one of the superior proprietors, admitted the under-proprietary title of the plaintiffs in the plots in dispute to the extent of her half share of the superior proprietary interest. As against defendant No. 1, owning the remaining half, the plaintiffs' under-proprietary title is satisfactorily established.

The next question for consideration is whether the present suit of the plaintiffs is barred by reason of the dismissal of the previous suit filed by them in the Revenue Court for the occupancy of the land in dispute under section 108, clause (10), of the Oudh Rent Act. Section 108 gives to the Revenue Court exclusive jurisdiction over suits for the recovery of the occupancy of any land which has been treated by the landlord as abandoned or from which an under-proprietor or a tenant has been illegally ejected by the landlord. It does not, however, give to the Revenue Court exclusive jurisdiction to decide questions of under proprietary title or the right to under-proprietary possession. When an under-proprietor is ejected by his landlord from the land in his occupation, he cannot, as pointed out in Chandrika Bakhsh Singh v. Raghunath Kunwar (5), get back the occupancy or physical possession of that land, unless he files a suit against the landlord for the said purpose within the period of one year allowed by section 129 of the Oudh Rent Act. But if he does not file such a suit, his under-proprietary right is not thereby annulled or lost, for all that he loses is his summary remedy to be restored to actual occupation of the land on the strength of his previous possession which the Revenue Court is exclusively competent to grant. In Ram Pargash v. Raja Adiya Dat Udai Partab Singh (6), which was followed in Khadim Husain v. Jamil Bibi (1), it was held that if a person who claims to be an under-proprietor, was illegally ejected by the superior proprietor by means of the machinery provided by the Oudh Rent Act or in any other manner, he should in the first instance sue under section 108, clause (10), of that Act; and if his suit be thrown out by the Revenue Court, he could then sue the landlord for possession in the Civil Court and ask for a declaration of his rights. It may be doubted whether section 108, clause (10), was intended to cover cases of ejectment by the process of law. But anyhow the remedy given by that section, so far as it extends, does not oust the jurisdiction of the Civil Courts, to decide whether or not a person in possession of land holds a proprietary or under-proprietary right therein, and as poined out by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Mohammad Abul Husan Khan v. Prag (7), the decision of the Revenue Court on a question of that character is not final or conclusive. It was open, therefore, to the plaintiffs, after they had been unsuccessful in getting back the occupancy of the land of which they had been deprived, to sue in the Civil Court for a declaration of their under-proprietary title or for possession of their under proprietary right. The dismissal of their suit under section 108, clause (10), had no other effect than that of depriving them of the benefit of the summary remedy provided by that section and obtaining back the physical occupation of the land on the strength of their previous occupation; and the present suit for possession of the under-proprietary right as such, as distinct from the tilling right, is maintainable. The object of section 108, clause (10), in providing a summary remedy enforceable within a limited period evidently was to obviate the tilling right being kept under suspense for any length of time. In the case of a tenancy the remedy so provided is exclusive, but it has no effect in determining proprietary or under-proprietary rights, where they exist.

The appeal is, therefore, allowed and the plaintiffs' claim decreed for under-proprietary possession of the plots in dispute with costs throughout. The contesting defendant will bear her own costs in all the Courts.

Appeal allowed.

Mr. Kimatrai Bhojraj, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT—This is an application to file an award under the Indian Arbitration Act. The application is opposed on the ground (inter alia) that the arbitrator whose award it is sought to file was not validly appointed.

It is admitted that both parties appointed Bhai Relomal as their arbitrator and that a reference to him was duly signed. This was on the 7th February.

At that time, Bhai Relomal was not in Karachi and, on the 8th February, Messrs. Beharilal Keshowdas, through their Pleader, called on Messrs. Dipchand Parsram to nominate another arbitrator. To this, Messrs. Dipchand Parsram replied as follows:—

"The delay is on part of your client, as, when we had given Bhai Relomal's name, he was here and your client replied after a long time. The arbitrator is expected within a week and if he does not come, we shall appoint another arbitrator." This letter was sent on the 9th February. On the 13th Messrs. Castellino and Sobhanmal for Beharilal called on Dipchand Parsram to nominate another arbitrator, and, on the 28th February, having received no reply, they again wrote (Exhibit 8) nominating Dwarkaparsad as their arbitrator and warning them that, if they did not nominate some other person within 7 days, they would appoint the gentleman named as sole arbitrator. On the 14th March, Beharilal Keshowdas signed a reference on behalf of both parties to Dwarkaparsad. The reference ignores the previous nomination of Bhai Relomal.

Mr. Kimatrai, for Dipchand Parsram, contends that, once there had been a submission to Bhai Relomal, it was irrevocable without the leave of the Court and that, if Bhai Relomal neglected to act, the other side should have proceeded under section 8 of the Act. This contention must prevail. Mr. Castellino suggests that by their letter of the 9th February (Exhibit 9) Dipchand Parsram agreed to revoke, and did revoke, the submission to Relomal. But that letter contained nothing more than an expression of intention and, even if we were to construe it as a legal agreement to name an arbitrator, the proper procedure, on its breach, would have been under section 8 of the Act. Further, Relomal, on the 14th March, still held his mandate from the parties; it is not suggested, and there is no evidence, that he had surrendered it. This mandate was, under section 5, irrevocable without leave of the Court.

I must hold that the award was improperly procured and set it aside.

The application is dismissed with costs.

Application dismissed.

APPEAL FROM APPELLATE DECREE No. 1037 OF 1915.

Registration Act (XVI of 1908), s. 77—Suit to enforce registration—Procedure—Suit for recovery of possession on declaration of title by purchase or on specific performance of contract of sale, maintainability of—Frame of suit—Alleged transferee from vendor, whether can be joined as party.

Before a plaintiff can institute a suit under section 77 of the Registration Act to enforce registration of a document, he must follow strictly the procedure prescribed by the Act for obtaining registration of documents. [p. 362, col. 1.]

B executed a conveyance of certain land in favour of A but did not register it. Neither did he put A in possession of the land. A brought a suit against B praying for possession on declaration of title or on specific performance of the contract of sale. A made C a party to the suit, on the ground that the latter held a kobala of the land executed in his favour by B:

Held, that in such a case though A could not sue for enforcement of registration under section 77 of the Registration Act without following strictly the procedure laid down in the Act for enforcing registration of documents, yet as the agreement to sell remained unperformed, A was entitled to claim specific performance of the agreement to sell. [p. 362, col. 1.]

Held, further, that to avoid multiplicity of suits it was necessary for the plaintiff to join C as a party to the suit properly framed for specific performance. [p. 362, col. 2.]

Appeal against the decree of the Officiating Subordinate Judge, 3rd Court of Midnapore, dated the 9th March 1915, reversing that of the Officiating Munsif, 1st Court of Tamluk, dated the 15th of December 1913.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Babu Panna Lall Banerjee for Babu Manmatha Nath Mukherjee, for the Appellant.—The Court of Appeal below has erred in holding that as the plaintiff had not followed the provisions of the Registration Act for obtaining registration of the conveyance executed by the defendants Nos. 1 to 4, the present suit was not maintainable. Even assuming that the claim for obtaining registration of the document under section 77 of the Registration Act is not maintainable, the alternative claim made in the suit for specific performance of the agreement to sell ought to have been allowed. The defendants did enter into a contract with the plaintiff to sell the land, and that contract of theirs still remains unperformed by them. The plaintiff is, therefore, entitled to proceed against his vendors to compel them to fulfil their contract.

Babu Jyotish Chandra Hazra, for the Respondents.—The whole suit is based not upon the agreement to sell but upon the executed conveyance which the defendants refused to register. The suit being principally a suit for declaration of title and for recovery of possession based upon an unregistered conveyance, the lower Appellate Court was right in dismissing it.

The defendant No. 5, the transferee, is not a necessary party to this suit and the plaintiff is not entitled to claim any relief against him in this suit.

Babu Panna Lall Banerjee, for the Appellant in reply.—With a view to avoid multiplicity of suits the defendant No. 5, the alleged transferee, has been rightly joined as a party to this suit.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal by the plaintiff in a suit instituted by him on the 21st December 1912 for recovery of possession of land on declaration of title by purchase or on specific performance of a contract of sale. The case for the plaintiff is that the disputed property belonged to the first four defendants, that he obtained a conveyance from them on the 30th November 1912 and that his vendors had not only failed to register the document and to place him in possession but had transferred the property to the 5th defendant. The latter conveyance bears date the 29th November 1912, but the plaintiff asserts that the document is collusive and has in fact been antedated. The Court of first instance found on the merits in favour of the plaintiff and decreed the suit. The Court held that the sale to the 5th defendant was collusive and without consideration and that although it purported to be anterior to the agreement whereon the plaintiff relied, the transaction took place really after the institution of this suit. Upon appeal the Subordinate Judge has reversed the decision of the Trial Court and has dismissed the suit, on the ground that the plaintiff was not competent to seek registration of the conveyance executed in his favour as he had not followed the provisions of the Indian Registration Act to compel registration of the document. In support of this view, the Subordinate Judge has relied upon the decisions in Edun v. Mahomed Siddik (1), Lakhimoni Chowdhrain v. Akroomoni Chowdhrain (2) and Sheikh Rahmatulla v. Sheikh Sariutulla Kagchi (3). In our opinion, the decree of the Subordinate Judge cannot possibly be upheld.

The plaintiff framed his suit in the alternative. As regards the claim to enforce registration of the document executed in his favour by his vendors he was, no doubt, bound to follow strictly the procedure prescribed by the Indian Registration Act before he could institute a suit under section 77 to compel registration. But as regards the alternative claim to enforce specific performance of the agreement to sell there was really no answer to the suit. Although the vendors had executed the document, they could not be deemed to have completely performed their part of the agreement. The agreement in essence was not merely to execute a conveyance which until registered would be inoperative in law, but to transfer the full title from themselves to the plaintiff as purchaser. Such title could be transferred only by means of a registered instrument; consequently, the execution of the conveyance not followed by registration could not be regarded as fulfilment of the contract. The true position then is that the agreement to transfer remained unperformed and the plaintiff was entitled to proceed against his vendors to compel them to fulfil their contract. This is not opposed to the decision in Sheikh Rahmatulla v. Sheikh Sariutulla Kagchi (3) as the plaintiff does not seek to found his title on the unregistered conveyance which is inoperative in law.

It was necessary for the plaintiff to join the 5th defendant as a party to the suit properly framed for specific performance. That defendant claimed title under a conveyance ostensibly anterior in date to the agreement which is the foundation of the alleged title of the plaintiff. If the conveyance was in reality anterior to the agreement, the plaintiff has clearly no enforceable claim against that defendant. But if, on the other hand, the conveyance in favour of the 5th defendant has been antedated, the plaintiff can enforce his claim not merely against his vendors but also against that defendant, provided it is established that the latter has taken with notice of the agreement with the plaintiff. This relief could not have been obtained in a suit framed and instituted in accordance with section 77 of the Indian Registration Act. We cannot thus hold that the only remedy, of the plaintiff was a suit of that description because the consequence would be that the plaintiff if successful in such a litigation would be driven to institute a second suit against the 5th defendant for establishment of his title and for recovery of possession. To avoid multiplicity of litigation, it was open to the plaintiff to frame his suit as he has done and to seek relief as well against his vendors as against their alleged transferee.

The result is that this appeal is allowed, the decree of the Subordinate Judge set aside and the case remitted to him in order that he may re-hear the appeal on the merits The question for investigation will be, whether the plaintiff has an enforceable claim against the 5th defendant on the basis of the agreement of sale alleged to have been made with him on the 30th November 1912. In this connection the question raised in the fourth issue will require consideration. The appellant is entitled to his costs both here and in the lower Appellate Court.

Bombay District Municipal Act (III Bom. of 1901), s. 160 (3)—Land Acquisition Act (I of 1894), s. 23 (2)—Award of compensation by District Court—Power of Court to award 15 per cent. on market value—"Procedure," meaning of—Revision—High Court, power of interference of—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 115.

Under section 160 (3) of the Bombay District Municipal Act, the matter of the compensation is to be determined by the District Court, which decides the question in the exercise of its jurisdiction as a Civil Court. Its proceedings are, therefore, subject to revision by the Judicial Commissioner's Court under section 115 of the Civil Procedure Code. [p. 366, cols. 1 & 2; p. 365, col. 2.]

The word "procedure" in section 160 (3) of the Bombay District Municipal Act is used in its popular and not in its strictly legal sense, and a District Court in awarding compensation under that section has power to award 15 per cent. of the market value in addition to such value. [p. 366, col. 2.]

Application for revision against the order of the Joint Judge, Hyderabad.

Mr. Hirdaram Mewaram, for the Applicant.

Mr. Kimatrai Bhojraj, for the Opponent.

JUDGMENT.

CROUCH, A. J. C.—This is an application under section 115, Civil Procedure Code, against an order of the Joint Judge, Hyderabad, under section 160, District Municipal Act, awarding 15 per cent. of the amount of the market value for compulsory acquisition.

The learned Judge made it clear in his judgment that, in his opinion, it was not lawful to give the 15 per cent. compensation: in previous cases he had refused it; but in this case he gave it out of deference to this Court which had, on its original side, awarded such compensation in a case where the point was not in issue.

Applicant contends that the case is a fit one for the exercise of this Court's extraordinary power of revision, inasmuch as the point decided is one of great and general importance, that the law is clear, and that the learned Judge has acted improperly in deciding contrary to what he believed to be the law.

If there be no obstacle in the way of applying the provisions of section 115, I am of opinion that the case is a fit one for revision, assuming that the applicant can satisfy the Court that the 15 per cent. compensation cannot be lawfully awarded. But Mr. Kimatrai, for the opponent, raises the preliminary objection that section 115 has no application to an award under section 160, District Municipal Act. It is necessary to decide this objection before hearing arguments on the merits.

The history of section 115 is well known. In the Code of 1859 no revisional powers were conferred on the Courts. Under Act XXIII of 1861, the Sudder Court might call for the record of any case decided on appeal in which no further appeal lay, if the subordinate Court, on hearing the appeal, appeared to have exercised a jurisdiction not vested in it by the law. By section 222 of the Code of 1877, the words "or to have failed to exercise a jurisdiction so vested" were added; and, lastly, by section 92 of Act XIII of 1872 the power of revision was extended to cases where the Court had acted in the exercise of its jurisdiction illegally or with material irregularity.

It is clear that it was the intention of the Legislature, in framing this section, to give to the High Court powers of supervision and superintendence. The powers, as originally conferred, differed materially from those of an Appellate Court; and though, as enlarged, they approximate to those of an Appellate Court, yet the scope and intention of the section remain distinct. The High Court is to see that its subordinate Courts do not interfere in matters of which they have no cognizance, that they do not fail to exercise their jurisdiction and that they do not abuse their powers or act illegally in the exercise of them.

It was held in Chunilal Virchand v. Ahmedabad Municipality (1) that no appeal lies from the decision of a District Court under clause (3) of section 160 of the Bombay District Municipal Act, and this decision has not been questioned by the applicant.

For his contention that no application under section 115 is competent, Mr. Kimatrai relies on Balaji Sakharam v. Merwanji Nowroji (2) and Municipality of Belgaum v. Rudrappa Subrao Sutar (3). In the former case, the District Judge, in an order passed under section 23 of the District Municipal Act of 1884, had made an order for the payment of certain costs. In an application to the High Court under section 622, Civil Procedure Code, it was held that a District Judge acting under section 23 of Bombay Act II of 1884 was not a Court within the meaning of the word in section 622, Civil Procedure Code, that he was merely a persona designata and, if he had jurisdiction to award costs at all, there was nothing to prevent him from awarding them on the scale he did. It appears that this was a case in which the High Court would not properly have exercised its powers under section 622 even if there had been no doubt as to its competency to do so.

In the latter case, the District Judge had found on a preliminary issue that the Court could not proceed with the suit without the claims of defendants Nos. 2 and 3 being first submitted to arbitration, and had dismissed the suit. In his order discharging the rule Batchelor, J., stated: "The object of this application is to obtain from the Court a decision that although no appeal would lie, yet an application in revision does lie." Such a decision would, in our opinion, be seriously anomalous, and we do not think that the words of the Statute require us to make such a pronouncement. In Balaji Sakharam v. Merwanji Nowroji (2) the Court had held that it has no jurisdiction to revise the order of a District Judge acting under section 23 of the Bombay District Municipal Act of 1884. And although the words occurring in that section are 'District Judge' whereas the words occurring in section 160, last clause, are 'District Court,' we do not think that the distinction is sufficient to support the argument that an application for revision is competent, although admittedly no appeal would lie."

A comparison of section 23 of Act II of 1884 with section 160 of the Bombay District Municipal Act of 1901 discloses some important distinctions.

Section 23 runs as follows:—

"If the validity of any election of Municipal Commissioner is brought in question by any person qualified either to be elected or to vote at the election to which such question refers, such person may, at any time within ten days after the date of the declaration of the result of the election, apply to the District Judge of the District within which the election has been or should have been held."

The District Judge may, after such inquiry as he deems necessary, pass an order for confirmation or amending the declared result of the election, or for setting the election aside.

For the purposes of the said inquiry the District Judge may exercise any of the powers of a Civil Court, and his decision shall be conclusive.

Section 160 (3) runs thus:—

"In the event of the Panchayet not giving a decision within one month from the date of the selection of the Sir Panch, or of the appointment by the District Court of such members as may be necessary to constitute the Panchayet, the matter shall, on application by either party, be determined by the District Court, which shall in cases in which the compensation is claimed in respect of land, follow as far as may be the procedure provided by the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, for proceedings in matters referred for the determination of the Court."

In the former case, the application is to be made to the District Judge, that is, to the Presiding Officer of the District Court, in the latter the application is to the District Court, that is, the principal Civil Court of original jurisdiction within the district [section 2 (4) and (8), Civil Procedure Code.]

Any presumption that District Judge is intended to be synonymous with District Court in the earlier Act is rebutted by the declaration that he is, for the purposes of the said inquiry, vested with the powers of a Civil Court.

(2) 21 B. 279; (11 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 189.
(3) 34 Ind. Cas. 21; 18 Bom. L. R. 340; 40 B. 509.

The decision, therefore, in Balaji's case (2) did not cover the facts with which the Court had to deal in the Belgaum case (3); nor need it embarrass us in deciding this one.

It has been argued that if no appeal lies, it would be anomalous to hold that relief can be given under section 115, and reliance is placed on the judgment of Batchelor, J., above cited. But the question whether or not there would be any anomaly in entertaining an application under section 115 in this case depends on whether or not the District Court acted illegally or with material irregularity. There can be no anomaly in exercising the powers conferred by the section even though there be no appeal, if the conditions of the section be fulfilled.

As the case in which our interference is sought was decided by the District Court as such, prima facie this Court can call for it under section 115.

It has been suggested that the Court in making its award acts in an executive or administrative capacity. But the terms of the Act do not support this view. A perusal of section 160, Bombay District Municipal Act, 1884, discloses that, while no instructions are given to the Panchayet as to the lines which they are to follow in assessing the compensation, detailed instructions are given to the District Court. The members of the Panchayet are expected to assess the compensation as arbitrators, not as legal experts or as men accustomed to adjudicate on complicated questions of fact. But, as soon as the matter is vested in the District Court, a detailed procedure is laid down for its guidance; the Code of Civil Procedure applies to all proceedings before the Court. There can be no doubt that the Legislature contemplated that there would be a judicial proceeding and the object of handing over the determination of any case, which a Panchayet is unable to dispose of, to the District Court is to ensure that there shall be such a proceeding. The Court is not given the wide powers of the Panchayet, but its procedure is strictly defined and its discretion in assessing the compensation is carefully restricted.

There are good reasons why the award of the District Court should not be the subject of appeal. It is most desirable that the owner of property who is compelled to come to Court merely that a sale transaction may be carried through should not be dragged into lengthy litigation. Provided that the District Judge follows the elaborate procedure laid down for his guidance, the margin of possible error is not very wide.

But what reason is there to suppose that the Legislature contemplated that the District Court, when exercising its judicial authority under section 160, would be exempted of all control and superintendence by the High Court? Surely, one of the reasons that influenced the Legislature in entrusting the final decision of the question of compensation to the District Court was that the Court formed part of a well administered system. There is no anomaly whatever in conferring on a Court the power to give a final decision on any matter so long as it observes certain well defined rules, and yet making such Court subject to control whenever it transgresses those limits.

The District Court of Hyderabad is a Court subordinate to this Court; the case, the record of which we are asked to call for, was a case decided by the District Court. We are asked to call for the record because the Judge gave a decision which he admitted to be, in his opinion, contrary to law, a decision which is likely to result in grave and irreparable injury to the applicant if not remedied. I consider that the case is one with which we are competent to deal.

But I see no reason for interference with the order of the lower Court. Section 160, Bombay District Municipal Act, declares that the District Court shall follow, as far as may be, the procedure provided by the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, for proceedings in matters referred for the determination of the Court. On reference to that Act we find the heading to part III "Reference to Court and procedure thereon", and it seems obvious that the intention of the Legislature was that the Court should follow the procedure laid down in part III.

Further, it is to be noted that both the Panchayet and the Court have to determine what compensation should be awarded to the owner. Compensation is not the same as market value; it is the equivalent in money of the value of land to the owner. The old Common Law rule for ascertaining compensation for expulsion was that it should be determined on the same principles as damages in an action of trespass; and it was the usual practice to add a certain percentage to the market value for compulsory purchase (Halsbury's Laws of England, Vol. VI, paragraphs 36 and 42).

Section 23 of the Land Acquisition Act lays down the lines which the Court should follow in determining the amount of compensation and in doing so it follows closely the English practice; the Court has to ascertain the market value and then add a percentage.

Under section 41 of the Bombay District Municipal Act, when there is any hindrance to the acquisition of any land, the Government may acquire under the Land Acquisition Act and vest it, when so acquired, in the Municipality. It is wholly unlikely that the Legislature intended that the amount of compensation payable under section 41 should differ materially from that payable under section 160, notwithstanding that the procedure to be followed for ascertaining such compensation was to be the same under each section.

The procedure followed in the case reported as Karachi Municipality v. Khatanmal Hiranand (4) both by the Municipality and this Court was correct. The Municipality had offered compensation which included a percentage on the market value; the Court awarded the market value and 15 per cent. thereon in addition.

I would dismiss this application with costs.

PRATT, J. C.—I concur.

Under section 160, clause (3) of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1901, the matter of the compensation is to be determined by the District Court. This distinguishes the case from section 23 of the Bombay District Municipal Act, 1884, where the matter there referred to is decided by the District Judge as a persona designata and the High Courts has, therefore, no jurisdiction. Balaji Sakharam v. Merwanji Nowroji (2).

It seems to me clear that under section 160 (3), the District Court decides the question in the exercise of its jurisdiction as a Civil Court. Its proceedings are, therefore, subject to revision by this Court. I differ from the case of Municipality of Belgaum v. Rudrappa Subrao Sutar (3), for I see no anomaly in the High Court revising an order or decree that is not appealable.

The case of section 5 of the Religious Endowments Act XX, of 1863, presents a very close analogy. That section confers on the Civil Court jurisdiction to appoint a manager of a religious establishment. The Privy Council held in Minakshi Naidu v. Subramanya Sastri (5) that no appeal lay from the order. Nevertheless the Madras High Court held in Gopala Ayyar v. Arunachalam Chetty (6) that an application for revision to the High Court was competent.

I also agree that there is no ground for our interfering in revision.

I do not think the District Judge erred in awarding 15 per cent. over the market value. It is said that the right to this 15 per cent. is a matter of substantive right and not of procedure. Possibly the word procedure, in section 160 (3) is not very felicitous, but I think it is used in its popular and not in its strictly legal sense. I am quite clear that it does not mean procedure in the sense of the adjective law enacted in the Code of Civil Procedure. Section 53 of the Land Acquisition Act applies that law to proceedings in Court under the Act. If section 160 (3) referred to this only, it would have mentioned the Civil Procedure Code and not the Land Acquisition Act. What was meant was that the District Court should frame the same issues and be guided by the same considerations as it would under the Land Acquisition Act. Under that Act it has to decide the market value under sections 23 and 24 and then add 15 per cent. to arrive at the compensation to be awarded. It is no great strain on the word 'procedure' to say that the District Court under section 160 (3) should follow this procedure and assess compensation by the same method of valuation.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), ss. 11, Expl. VI, 91—Injury to plaintiff in exercise of public right—Damages, suit for—Finding as to nature of right—Res judicata.

A private individual is not competent to obtain a declaration that a right is a public one, but he is entitled to sue for damages for injuries sustained by him in the exercise of his privileges connected with a public right. [p. 367, col. 2, p. 368, col. 1.]

Where the Court gives a finding in such a suit that the right is a public right, it becomes res judicata in a subsequent litigation by virtue of Explanation VI of section 11, Civil Procedure Code. [p. 367, col. 2.]

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the District Judge, Bellary, in Appeal Suit No. 113 of 1914, preferred against that of the Court of the Additional District Munsif, Penukonda, in Original Suit No. 69 of 1914.

Mr. L. A. Govindaraghava Aiyar, for the Appellants.

Mr. H. Balakrishna Rao, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The matter has been fully argued before us and we have come to the conclusion that the District Judge's judgment cannot be supported. In the previous litigation the present 1st plaintiff's father claimed a right of way over the path in question. The case was taken up to the High Court and it was held in Khaji Syyad Hussain Saheb v. Ediga Narasimhappa (1), accepting the finding of the lower Appellate Court in that behalf, that the path was a public one and that the plaintiff was not entitled to maintain the suit without alleging special damage. Accepting this decision the present 1st plaintiff, who is the son of the plaintiff in the previous litigation, sued along with three others the same defendants for a declaration that the path is a public one. The necessary sanction under section 91 of the Civil Procedure Code was obtained to institute the suit. The defendants now plead that it is a private right of way. The District Munsif overruled this plea and gave plaintiffs a decree. On appeal the District Judge has reversed this judgment and has dismissed the suit.

Apart from the view we take in regard to the binding nature of the previous judgment, it seems to us that it would not conduce to the proper administration of justice, if a defendant who has been defeated on a particular view of the facts put forward by him is allowed to resile from that position and to raise a defence inconsistent with his original contention. Even if there is no question of res judicata, we would have held that the defendants are estopped from questioning the judgment to which they were parties. See Sayam Ramamoorthi Dhora v. Secretary of State (2).

But we think that the present contention is res judicata and that Explanation VI to section 11 governs this case. The essence of a litigation, which is carried on by a private party for injuries sustained by him in the exercise of a right common to him and others, is that there is a public right and that the party suing has suffered special damage in enforcing that right. The fact that in obtaining this individual remedy, it is not open to him to get a declaration embodied in the decree that the right is a public one, will not affect the principle of res judicata. Mr. Balakrishna Rao's citations from English decisons only established that a private individual is not competent to obtain a declaration that a right is a public one. The vindication of such a right is either by indictment or by a suit by the Attorney-General. But no authority has been quoted for the proposition that an individual is not entitled in his own right to seek redress in respect of the injuries sustained by him in the exercise of his privileges connected with a public right. That is a common law right; and when that right is put in Court there must necessarily be a finding whether the special injury was sustained by the plaintiff in exercising his rights as a member of the public. When that adjudication is given, the finding regarding the right becomes res judicata in a subsequent litigation by virtue of Explanation VI to section 11 which gives a comprehensive definition of the terms "under whom they or any of them claimed." Mr. Balakrishna Rao's argument that the enactment of section 91 prohibits a member of the public from obtaining a finding regarding the public right would render nugatory Explanation VI to section 11 and would strike at the root of the common law right which every individual possesses in these matters. There is authority also for the view we have taken. Gedimella Rangamma v. Panchangam Narasimhacharyulu (3) decides the converse of the present case, but the principle is there recognised as argued by Mr. K. V. Krishnaswami, Ayyar that the right litigated in the first litigation need not be on behalf of the general public, provided the foundation of the claim is that the injury was suffered in exercising a right common to the plaintiff and others. Muhammad Amir v. Sumitra Kuar (4) is also to the same effect. The decision in Rama Das v. Hanumantha Row (5) under section 92 of the Code enunciates the same principle.

(1) 16 Ind. Cas. 962, 23 M. L. J. 539; 12 M. L. T. 491; (1913) M. W. N. 991.

(2) 19 Ind. Cas. 656; 24 M. L. J. 469; 36 M. 141.

For these reasons we are of opinion that the finding in the previous litigation that the suit path is public one operates as res judicata in the present suit and that it is not open to the defendants to go behind that finding.

We must reverse the decree of the District Judge and restore that of the District Munsif with costs here and in the lower Appellate Court.

Appeal allowed.

Thakur BISHESHAR BAKHSH SINGH—PLAINTIFF—APPELLANT

Raja RAMESHAR BAKHSH SINGH—DEFENDANT—RESPONDENT.

Taluqa, suit for possession of—Lord Canning's Proclamation of 1858, result of—Second Summary Settlement, effect of—Governor-General's letter dated 10*th October* 1859, effect of—Sanads, title conferred under, nature of—Hindu widow holding sanad in her name, position of—Trustee—Succession to taluqa—Oudh Estates Act (I of 1869), s. 22—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Arts. 141, 144—Limitation to be determined on case set up in plaint—Evidence Act (I of 1872), s. 116—Estoppel of tenant, not applicable to person setting up under-proprietary title by adverse possession—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 11 Expl. IV—Res judicata, partial.

At the time of the annexation of Oudh a taluqa was in the possession of a Bais Thakur B. S. After the annexation the First Summary Settlement of the taluqa was made with him. He died issueless in 1857 and was succeeded in possession by his widow D. K. belonging to the clan of Amethia Thakurs. She was in possession when Lord Canning's Proclamation of confiscation was issued in 1858.

The Second Summary Settlement of the taluqa was made with her and in the various proceedings relating to this settlement she was described as the wife or widow of B. S. She never in any way acknowledged that any third person had a right in the taluqa, although she made subsequent declarations to the effect that she had no intention of giving it to Amethia Thakurs. She was still in possession when the letter of the Governor-General, dated the 10th of October 1859, was published, by which it was declared that every taluqdar with whom a Summary Settlement had been made subsequent to the date of the re-occupation of Oudh had thereby acquired permanent, heritable and transferable proprietary rights in the taluqa for which the engagement had been taken.

As provided by this letter, a sanad in the original form was granted to D. K. in her own name in 1860. In 1861 a sanad in the revised form, i.e., the primogeniture sanad, was similarly granted to her Her name was subsequently entered in Lists I and II of the Oudh Estates Act.

After her husband's death she took steps to provide for the devolution of the taluqa upon a collateral relative of her deceased husband B. S., but later on cancelled the provision in 1866 and 1873 In the proceedings held at the time of the First Regular Settlement she described herself as the wife or widow of B. S. and gave the history of the taluqa, as having come down in the family of B. S. This Regular Settlement was made with her not on the basis of these representations but on the ground that she had acquired the full title to the taluqa under the sanads.

BISHESHAR BAKHSH SINGH v. RAMESHAR BAKHSH SINGH.

She continued in possession of the taluqa till her death intestate in 1893, after which the above-mentioned collateral relative of B. S. took possession of the entire taluqa.

Then R. B. S., as the right heir of D. K., being her brother's grandson, sued the collateral relative of B. S. for possession of the taluqa and succeeded in obtaining a decree in 1900. In 1911 R. B. S., setting out his title to the entire taluqa under this decree, brought a suit in ejectment against B. B. S. as a trespasser, who was at that time in possession of one of the villages comprised in the taluqa. B. B. S was at that time aware of the facts upon which he relied in the present suit, mentioned below, for the purpose of showing that he was the rightful owner of the whole taluqa, but he set up an under-proprietary title in respect of the village, his case being that he and his predecessors had been in adverse possession as under-proprietors for many years upon payment of the revenue and cesses due in respect of the village. The suit of R. B. S. was, however, decreed in 1911 on the finding that B. B. S. was not an under-proprietor of the village.

In 1913 B B S. instituted the present suit against R. B. S. He claimed to be the nearest male heir of B. S. and as such to be entitled to possession of the taluqa in preference to R. B. S. who was a stranger to the family. R. B. S relied upon his title arising from the provisions of section 22, clause 6, of the Oudh Estates Act and pleaded limitation as well as res judicata as a bar to the suit:

Held, (1) that Lord Canning's Proclamation of 1858 having resulted in divesting all landed property from proprietors in Oudh and transferring and vesting the same in the British Government, the Second Summary Settlement did not of itself vest the absolute proprietary and heritable rights in taluqas but amounted to a permission to the persons with whom the settlements were made to engage for the payment of the Government revenue; the effect of the declaration contained in the Governor-General's letter, dated the 10th of October 1859, being to invest the taluqdars in possession under the Summary Settlements with permanent, hereditary and transferable proprietary rights in their taluqas, including the perpetual privilege of engaging with the Government for the revenue of those taluqas; the two sanads addressed to D. K having purported to confer upon her and her heirs for ever the full proprietary right, title and possession of the taluqa, and the intention of the Government in the matter being deducible from the acts of the Government itself and not from the conduct and declarations of D. K, D. K. took the taluqa in her own right as full owner, and not in the right of her husband B. S. as a Hindu widow, nor as such widow with special powers of alienation superadded, so that if she failed to exercise the special powers of transfer conferred upon her the taluqa would revert after her death to the nearest male heir of her deceased husband according to the rule of primogeniture, nor even as a trustee for the reversioners of her deceased husband B. S., for there was no evidence to show that she had by any express or implied acknowledgment, declaration or conduct constituted herself such a trustee: and that, therefore succession to the taluqa was governed by the terms of section 22 of the Oudh Estates Act, under which R. B. S. was the right heir of D. K.; [p. 374, col. 2; p. 375, cols. 1 & 2; p. 376, col. 1; p. 377, col. 1; p. 379, cols. 1 & 2; p. 383, col. 1.]

(2) that D. K. having been found to be in possession of a full estate, the case was governed by Article 144 and not by Article 141, Schedule I, of the Limitation Act; but that, as the point of limitation was to be determined in view of the plaint allegations, which were to the effect that the plaintiff was entitled to succeed on the death of D K. not as her heir but as an heir of her husband B. S., Article 141 applied and the suit was barred; [p. 390, cols. 1 & 2; p. 391, col. 1.]

(3) that B. B. S. not being debarred under section 116 of the Evidence Act from raising in the previous suit the proprietary title in respect of the village then in dispute, inasmuch as he asserted at that time an adverse subordinate title and not a title derived from the superior proprietor, or from setting up both proprietary and under-proprietary titles at one and the same time on the ground of inconsistency, the present suit was barred by res judicata under section 11, Explanation IV, Civil Procedure Code, so far as the said village was concerned, and not in respect of the entire taluqa, inasmuch as title to the entire taluqa was not a point which properly belonged to the subject of the previous litigation. [p. 393, col 2; p. 394, cols. 1 & 2; 395, col. 1.]

Appeal from the decree of the Subordinate Judge, Mohanlalganj (Lucknow), dated the 31st March 1915.

Sir Rash Behary Ghose, the Hon'ble Mirza Samiullah Beg, the Hon'ble Syed Wazir Hasan and Sheik Shahabuddin, for the Appellant.

Sir Sundar Lal, Mr. Mohammad Nasim, the Hon'ble Pandit Gokaran Nath Misra and Pandit Harkaran Nath Misra, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal has arisen out of a suit for possession brought by the plaintiff-appellant, Thakur Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh, against the defendant-respondent, Raja Rameshar Bakhsh Singh. The property in dispute is the Samarpaha taluqa which is situated in the Rae Bareli district; and before proceeding to discuss the points which are in issue before us we think it will be expedient to set out as far as possible certain facts relating to the history of this estate. At the time of the annexation of Oudh the property was in possession of Basant Singh who was a Thakur belonging to the Bais clan. After the annexation the First Summary Settlement of this Taluqa was made with Basant Singh, who died thereafter on the 12th of November 1857, during the Mutiny. Thakur Basant Singh left no issue and was succeeded in possession by his widow, Thakurain Dariao Kuar, whose age at that time appears to have been about 18 or 19 years. At the time when the proclamation of confiscation was issued by Lord Canning in the month of March 1858 Dariao Kuar was in possession of the estate which had belonged to her husband. On the 8th of May 1858 an application was made to have the Second Summary Settlement of this Taluqa made with her. This application was presented on her behalf by an agent of hers named Ram Sarai. The application was accepted and two days afterwards, that is to say, on the 10th of May 1858, an order was issued by Major Barrow, Special Commissioner sitting at Lucknow, directing that the settlement should be made with Dariao Kuar. Dariao Kuar was still in possession when the letter of the Governor-General, dated the 10th of October 1859, was published, by which it was declared that every Taluqdar with whom a Summary Settlement had been made subsequent to the date of the re-occupation of Oudh had thereby acquired permanent, hereditary and transferable proprietary rights in the Taluqa for which the engagement had been taken. This letter is incorporated in the Oudh Estates Act (1 of 1869), and in paragraph 4 it was directed by the Governor-General that sanads should be issued in his name by the Chief Commissioner of Oudh. We find from certain official correspondence which is on the record that a sanad was granted to Dariao Kuar in the month of December 1860 (cf. Exhibit A 5, a letter addressed by the Deputy Commissioner of Rae Bareli to the Commissioner of the Baiswara Division). This must have been a sanad in the original form set out in Sykes' Compendium of Taluqdari Law at page 385. Later on we find that a sanad in the revised form, namely, the primogeniture sanad, was granted to Dariao Kuar. A copy of this sanad is on the record (plaintiff's Exhibit No. 9). It was signed by the Chief Commissioner on the 8th May 1861. The evidence on record shows that this sanad was delivered to Dariao Kuar on the 25th of October 1861.

Subsequently when the Oudh Estates Act (I of 1869) came into force Dariao Kuar was treated as the Taluqdar and her name was entered in Lists I and II prepared under section 8 of that Act. It is admitted that Dariao Kuar continued in possession of the Samarpaha Taluqa till the date of her death, namely, the 10th of November 1893. She died intestate.

In order to explain the course of the litigation regarding this estate which took place after the lady's death, it is necessary to travel back to the period immediately succeeding the re-occupation of Oudh in March 1858 and to refer to certain events which took place about that time.

Basant Singh, as we have said, was a Bais Thakur and his estate was one of the numerous large estates in the Rae Bareli district held by the members of that clan. His wife belonged to the Amethia clan of Thakurs and it may be taken as an established fact that the Thakurs of the Bais clan viewed with some apprehension the prospect of the estate passing away from their clan into the clan of the Amethias. We have already mentioned the fact that Basant Singh left no male issue. It is proved that after her husband's death Dariao Kuar took steps to provide for the devolution of the estate upon a collateral relative of her deceased husband. Acting no doubt in consultation with the members of her husband's family in the year 1860 she took a boy named Sher Bahadur, whose age at that time was 11 or 12 years, to live with her with the intention that he should be brought up in the family house and should succeed to the estate upon her death. It was alleged in subsequent litigation that Dariao Kuar had adopted Sher Bahadur as a son to her husband, but it was decided that no valid adoption had ever taken place.

On the 1st September 1886 in obedience to a letter addressed to her by the district authorities, Dariao Kuar prepared a formal deed (plaintiff's Exhibit No. 8) by which she declared Sher Bahadur Singh to be the person who would succeed to the Samarpaha Taluqa after her death; the document was styled a Will. This arrangement which Dariao Kuar had made failed to prove satisfactory. Sher Bahadur Singh as he grew older seems to have given great offence to the lady; and, instigated most probably by certain members of the Bais clan, he began to press for an immediate transfer of the whole estate to himself. The lady refused to entertain any such proposition and turned Sher Bahadur Singh out. The relations between her and Sher Bahadur Singh formed the subject of various petitions and counter-petitions addressed by the parties to the district authorities. Eventually in the year 1866 Sher Bahadur Singh addressed an application to the Chief Commissioner (Exhibit A3), dated 10th of September 1866, in which he asked that a sanad for the Samarpaha Taluqa should be granted to him on the ground that he had been adopted in the year 1265 Fasli, corresponding to 1858-59. He asserted that the sanad had been granted by mistake to Dariao Kuar and that in fact he was the proper person to receive it. He made certain allegations that the widow was wasting the property and giving it away to her own relatives, and represented that if the sanad were left in the name of Dariao Kuar the result would be that the entire Taluqa would pass away from the family to which it belonged. On receipt of this petition the Chief Commissioner called for reports from the local authorities and the matter was finally dealt with by the Chief Commissioner in his order (Exhibit A7), dated 29th of March 1867. He declined to take any action on Sher Bahadur Singh's petition, saying that no alteration could now be made in the sanad, that Dariao Kuar was the proper person to receive it and that he refused to interfere in any way with the rights which the British Government had conferred upon the Thakurain. After this order had been issued Sher Bahadur Singh made an attempt to have it reviewed by presenting a petition (Exhibit A9), dated the 24th of April 1867. This petition was rejected by the Chief Commissioner by his order (Exhibit A 10), dated the 6th of May 1867. Meantime Dariao Kuar had in consequence of the conduct of Sher Bahadur Singh presented a petition to the Deputy Commissioner, dated the 27th of December 1866, in which she represented that her formal appointment of Sher Bahadur Singh by the document dated the 1st of September 1861 was to be considered as revoked.

Sher Bahadur Singh having been worsted in his attempt to secure possession of the Taluqa had recourse to a suit for recovery of possession of the estate, which he filed in the Court of the Deputy Commissioner of Rae Bareli on the 1st of September 1873. A copy of the plaint in this suit is on record and is marked Exhibit A64. As soon as the suit had been filed Dariao Kuar by way of answer to it executed a formal document (Exhibit A63), which was duly registered and by which she formally set aside the document of the 1st of September 1861 by which she had appointed Sher Bahadur Singh as the person to succeed to the estate. In the suit which he brought Sher Bahadur Singh claimed to be the adopted son of Basant Singh and to be entitled to possession of the estate on the ground that Dariao Kuar was holding the property in trust for him. He relied upon certain letters said to have been written by Dariao Kuar for the purpose of showing that she had acknowledged her position as trustee. The Deputy Commissioner dismissed this suit on the 15th of November 1873, on the ground that Dariao Kuar had the full title to the estate under the terms of the sanad (vide Exhibit A66, a certified copy of the Deputy Commissioner's judgment). This decision was upheld in appeal by the Commissioner (cf. Exhibit A68, dated the 22nd of April 1874). An appeal was then taken to the Privy Council. Their Lordships on the 10th of November 1877 (cf. Exhibit A69) passed an order remanding the suit for disposal on certain points which had been left undetermined. In this order their Lordships expressed their agreement with the opinion given by the Commissioner to the effect that Dariao Kuar had under the sanad a title which could not be assailed. They pointed out, however, that, although the title which Government had conferred upon Dariao Kuar was absolute and overruled all other titles, a Taluqdar to whom such a title had been granted might nevertheless by express declaration constitute himself a trustee. Their Lordships directed that the claim should be further investigated and that the plaintiff Sher Bahadur Singh should be given an opportunity to show, if he could, by means of the letters and any other evidence of surrounding circumstances that Dariao Kuar had declared herself or agreed to be a trustee for him (Sher Bahadur Singh). The case was dealt with by the Commissioner of Rae Bareli in his judgment of the 29th of October 1878 (Exhibit A70). He was of opinion that the letters upon which Sher Bahadur Singh relied for the purpose of proving that a trust had been declared in his favour were not proved. He held in addition that there was no satisfactory proof that Sher Bahadur Singh had been validly adopted as the son of Basant Singh. This decision became final, for although Sher Bahadur Singh applied for leave to appeal to Her Majesty in Council the application was eventually dismissed by reason of his failure to deposit the necessary security for costs (see the order of the Commissioner, dated the 29th of July 1879, Exhibit A72).

The next event to which we have to refer is the taking of possession of the entire estate by Sher Bahadur Singh after the death of Thakurain Dariao Kuar in the month of November 1893. This led to the next litigation, which began in the year 1899. On the 27th of May in that year Raja Rameshar Bakhsh Singh, who is the defendant in the present proceedings, filed a suit claiming possession of the entire Taluqa on the ground that he, as the right heir of Dariao Kuar, was entitled to the property. This suit was decided in favour of Raja Rameshar Bakhsh Singh on the 12th of October 1900. The decree of the Subordinate Judge was maintained on appeal to this Court, and was upheld by their Lordships of the Privy Council in their judgment dated the 27th of July 1906 [cf. Thakur Tirbhuwan Bahadur Singh v. Raja Rameshar Bakhsh Singh (1)]. It may be explained here that Sher Bahadur Singh died while the appeal was pending in the Privy Council and he was represented before their Lordships by his son Tirbhuwan Bahadur Singh. Their Lordships held that Sher Bahadur Singh had failed to prove any title by adoption, that succession to the estate was governed by the provisions of section 22 of Act I of 1869 and that Raja Rameshar Bakhsh Singh, as the right heir of Dariao Kuar, was entitled to the property under clause 6 of the section in question.

We have now to refer to further litigation which began in the year 1911. Raja Rameshar Bakhsh Singh having executed the decree obtained in his favour got possession of the entire estate with the exception of a single village called Shayestabad or Bharkaspur. It seems that at the time when the judgment of their Lordships was delivered this village was in the possession of Musammat Gajraj Kuar, the mother of Sher Bahadur Singh. She appears to have continued in possession asserting that she had a right to remain in possession as "kham thekadar," being entitled to collect the rents subject to the payment of a yearly sum of Rs. 1,126 to the Taluqdar. Gajraj Kuar died on the 15th of December 1906 and according to what was set out in the plaint filed by Raja Rameshar Bakhsh Singh in this litigation, Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh (who is the plaintiff in the present suit) took wrongful possession after the lady's death. Raja Rameshar Bakhsh Singh brought a suit in ejectment against Bisheshar Bakhsh (cf. Exhibit A 79, plaint, dated 4/6th June 1910). In that plaint Raja Rameshar Bakhsh Singh set out his title to the entire taluqa by virtue of the decree which had been passed in his favour. He asked for the ejectment of Bisheshar Bakhsh, saying that he was a trespasser. In the alternative he prayed for a declaration that the defendant Bisheshar Bakhsh had no right or interest in this village except that of a kham thekadar. Bisheshar Bakhsh defended the suit. He admitted that Rameshar Bakhsh had obtained a decree for possession of the whole Taluqa and that this village of Bharkaspur was one of the villages belonging to the estate, but he pleaded that Rameshar Bakhsh Singh had no cause of action for the suit. Bisheshar Bakhsh set up an under-proprietary title, saying that he and his ancestors had held the village as owners in subordination to the Taluqdar since before the time of the British rule and that the village had been held by himself and his predecessors on payment of the revenue only. It was asserted that Dariao Kuar had always recognised the under-proprietary status of the defendant and his predecessors. A further plea of title as under-proprietor by adverse possession was set up. Another defence was to the effect that Rameshar Bakhsh Singh was estopped from denying Bisheshar Bakhsh's title as under-proprietor, on the ground that he had accepted payment of the Government revenue from Musammat Gajraj Kuar and afterwards from the defendant himself. He pleaded that he was not bound by the decree which Rameshar Bakhsh Singh had obtained against Sher Bahadur Singh inasmuch as he was no party to the proceedings, and he claimed that the decree in question could not in any way affect his under-proprietary right. The suit was decided in favour of Rameshar Bakhsh Singh. It was held that the defence set up by Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh to the effect that he was an under-proprietor was a false defence. The Subordinate Judge also was of opinion that Rameshar Bakhsh Singh was in no way estopped from denying the under-proprietary title put forward by Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh.

This is a brief history of the events relating to this estate, which took place prior to the institution of the present suit which was brought into Court on the 7th of April 1913. The plaintiff Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh, according to the pedigree which is exhibited with his plaint, claims to be the nearest male heir of Thakur Basant Singh and as such to be entitled to possession of the estate in preference to the defendant, who is a stranger to the family. It was admitted in the third paragraph of the plaint that after the death of Basant Singh in the month of November 1857 his widow Dariao Kuar succeeded him in possession of the estate, and in the fourth paragraph of the plaint it is admitted that the Second Summary Settlement was made with this lady. It is stated in this paragraph that Dariao Kuar applied for the settlement "in her character of widow of Basant Singh." In the fifth paragraph of the plaint it is admitted that a sanad was granted by the British Government to Dariao Kuar in the year 1861, but it is asserted that the grant was made to her as widow of Basant Singh. The seventh paragraph of the plaint after amendment alleges that the purpose of the Second Summary Settlement and the object of the grant of the estate to Dariao Kuar and the terms of the sanad granted to this lady indicate that the estate was to descend after the death of Dariao Kuar to the nearest male heir of Thakur Basant Singh. In paragraph 9 of the plaint reference was made to a Will alleged to have been executed by Dariao Kuar on the 24th June 1878. We are no longer concerned with this document. The learned Subordinate Judge has declared it to be a forgery and it has not been relied on in any way for the purpose of supporting the plaintiff's case here in appeal. The plaint was further amended by introducing an allegation in paragraph 9 (a), to the effect that the estate which had been granted by the British Government to Dariao Kuar constituted her stridhan. In paragraph 10 the custom relating to succession to estates held by the Bais Talnqdars is set out, the case being that the person who succeeds is the eldest amongst the nearest of the deceased's relations. It was also asserted by way of amendment in this paragraph that the custom applied also to the case of property held as stridhan. After reciting the fact of Dariao Kuar's death on the 13th November 1893, it was alleged in the 12th paragraph of the plaint that at the time the lady died the plaintiff's father Sheodat Singh was still alive and was, according to the pedigree exhibited with the plaint, the heir to the estate. Reference is then made to the taking of possession of the estate by Sher Bahadur Singh after the death of Dariao Kuar and to his subsequent ejectment in consequence of the decree which was passed against him in favour of the defendant Rameshar Bakhsh Singh. In paragraph 14 of the plaint it is stated that the defendant, who is the grandson of Dariao Kuar's brother, has no right whatever to the property now in dispute and is a trespasser. The defendant relies upon the title which was affirmed by the decree of their Lordships of the Privy Council. Shortly put, his case is that the full estate was granted by the British Government to Dariao Kuar and her heirs. He claims that succession to the estate is governed by Act I of 1869 and that he being the next heir of the lady has the title to the estate in accordance with the provisions of clause 6, section 22, of the Oudh Estates Act (I of 1869). The defendant also put forward two other pleas by way of defence with which we shall have to deal in disposing of the appeal, namely, pleas of limitation and res judicata.

The lower Court found in favour of the defendant upon all the material issues. It was decided that the title to the estate lay with the defendant, that the plaintiff's claim was barred by limitation and that the suit was not maintainable on the ground of res judicata. The three questions which have been argued before us are (1) the plea of res judicata, (2) the question of limitation and (3) the question of title. They were argued in this order, but we think it expedient to deal in the first place with the question of title. The decision of the issue of limitation is involved in this, for the point of limitation has to be determined in accordance with the view we may take as to the nature of the interest which was acquired by Dariao Kuar in the Taluqa of Samarpaha.

TITLE.

To proceed then to a consideration of the question of title, we start with the facts that the Second Summary Settlement was made with Dariao Kuar; that thereafter in the year 1861 a sanad in the primogeniture form was granted to her; that on the passing of the Oudh Estates Act (I of 1869) the name of Thakurain Dariao Kuar was recorded in Lists I and II prepared under section 8 of the Act; that she was, therefore, a Taluqdar, and lastly that she died on the 13th of November 1893 intestate. It has already been mentioned that the First Summary Settlement of the estate was made while Thakur Basant Singh was still alive, and that Dariao Kuar came into possession of the Taluqa on the death of her husband in November 1857. Lord Canning's proclamation of confiscation was issued on the 15th March 1858 and the result of that was to destroy any interest which the lady or any of the reversionary heirs of her husband had in this property. A great deal of discussion seems to have been permitted in the Court below regarding the legal operation of the proclamation and the Subordinate Judge has referred at great length to a large number of State papers and other documents for the purpose, apparently, of ascertaining the meaning and effect of the proclamation. At the hearing of the appeal we have ruled out all this evidence as being irrelevant. It is too late at the present day to argue that the proclamation of Lord Canning resulted in anything but the complete destruction of proprietary rights in Oudh. The language of the proclamation has been interpreted repeatedly by the highest judicial authority and it would have been quite sufficient for the learned Subordinate Judge to refer to one or other of the decisions of their Lordships of the Privy Council in which the effect of the proclamation has been expounded. It is enough for us to say that it has been laid down that the effect of the proclamation was to divest all landed property from proprietors in Oudh and to transfer it to and vest it in British Government. The proprietary right in land in Oudh was confiscated to the British Government and was liable to be disposed of in such manner as the Government might think fit. We might also refer to a decision which we shall have further occasion to mention in the course of this judgment, namely, the case of Brij Indar Bahadur Singh v. Ranee Janki Koer (2), in which speaking of a case like the present in which a widow was in possession at the time of the proclamation, their Lordships observed as follows:—"Her interest as widow and that of the reversionary heirs were absolutely destroyed and put an end to by the confiscation under Lord Canning's proclamation." The next matter we have to notice is that the Summary Settlement of this Taluqa was made with Dariao Kuar on the 10th of May 1858. The documentary evidence on record shows that on the 8th of May 1858 an application (Exhibit A1) was presented to the authorities by one Ram Sahai, who described himself as the agent of the wife of Basant Singh the Taluqdar of the villages in the Samarpaha Taluqa. It was stated by Ram Sahai in the application that the Taluqa consisting of 72 villages had long been in the possession of his client. It was mentioned that in the year 1264 Fasli immediately after the annexation, 17 villages were detached from the estate and settled with other persons. It was alleged that during the Mutiny possession had been resumed over these 17 villages. It was declared that the lady had no co-sharer in the estate and that she was ready to pay Government all the arrears of Government revenue. On the 10th of May an order was passed that settlement of the entire estate be made with Basant Singh's wife as Taluqdar, that an instalment of the Government revenue should be taken from her and that she should be directed to send her authorised agent to Mr Tucker, the Commissioner. From other documents on the record it is proved that this order for Summary Settlement was made by Major Barrow, Special Commissioner of Lucknow (cf. Exhibit No. 1). Pausing here we may consider what was the effect of this Summary Settlement being made with Dariao Kuar. It is clear from the authorities that the making of this settlement did not amount per se to a grant of proprietary rights to the lady. The arrangement was a temporary measure and meant no more than that the person with whom it was made was permitted to engage for the payment of revenue for a period of three years. It did not amount in any way to the acknowledgment of the existence of any proprietary title; nor could it, bearing in mind the fact that the proclamation which had been issued less than two months before had swept away all rights in landed property in Oudh and had vested them in the British Government. Up to the date on which the Summary Settlement was made no grant of those rights had been made to any one by the Government. The legal effect of the making of the Second Summary Settlement has been declared in the judgment of their Lordships of the Privy Council in the well-known case of the Ranee of Chillaree v. Government of India (3), where it is stated that this temporary Revenue Settlement did not of itself vest the absolute proprietary and heritable right in the Taluqa, but amounted only to a permission to the person with whom the settlement was made to engage for the payment of the Government revenue.

We now come to a consideration of the letter of the 10th of October 1859 from the Secretary to the Government of India, Foreign Department, to the Chief Commissioner of Oudh, which is incorporated to the First Schedule to Act I of 1869. In paragraph 2 of this letter the Governor-General in Council, after expressing his agreement with the Chief Commissioner regarding the expediency of removing all doubts as to the intention of the Government to maintain the Taluqdars in possession of the Taluqas for which they had been permitted to engage, was pleased to declare that every Taluqdar with whom a Summary Settlement had been made since the re-occupation of the Province had thereby acquired a permanent, hereditary and transferable proprietary right, namely, in the Taluqa for which he had engaged, including the perpetual privilege of engaging with the Government for the revenue of the Taluqa. By paragraph 4 of the letter the Chief Commissioner was directed to prepare a list of the Taluqdars upon whom a permanent proprietary right had now been conferred and that sanads should be prepared to be issued to the Taluqdars at the time of His Excellency's arrival in Lucknow. The effect of the declaration contained in this letter has been the subject of decision of their Lordships in the Chillaree's case (3) which has been mentioned above. According to that judgment the object of the Government in issuing this declaration was "to maintain in possession those Taluqdars who then were in possession under Summary Settlements entered into with them after the re occupation of the Province". The Taluqdars who were declared to have acquired the right conferred by the letter were those who had been permitted to engage Dariao Kuar, being one of the Taluqdars who had been admitted to engage for the Revenue Settlement and who was still in possession at the time when this letter of the Governor-General in Council issued, must, therefore, be treated as a person who had acquired a permanent, hereditary and transferable proprietary right in the Taluqa of Samarpaha, including the perpetual privilege of engaging with the Government for the revenue of that estate. Following upon this letter we know that a sanad in the earlier form was granted to Dariao Kuar, a sanad in the form which is set out in Sykes' Compendium at page 385. According to the language of this document the Chief Commissioner, acting under the authority of the Governor-General in Council, conferred upon Dariao Kuar the full proprietary right, title and possession of the estate of Samarpaha. It is recited that the sanad was granted to Dariao Kuar in order that it might be known to all whom it might concern that the estate of Samarpaha had been conferred upon her and her heirs for ever subject to the payment of such annual revenue as might from time to time be imposed and subject to certain other conditions which are specified in the document. The sanad winds up with a declaration that as long as the obligations specified were observed by Dariao Kuar and her heirs in good faith, so long would the British Government maintain her and her heirs as proprietors of the Samarpaha estate. A copy of the second sanad which was given to the lady in substitution for the earlier one is to be found on the record (Exhibit 9). This document like the earlier one is addressed to "Musammat Dariao Kuar, Taluqdar", and it purports to confer upon her the full proprietary right, title and possession of the estate of Samarpaha. It declares that this estate has been conferred upon her and her heirs for ever. It lays down a rule of succession to be observed in the devolution of the estate, the descent being to the nearest male heir according to the rule of primogeniture. It is further declared that Dariao Kuar and all her successors are to have full power to alienate the estate or any portion of it to whomsoever they please, and, as in the former document, there is a further declaration that subject to the performance of the obligations which are recited the British Government would maintain Dariao Kuar and her heirs as proprietors of the Taluqa. There is nothing, therefore, in the language either of the letter of the 10th of October 1859, which is a letter in general terms, or in the language of the two sanads which were addressed by name to Dariao Kuar to indicate that the interest which was being conferred upon her by the British Government was anything less than that of an absolute estate in the property specified. It has, however, been argued here, as it was in the Court below, that by reason of certain facts established by evidence it should be held, notwithstanding the language of the documents we have just mentioned, that (to quote the language of paragraph 7 of the plaint) "the purpose of the Second Summary Settlement, the object of the grant of the estate to Thakurain Dariao Kuar and the contents of the sanad" indicate that the intention of Government was that the property should be held by Dariao Kuar for her life and should descend thereafter to the nearest heir of her deceased husband who might be alive at the time the succession opened.

This proposition has been condensed in argument by saying that Dariao Kuar took the estate not in her own right but in the right of her husband Basant Singh, and it has been contended that as she took in that capacity the interpretation which must necessarily be placed upon the acts and declarations of the British Government between the time of the making of the Second Summary Settlement and the grant of the sanad is that the intention was, so to speak, to restore the Taluqa to the family to which Basant Singh belonged by providing that it should devolve upon Basant Singh's heir as soon as the lady died. It was pointed out that in the litigation between Sher Bahadur Singh and the present defendant, which was concluded by the judgment of their Lordships of the Privy Council reported as Thakur Tirbhuwan Bahadur Singh v. Raja Rameshar Bakhsh Singh. (1), it had been admitted that Dariao Kuar took the estate in her own right. The words used by Lord Macnaghten in this connection are to be found at page 162 of the report and are as follows:—"It is not disputed that the Thakurain became Taluqdar not in right of her husband Basant Singh but in her own right". Assuming that this language conveys the meaning now sought to be attached to it, namely, that the words "became Taluqdar" are equivalent to "took the estate," it is stated now that in the present suit there is no such admission as was made in the suit between Sher Bahadur Singh and the present defendant. The case for the plaintiff here is that Dariao Kuar took the estate in right of her husband and not in her own right, and of course it cannot be suggested that any admission made in the Court of the previous litigation is binding upon the plaintiff who was not a party to it.

The real question which has to be determined is, what was the interest which the Government intended to confer upon Dariao Kuar by the various proceedings which took place from the time of the Second Summary Settlement up till the date of the delivery to her of the sanad. What Dariao Kuar took can only be what the Government intended to confer upon her. The entire proprietary rights in the Taluqa were vested in the British Government and we have to decide to what extent the Government parted with those rights in favour of Dariao Kuar. The intentions of the Government in this matter can only, we think, be deduced from the acts of the Government itself. The conduct and declarations of Dariao Kuar cannot be appealed to for the purpose of ascertaining the intentions of Government, except in so far as it can be shown that any conduct on her part affected the purpose of the Government in its dealings with her. We pass on now to consider the various acts and declarations of the lady which have been referred to by the learned Counsel for the appellant in this connection. We have already adverted to the fact that when an application was made by Dariao Kuar on the 8th of May 1858 for the purpose of having the Summary Settlement made with her, she was described in the petition as the wife of Basant Singh. Exhibit A-1 is an official document described as "Settlement Statement A." In the fourth column of this statement the heading of which is "name of Taluqdar or Zamindar", the entry is "wife of Basant Singh". The agent who signed the application on behalf of the lady described her as being the wife of Basant Singh. Similarly in Exhibit 2, described as "Statement B," we find in the fifth column, which is meant to show the name of the person paying the revenue, the entry "wife of Basant Singh". Basant Singh's own name is shown in column 2 of the statement which is designed to indicate the name of the Taluqdar. (It may be observed here that the entry in column 2 is an obvious mistake, for it is common ground that Basant Singh had died in the month of November 1857). Similar entries are to be found in other documents relating to this settlement (cf. Exhibit 3 and Exhibit 1). We have also had our attention called to Exhibits A84 and A85 which show that, in response to an order of the authorities calling for certain information regarding the family, Dariao Kuar sent in a family pedigree which is admittedly the pedigree not of her own family but of her husband's family. Again Exhibit A 2 is a copy of an order or rubkar in which it is stated that the settlement of the whole Taluqa comprising 72 villages was made for a lump sum of Government revenue with the wife of Basant Singh. This document bears date the 20th of September 1859. These are the only documents which are anterior in date to the letter which was issued by the Governor-General-in-Council on the 10th of October 1859 (cf. Schedule I, Act I of 1869). Certain other documents subsequent to that date have also been pressed upon our attention. Exhibit A 207 is an extract from a list of Taluqdars which was prepared in consequence of certain directions issued under the authority of the Chief Commissioner. In the column of remarks contained in this list there are exhibited certain replies purporting to have been received from various Taluqdars and showing the rule of succession which obtains in the family. Opposite the entry relating to the wife of Basant Singh there is a statement which appears to have been made by Dariao Kuar, in which is described the rule of succession as it obtained in the family of her deceased husband. Exhibit 146 may be read in connection with the above exhibit. It is a certified copy of the letter which led to the preparation of Exhibit A207. It shows that inquiries were being made as to the extent to which the rule of primogeniture obtained amongst the Taluqdars. Another document is Exhibit 4 which is dated the 8th of February 1860. This is a copy of a petition or application put in by the "widow of Basant Singh deceased." In this petition the lady after reciting the fact that the British Government had conferred upon her the proprietary right in the ilaqa of Samarpaha, etc., for generation after generation, expressed her desire that after her death the estate should continue in the name of Sher Bahadur Singh, her adopted heir, entire and undivided according to the custom of raj-gaddi. Exhibit 145 is another list of Taluqdars which was prepared with a view to ascertaining the extent to which the rule of primogeniture prevailed. Here again there is an entry relating to the estate held by the widow of Basant Singh. In the column of remarks attached to this statement there is a note which appears to have emanated from the Deputy Commissioner, Mr. Capper. According to this note Dariao Kuar survived her husband and succeeded to the estate. It was added that her husband's next of-kin would succeed unless she adopted a younger member of the family. A good deal of stress appears to have been laid upon this particular entry in the Court below. We are, however, doubtful whether the entry was at all admissible in evidence; but on the assumption that it can be admitted under the provisions of section 35 of the Indian Evidence Act as being an entry in a public register made by a public servant in the discharge of his official duty, we are of opinion that as evidence it is of no value. It seems to us to express nothing more than the opinion of the gentleman who was responsible for it, and we certainly cannot assume in the absence of any evidence that it is a record of any statement made by Dariao Kuar herself. Exhibit A 95 has also been referred to. This is a copy of a deposition made by two Qanungos before the Assistant Settlement Officer of Rae Bareli on the 19th of March 1863. The statements seem to have been taken with a view of preparing a history of the estate and we find the deponents saying that Basant Singh's estate was given to his widow who now managed it. It was further said in the course of the deposition that the heir-apparent to the estate was Sher Bahadur Singh, an adopted son. Exhibit 9 is another document relied upon by the appellant. This, as we have mentioned before, is a copy of the primogeniture sanad. Exhibits 6 and 7 also purport to be certain statements made by the lady with reference to the history of the estate and the pedigree of the family. It is clear from these that in response to the invitation of the authorities she sent in a history of her husband's family. Exhibit 8 dated the 1st of September 1861 is a document to which we have already called attention. It is the deed by which Dariao Kuar designated Sher Bahadur Singh as the person who would succeed to the estate on her death "for the purpose of perpetuating the name of the family." The other documents to which our attention has been called relate to the period during which the First Regular Settlement was going on, that is, from the year 1863 onwards. It seems to us that for the purposes of ascertaining the extent of the interest which Government intended to confer upon Dariao Kuar these documents are of no value at all. By the time the Regular Settlement began, the titles of the Taluqdars as proprietors of their estates had already been settled and the First Regular Settlement was made with them on the basis of the title conferred in virtue of the Summary Settlement, the letter of the 10th of October 1859 and the sanads which were subsequently granted. Nothing was done by the Government in the course of these Regular Settlement proceedings which could add to or detract from the interest already conferred upon the Taluqdars, except so far as steps were taken to define and secure the rights of the inferior Zamindars and village occupants to which a reference is made in paragraph 3 of the letter of the 10th of October 1859 and also in paragraph 4 of the letter of the 19th October 1859, which is to be found as No. II in the First Schedule to the Oudh Estates Act.

After a perusal of these documents it cannot be doubted that in various proceedings relating to the Second Summary Settlement Dariao Kuar was described as the wife or widow of Basant Singh. The question is whether this fact is to be treated as being of any importance or weight in connection with the matter under inquiry, namely, the intention of the Government in making a grant of the proprietary rights. Is there anything to show that the declaration of Dariao Kuar that she was the wife of Basant Singh in any way affected the intentions of the Government at the time when the letter of the 10th of October 1859 was issued or, still later, when the two sanads were granted in succession to Dariao Kuar? We have already expressed our opinion that no proprietary rights can be deemed to have been conferred upon Dariao Kuar prior to the letter of the 10th of October 1859,

It is, of course, possible to argue that the decision to allow Dariao Kuar to engage for the payment of the Government revenue for a period of three years subsequent to May 1858 was influenced by the fact that she was Basant Singh's widow, and it may perhaps be conceded that the order for making the settlement with her (which, as we have mentioned, was passed on the third day after she had made the application) would not have been made had it not been that she was Basant Singh's widow and in possession of his property. But while these facts may be taken to have constituted the motive which determined the selection of Dariao Kuar as being the person who should be permitted to engage for the period of the Summary Settlement, we are unable to see how they could affect the nature of the interest which was afterwards conferred upon her. It need not be supposed that in the interval between the making of the Summary Settlement with the various Taluqdars and the issue of the letter of the 10th of October 1859 Government was not aware of the fact that this Taluqa Samarpaha and other Taluqas were in possession of widows. There is plenty of evidence on the record to show that information regarding the various estates and their histories had been sought for and obtained before the Governor-General issued his letter of the 10th of October 1859 in response to the urgent solicitations of the Chief Commissioner of Oudh. Had it been the intention either of the Chief Commissioner or of the Governor-General to lay down any particular terms regarding the estates which were in possession of widows, we think that some clear expression of the intention would have been found in the letter of the 10th of October 1859. But as has been pointed out, the declaration contained in the second paragraph of this letter is a perfectly general one. It is made in favour of "every Taluqdar" with whom a Summary Settlement had been made and must be deemed, therefore, to include the cases in which the person admitted to engage for the revenue was a woman. We can find nothing in this letter of the Governor-General to indicate that it was his intention to bestow in any case anything less than the full estate described in the letter; and the language of the sanads which were subsequently addressed to the individual Taluqdars confirms this opinion; and while it may be true that, in the various proceedings relating to the Second Summary Settlement, Dariao Kuar was described as the wife or widow of Basant Singh, it is important to notice that in Exhibit 9, which is the copy of the primogeniture sanad the lady is described by her own name and not as Basant Singh's widow, the sanad, addresses her as "Musammat Dariao Kuar, Taluqdar." We are unable therefore, to yield to the argument that the description of Dariao Kuar as the wife or widow of Basant Singh in these various documents is a fact which can be treated as having weighed with Government when it came to make the grant of the proprietary rights in the Taluqa of Samarpaha.

We have now to notice an argument which was very strongly pressed upon us by the learned Counsel for the appellant. It is said that, although the confiscation of the 15th of March 1858 may have made a clean sweep of all existing rights, the effect of the "restoration" of Taluqas to their former owners was to re-instate them in their old position, subject only to such modifications as were made by the Government either by way of curtailing or enlarging the rights formerly possessed by them; and it is claimed that the documents to which we have referred show conclusively that the grant made by the Government to Dariao Kuar operated as a restitution; and so it is argued that in accordance with well-established principles of law in such cases any rights which could have been enforced against Taluqdars before the confiscation would be revived. In other words, the argument is that the effect of the grant made by the British Government was to restore the status qua ante and to put Dariao Kuar in the position of a person holding the estate of a Hindu widow with special powers of alienation superadded, the result being that if she failed to exercise the special powers of transfer conferred upon her, the estate would revert after her death to the nearest male heir of her deceased husband.

It would, we think, be difficult to discover, either in the language of the letter of the 10th October 1859, or in the language of the sanads which were granted subsequently, anything which might lead us to conclude that the intention of the British Government was merely to restore the position as it existed before the date of the confiscation. Here again we may say that had this been the policy of the Government, we might reasonably expect to find words clearly expressing this intention. An examination of the letter of the 10th of October 1859 appears to us to negative any hypothesis of this kind. The policy of the Government seems to have been to perpetuate the fiscal arrangement which had been carried out by means of the Second Summary Settlement, to maintain the existing possession of the persons with whom that Summary Settlement had been made, and for this purpose it was thought proper to declare that every person with whom such a settlement had been made and who in the month of October 1859 was still in possession of the estate for the revenue of which he had contracted was to be deemed to have acquired thereby a permanent, hereditary and transferable right in the Taluqa. Paragraph 4 of the letter refers in the plainest language to the permanent proprietary right "which has now been conferred." It seems to us that this letter does not in any way purport merely to restore a former title or to proclaim that the Taluqdars were to be deemed to be in again as of their old estates. On the contrary, there was the grant of a fresh title altogether and not merely the acknowledgment and restoration of a title which had existed prior to the confiscation and had been destroyed thereby. With regard to the argument that in cases where a grant operates merely by way of restitution there is a revival of all rights which might have been enforced against the grantee prior to the confiscation, it may be pointed out that there is positive evidence, in the history of the legislation which took place subsequent to the grant of the sanads, to show that the rights of mortgagors to redeem mortgages on property which had become included in the estates covered by the sanads had, as a matter of law, been confiscated by the proclamation, although it seems that that result was not intended. In the year 1866 an Act was passed (XIII of 1866) to exempt certain suits in Oudh from the operation of the rules of limitation in force in that Province. The suits so exempted included suits for the redemption of mortgages with possession executed on or after the 13th of February 1844. This Act was passed with the consent of the Taluqdars, who agreed to waive the objections they might legally be entitled to make to the redemption of mortgages. It was afterwards discovered, however, that the language of this Act XIII of 1866 was ambiguous and that it was very doubtful whether a suit to redeem a mortgage of property comprised in a Taluqa was not legally barred. In fact it was brought to the notice of the Government that in spite of the provisions of Act XIII of 1866 to which the Taluqdars had assented, one of them had actually pleaded in Court that the redemption of a mortgage of property comprised in his estate was barred by the terms of the sanad. It was to remove all doubts regarding the right to redeem these mortgages that section 6 of Act I of 1869 was passed. We may take it, therefore, that it was not understood by the Government that the effect of the letter of the 10th of October 1859 and of the sanads which followed upon it was to revive all rights which might have been enforced against the Taluqdars prior to the time of the confiscation; otherwise there would have been no necessity for this subsequent legislation intended to protect the rights of persons who had made mortgages at a date prior to the annexation of Oudh. We may also observe here that the terms of the letter of the 10th of October 1859 disclose to what extent the Government then contemplated the revival of rights which could be enforced against the Taluqdars. Paragraph 3 of this letter declared the intention of Government to take steps for the protection of inferior Zamindars and village occupants and for upholding their rights in the soil in subordination to the Taluqdars; and in this connection we may also refer to the letter of the 19th of October 1859, which is included in the First Schedule to the Oudh Estates Act and in which the intentions of the Government as expressed in paragraph 3 of the former letter are more fully declared. It was notified that when a Regular Settlement of the Province should be made, means would be taken to secure the rights of the Zamindars or other persons who held an interest in the soil intermediate between the ryot and the Talqdar. It seems clear, therefore, that it was at this time the intention of the Government, in spite of the grant of full proprietary rights to the Taluqdars, to revive as against them the rights of certain subordinate Zamindars and tenure holders; but beyond this there is nothing in the language of this letter of the 10th of October 1859 to indicate that Government had any intention of restoring or reviving other rights, such for example as the rights of the reversionary heirs of a deceased Hindu expectant on the death of the Hindu widow in possession of the estate. We are led to hold for the reasons just given that Government had no intention whatever of reviving any such reversionary rights. On this part of the case the learned Counsel for the appellant pressed us with the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in the Hunsapore case [Baboo Beer Pertab Sahee v. Maharajah Rajender Pertab Sahee (4)]. That was a case in which a Raj had been confiscated by Government, who kept possession of it for upwards of 20 years and ultimately granted it to a younger member of the family to which the estate had previously belonged It was held there that although the Zamindari was to be treated as the self-acquired property of the grantee, yet the grant, being from the ruling power, in the absence of evidence of the intention of the Government as grantor to the contrary, carried the incident of the family tenure as a Raj. It was held in the circumstances that the Government's intention must be taken to have been to restore the estate as it existed before confiscation with no change other than such as affected the former owner and his descendants. Consequently the grant was held not to take effect as the creation of a new tenure but to operate simply as a change of tenant by the exercise of a vis major. It is to be observed with reference to this decision that in this case there was no issue of a fresh sanad. The only evidence of the intention of the grantor which was before their Lordships of the Privy Council was to be found in certain proceedings and correspondence which afforded no means of ascertaining the precise grounds upon which the Government determined to confer the property upon the new grantee. As their Lordships observed, there was no clear expression of intention on the part of the Government to alter the nature of the tenure. The facts relating to the confiscation and the granting of estates in Oudh are altogether different. We do not treat the decision of their Lordships in the Hunsapore case (4) as laying down any general rule defining the incidents of estates which are re-granted after confiscation. We take it that what is laid down in the judgment is that in each case the question is purely one of the intention of the Government as grantor and every case must be decided on its own facts. We have in the present case clear and precise evidence, to be found in the formal declaration of the Government contained in the letter of the 10th of October 1859 and in the language of the sanads which followed, to show that the intention was not merely to restore the estates with all the incidents which attached to them before the confiscation took place. We think in the case of estates in Oudh the situation was not merely that of a change of tenant by the exercise of vis major. There was a fresh grant conferring a fresh title and a new estate with incidents which were unknown prior to the time when confiscation took place.

It has been said in the course of argument that if the Government chose to confer upon a Hindu widow powers of alienation not possessed by her under the ordinary Hindu Law, the reversionary heir would be precluded from questioning the validity of any transfer made by her, but his right to succeed to the undisposed of estate would not be affected in any way. This is an echoe of the argument which was raised before their Lordships of the Privy Council in Janki Koer's case (2), where it was urged that what had been granted to the widow was a widow's estate with a general power of appointment, failing the exercise of which the estate would descend to the husband's heirs.

Their Lordships dealt with this argument in the following language to be found at page 11 of the report :—

(4) 12 M. I. A. 1; 9 W. R P. C. 15; 2 Suth. P. C. J. 114; 2 Sar. P. C. J. 348; 20 E. R. 211

" They consider that the sanad conferred and was intended to confer a full proprietary and transferable right in the estate upon Kablas and her male heirs according to the law of primogeniture, and not merely to confer upon her an estate for life with full power of alienation and with remainder to the male heirs of her husband in the event of her dying intestate without having alienated it in her lifetime."

If this is the interpretation which their Lordships put upon the sanad granted to Kablas Kuar, we certainly should not consider ourselves at liberty to construe the very same language which is to be found in the sanad given to Dariao Kuar in a different sense. The sanads are identical in terms and we take it that their Lordships intended to rule that the nature of the estate conferred was to be deduced from the language of the document which constitutes the evidence of the grant.

While it may be true that a peculiar estate of the kind mentioned in the learned Counsel's argument, namely, a life-estate in a Hindu female with a general power to appoint, is not unknown to the Hindu law, we think we may safely say that such an estate is rarely to be met with. There is an instance of an estate of this kind to be found in the Reports cf. Bai Motivahu v. Bai Mamubai (5)]. This was a case in which their Lordships of the Judicial Committee had to deal with the interpretation of the Will of a Hindu testator who devised his immoveable property upon trust for the income to be appropriated to the maintenance of his widow and daughter, and of the children that might be born of the daughter, the property to be divided among the heirs of such children. It was further provided by the Will that if there should be no children born of the daughter, the property covered by the Will was to devolve upon those to whom the daughter might direct it to be delivered by making her Will. It was held that " The daughter having no children there was not an absolute gift to the daughter and that the persons to whom the property was given, though to be designated by her, did not take the gift from her but from the testator. " This, therefore, was a case of a bequest to a daughter of a life-estate with a general power to appoint by Will and the estate so created was declared by their Lordships to be a valid estate under the Hindu Law, on the ground that the testator himself might have designated the person to take in the event of the daughter's having no child. The gift would then have been valid as an executory bequest, supported by preceding life-interests, but the taker so designated must have been, either actually or in contemplation of law, in existence at the death of the testator. Here the language in the Will which gave rise to this estate was clear. The testator had provided that if his daughter Mamubai should have no children, then after her death and the death of the widow Motivahu the trust was to become void and the property was to be delivered to such persons as the daughter might appoint by Will. We think we are correct in saying that any intention to create a peculiar estate of this kind would have to be expressed in the clearest possible language. We take it that this argument, which contends for the grant of a life-estate to Dariao Kuar with a general power of appointment superadded, is based upon the language of the penultimate clause of the primogeniture sanad, which declares that the grantee and her successors are to have full power to alienate the estate, either in whole or in part, by sale, mortgage, gift, bequest, or adoption, to whomsoever they might please. By the terms of the preceding clauses there is a grant to Dariao Kuar, and the suggestion appears to be that the special mention of the power of alienation to be found in the third clause of the sanad indicates that the intention was to give a limited estate, but to confer upon the grantee full powers of alienation. But it is to be observed that what is granted by the earlier clauses of the sanad is the full proprietary right, title and possession of the estate of Samarpaha, and it appears to us that no such significance as is contended for can be attributed to the language contained in the third clause which relates to the power of alienation. It seems clear enough that the special mention of the power of alienation contained in this third clause was made merely to prevent the raising of any doubts as to the meaning of the previous words which settled the rule of descent by the law of primogeniture. In other words, the third clause lays down that the estate is to descend by primogeniture in the event of the grantee, or of any of her successors, dying intestate, but it is to be understood that the operation of this rule can be prevented by the exercise of the full power of alienation which has been conferred upon the grantee; and indeed it seems to us impossible to put any other construction upon the language of the sanad when it is remembered that the grant, of which this sanad is merely evidence, had been made by the letter of the 10th of October 1859. We have already expressed our opinion that the effect of this letter was to confer upon all Taluqdars with whom a Summary Settlement had been made the full proprietary title in the estates for which they had engaged, and there is certainly nothing in the language of that letter to indicate in any way that in the case of the Taluqdars who were Hindu widows it was Government's intention to confer merely a life interest with a general power of transfer superadded. Again it has been argued that in the dealings between herself and the British Government after confiscation Dariao Kuar was acting in a representative character. It is said that she was representing the complete estate, namely, her own limited interest together with the interest of the reversionary heirs. That may have been the situation in the eye of the law up till the time when the proclamation of the 15th of March 1858 was issued: but any such legal character borne by her was put an end to by the confiscation, and after the proclamation Dariao Kuar, like all other proprietors in Oudh, was in the situation of a person stripped of all immoveable property. She then represented nothing in the way of estate, for there was nothing to represent We have already said that there is no evidence to satisfy us that in the dealings which took place between the lady and the British Government subsequent to the date of the confiscation she was regarded by the Government in the light of a representative. On the contrary, it seems to us that at the time when the declaration contained in the letter of the 10th of October 1859 was made, Dariao Kuar was treated by Government as being merely one of a number of individuals with whom a Summary Settlement had been made and who was by reason of that fact considered to be a fit object of the bounty of Government. It was this fact, namely, the making of the Summary Settlement with her which constituted the reason for the grant, and it was in that character; and in that character only, that the estate appears to have been bestowed upon her. In short this argument is merely the restitution argument put in another form and we have already disposed of that by what we have just said above.

We now come to another part of the plaintiff appellant's case as argued before us. It has been contended that for certain reasons Dariao Kuar, although the sanad was granted to her, should be considered to have held the position of a trustee for the reversioners of her deceased husband Basant Singh. The case in this respect seems to have developed considerably after the filing of the plaint, for an examination of this document would indicate that the only grounds suggested for the plea that Dariao Kuar was a trustee are to be found in paragraph 7 of the plaint to which we have already referred, and it may perhaps be taken that the allegations contained in the 4th and 5th paragraphs of the plaint, that Dariao Kuar engaged for the Second Summary Settlement and obtained the sanad in her character of the widow of Basant Singh, were intended to suggest that Dariao occupied this position. In the course of the preliminary arguments before the lower Court before the issues were struck the plaintiff's Counsel informed the Court that he did not raise the case that Dariao Kuar acquired the Taluqa in trust for herself and others in the technical sense of the term, but only that the grant to her was subject to certain equities which flowed, first, from her position as a Hindu widow and, secondly, from the circumstances under which the grant was made. These latter circumstances it was said would be disclosed by evidence contained in Dariao Kuar's own applications to the Settlement Courts and in other official papers. A reference was made by the plaintiff's Counsel to certain decisions of their Lordships of the Privy Council, in which it had been held that the Taluqdar to whom the sanad had been granted took the property in trust and it was pleaded that in the present case there were circumstances which would give rise to equities similar to those which were recognised in the decisions of their Lordships of the Privy Council. A reference to the judgment of the learned Subordinate Judge goes to show that other points were also argued before him for the purpose of showing that Dariao Kuar was nothing but a trustee. One argument was that her situation in the eyes of the law was similar to that of a life-tenant who renews a lease or acquires the revision of the leasehold property and who would be treated in equity as a trustee for the remainderman. Then again an appeal seems to have been made to what we may call the doctrine of graft; in other words, it was argued that Dariao Kuar had the precarious estate of a Hindu widow upon which there had been grafted a general power of appointment. And, lastly, stress was laid upon certain acts and declarations of Dariao Kuar by reason of which it was argued that she had made herself a trustee for Basant Singh's reversionary heirs. All these arguments have been repeated before us in appeal and we now proceed to deal with them.

There can be no doubt that in a number of cases which have come up for disposal before the Judicial Committee it has been decided that the person to whom the sanad has been granted is a trustee in spite of the terms of the grant. We might in this connection refer to the remarks of their Lordships in their judgment of 1877 given in the suit which Sher Bahadur Singh brought against Dariao Kuar in respect of this very estate. A copy of this judgment is on the record and is marked Exhibit A 69 [cf. Thakur Shere Bahadur Singh v. Thakurain Dariao Kuar (6)]. They refer to "the tenor of some recent decisions whereby, although undoubtedly the doctrine is affirmed that the title conferred by the Government is absolute and overrides all other titles, nevertheless it has been held that the grantee under the Government may by an express declaration of trust constitute himself a trustee". In another case of this kind their Lordships observe that the legal owner might either by express agreement or by his conduct constitute himself trustee for others as to the whole or part of the beneficial interest.

We have been referred to all the cases in which this point was considered, beginning with the case of Musammat Thukrain Sookraj Koowar v. Government and Baboo Ajeet Sing (7) down to the case reported as Maharaj Kedar Nath v. Thakur Ratan Singh (8) An examination of these cases goes to show that in all instances in which it was held that a trust had been raised there was before their Lordships definite evidence of acts upon which they came to the conclusion that in spite of the terms of the sanad the grantee held the property, either in whole or in part, for the benefit of third persons.

In the Bhinga case [Musammat Thukrain Sookraj Koowar v. Government and Baboo Ajeet Sing (7)] there were definite acknowledgments in writing made by the grantee by which he admitted the title of the lady, and it was proved that these admissions of title had induced the lady who was suing to stand aside and forbear from pressing her claims to a grant of the estate.

In the Sessendee case [Widow of Shunker Sahai v. Rajah Kashi Pershad (9)] there was evidence to show that the widow's proprietary title to a portion of the property covered by the sanad had been acknowledged by the Taluqdar when he made his application for the Second Summary Settlement. Similarly in the Mourawan case [Hurpurshad v. Sheo Dyal (10)] the evidence was sufficient to show that the grant, although expressed to be made to one member of a joint family, was in reality made to the entire family.

In the case of Thakoor Hardeo Bux v. Thakoor Jawahir Singh (11) there was proof on the Settlement Record of an admission of title made by the Taluqdar and this was treated by their Lordships as having the same force as an express writing so as to constitute between the parties the relation of trustee and beneficiary. In other cases such as those reported as Seth Jaidial v. Seth Sita Ram (12) and Maharaj Bedar Nath v. Thakur Ratan Singh (8), effect was given by their Lordships to family arrangements come to between the parties previous to the grant of the sanad. A similar case of family arrangement is that reported as Thakurain Ramanund Koer v. Thakurain Raghunath Koer (13), a case in which several widows were in possession after the husband's death and had executed an agreement between themselves relating to the manner of the enjoyment of the estate. In this case the defendant Thakurain Raghunath Kuar who received the sanad was found to have held herself out all along, and certainly from April 1856 up till the time she got the sanad, as claiming the estate under her husband's Will which made provision for the successive enjoyment of the estate by the widows. The only other case we think it necessary to notice is one reported as Hasan Jafar v. Muhammad Askari (14). Here the Taluqdar had at the time of applying for the Second Summary Settlement, expressly stated that he was only one of several co-sharers in the estate. It was proved that the settlement was directed to be made with him on this basis and definite orders were passed to provide for the rights of the absent co-sharer, if he returned. It was further proved that this arrangement was agreed to by the Taluqdar.

In every one of these reported cases, therefore, there was some definite evidence of acknowledgment of the title of a third party, either by express admission or by execution of a deed of family arrangement or by a solemn declaration made at the time of the granting of the Second Summary Settlement. They are all cases in which the conduct of the Taluqdar was held to amount either to an express or constructive declaration of trust. Is there any evidence of this kind in the case now before us? We are of opinion that there is not. We have already touched upon some of the evidence which is relied upon in this connection, namely, various declarations made by Dariao Kuar up till the time the sanad was granted. It is true she described herself as the widow of Basant Singh, that in answer to inquiries relating to the history of the property she gave the history of her husband's family, but so far as we are able to see she never in any way acknowledged that any third person had a present right in the Taluqa. It is true that in the year 1861 she made a declaration that Sher Bahadur Singh would succeed to the property after her death; but this obviously cannot be treated as a declaration of trust in favour of Sher Bahadur. The document was one in the nature of a Will which Dariao Kuar could revoke, and did subsequently revoke, and in the litigation between Sher Bahadur Singh and Dariao Kuar this document was never treated as amounting to a declaration of trust.

A good deal of reliance has been placed upon Exhibit No. 12 which is a copy of a letter, dated the 27th of December 1866, which Dariao Kuar addressed to the Deputy Commissioner of Rae Bareli in connection with a dispute then pending between herself and Sher Bahadur Singh. This was the time when Sher Bahadur was moving the Chief Commissioner and the Government of India to recall the sanad from Dariao Kuar and grant it to him. In this letter the lady refuted the suggestion that had been made against her, namely, that she was alienating the estate to her brothers, men of the Amethia clan She went on to say that when the time came when she should think it right to make over the estate to someone else, she would make an application to the Deputy Commissioner to entrust the estate to a member of her family (apne khandan) of approved good character. We do not look upon this document as containing any declaration of trust or any admission by the lady that she was holding the property for the benefit of her husband's relatives. The statement that she would not give the estate to the Amethias in her life tied her down to nothing. She might have exercised her power of alienation at any time before her death in favour of any one she pleased, and although she may have protested that she had no intention of handing over the property to Amethias, that statement would not raise any trust in favour of any particular person belonging to the Bais clan to which her husband belonged. As for what she says regarding her intention at the proper time to hand over the estate to a well-behaved member of the family, in view of what she had already said, she probably did mean a member of her husband's family. However, all that need be said regarding this is that she never took any such action and by dying intestate left the estate to go where the law directed it should go. Exhibit 141 is another letter, dated the 24th of January 1867, which Dariao Kuar addressed to the Deputy Commissioner. This too relates to the dispute then going on between herself and Sher Bahadur. The lady repudiates the charges brought against her and justifies her conduct and she refers to the previous declaration she had made, namely, that she had no intention of giving the estate to the Amethias.

Next it is said that certain proceedings in the Courts of the Settlement Officers during the First Regular Settlement afford evidence of acknowledgment of a trust. We have already observed that no acts or declarations of Dariao Kuar at this period could be taken into account for the purpose of ascertaining the intention of Government in conferring the estate and for the purpose of determining the extent of the estate so conferred, for all that had been settled long before the proceedings of the First Regular Settlement were commenced. We proceed to notice the various documents which are relied upon by the plaintiff in this connection. Exhibits 16 to 21 and 24 to 38, which are all of the period between 1864 and 1865, are copies of petitions which were made by Dariao Kuar for regular settlement of the various villages comprised in the Taluqa. In a great many of these documents she styles herself as the widow of Basant Singh and the property is described as "ancestral" or "inherited" property or property which had for generations past been "in the possession of her ancestors" or herself. Then Exhibits A 16 to A 58 are copies of orders, decrees or judgments passed by the Settlement Officers who dealt with the applications for the regular settlement. In some of these orders the claim of Dariao Kaur is described as being a claim by inheritance, as well as a claim under a right conferred by the sanad. The claim is allowed in all cases and in some instances it is stated that the settlement is made with her because she has acquired a full proprietary right. Exhibits A 59 to A 62 are copies of certain kabuliyats or engagements executed by the lady in which she is described as the wife or widow of Basant Singh. Then we have a number of village administration papers (Exhibits 39 to 123) containing the history of various villages comprised in the Samarpaha Taluqa and in which mention is made of the fact that the property had descended in the family of Basant Singh. The result then is that in a variety of documents relating to the regular settlement of the Taluqa we have repeated declarations of Dariao Kuar that the property was ancestral property, that it was inherited and that it had been in possession of her and her ancestors for generations. We have no doubt that in using this language the lady was describing the history of property which had come down in her husband's family, for it could hardly be suggested that she was making a declaration notoriously untrue, namely, that the property had belonged to her own family before the time of the annexation. But what do these declarations amount to? There can surely be no ground for saying that in making these statements of fact Dariao Kuar had any notion of holding herself out as a trustee for the heirs of her husband. It is perfectly clear that the regular settlement was not made with her on the basis of these representations that she was Basant Singh's widow and that the property had been in her husband's family for many years, but on the ground set out in the decrees and orders of the Settlement Courts, namely, that she had acquired the full title to the property under the sanad. All these declarations are naturally explained on the assumption that they are nothing but mere statements of history; not statements of any intention to create a trust or acknowledgments of title made with the intention of admitting the existence of any beneficial interest in the property in third parties. We are unable to hold that on this evidence it is proved that Dariao Kuar either expressly or by implication constituted herself a trustee for the reversionary heirs of her husband. The only ground then left for any argument that Dariao Kuar was a trustee is the fact that she was the widow of Basant Singh, and it was admitted by the learned Counsel for the appellant when he came to sum up his arguments that the whole question of title in this case is narrowed down to this, namely, whether Dariao Kuar acquired the Taluqa "in right of her husband." If she did, it is argued the succession must be to her husband's reversioners. We have already discussed this question, holding that the matter for decision is really what the intention of the Government was in making the grant. We have expressed the opinion that the Government in conferring the estate by the letter of the 10th of October 1859 and by the sanad which followed had no regard to her position as a Hindu widow, but gave her the full proprietary right solely on the ground that she was a person who had been permitted to engage for the Second Summary Settlement. We may finally dispose of this part of the case by referring to an authority which in our opinion is conclusive of the matter in debate. We refer to the ruling reported as Brij Indar Bahadur Singh v. Ranee Janki Koer (2). A great deal of time and ingenuity has been expended in an attempt to distinguish that case from the present one, but, in our opinion, without success. The facts of the two cases are for all practical purposes identical Any differences which have been discovered appear to us to be altogether negligible and cannot possibly affect the principles upon which the case was decided. The main question which their Lordships were called upon to determine in Janki Koer's case (2) was the nature of the estate conferred upon Thakurain Kablas Kuar to whom, as in the present case, a primogeniture sanad had been granted. The Taluqa had belonged to one Mahpal Singh, who died in the years 1852-3 prior to annexation leaving two widows, one of whom was Kablas Kuar. At the time of the annexation Kablas Kuar was in possession of the estate which had descended to her as the surviving widow of Mahpal Singh. As in the present case, Kablas Kuar was in possession of the estate at the time of confiscation and after confiscation the Second Summary Settlement was made with her. In the kabuliyat which she executed Kablas Kuar was described as Mahpal Singh's widow, and in a wajib-ul-arz which was in evidence before their Lordships it appeared that she had made an admission that the regular settlement had been made with her in virtue of the ancestral right of her husband. A primogeniture sanad was granted to the lady and it was proved that before this sanad was given, Kablas Kuar had presented a petition asking for the grant to her of a sanad for life. This petition, and the letter of the Deputy Commissionor, to which it was an answer, were strongly relied upon for the purpose of showing that the grant to Kablas Kuar was intended to be a grant to her and the heirs of her husband. In spite of the prayer contained in Kablas's petition the Government issued a primogeniture sanad to her without even mentioning her status as a widow either in the operative part or by way of describing her. Their Lordships were of opinion that if the Deputy Commissioner's letter and Kablas's petition for a sanad for her life could properly be taken into consideration for the purpose of ascertaining what the Government intended to grant by the sanad, they would operate more against than in favour of the claims of the parties who were setting up the case that the grant was one to Kablas Kuar and the heirs of her husband. Dealing with the nature of the estate which Kablas Kuar took under the sanad their Lordships said they entertained no doubt. They held that the sanad conferred and was intended to confer a full proprietary and transferable right in the estate upon Kablas Kuar and her male heirs according to the law of primogeniture, and not merely to confer upon her an estate for life with full power of alienation and with remainder to the male heirs of her husband in the event of her dying intestate without having alienated it in her lifetime. They were further of opinion that Lord Canning's proclamation had the effect of absolutely destroying both the interests of the widow and that of the reversionary heirs and that the Government, having by the confiscation acquired the right of disposing of the property in such manner as it thought fit, granted to Kablas Kuar and her heirs male according to the law of primogeniture the full proprietary right and title to the estate. After this interpretation of the terms of the sanad their Lordships went on to observe that the lady's title did not depend entirely upon the sanad but was also established by the provisions of Act I of 1869. When this Act was passed, the name of Kablas Kuar was entered in the first of the lists prepared under section 8. By reason of the provisions of section 10 the entry of her name in that list was conclusive evidence of the fact that she was a Taluqdar within the meaning of the Act, and consequently by virtue of section 3 of the Act Kablas Kuar was to be deemed to have acquired by the sanad a permanent, heritable and transferable right in the estate in dispute. It was argued before their Lordships that a trust had been created and that Kablas Kuar took the estate upon trust for those who would have been entitled to it if it had not been confiscated. Dealing with this argument their Lordships observed that to hold that such a trust arose would reduce to a nullity the confiscation and the disposal by the Government of the property confiscated. The power of alienation by sale, mortgage, gift or bequest was wholly inconsistent with an intention on the part of Government to create a trust for the benefit of the reversionary heirs of her husband. Their Lordships were of opinion that no trust was created by the sanad or by the Act of 1869 and there was no evidence before them to prove that a trust was created in any other manner.

These are material portions of the judgment of their Lordships to which it is necessary for us to refer, and it seems to us after a careful perusal of the report that there is not a single argument raised here for the plaintiff-appellant which was not advanced before their Lordships. We find there, as here, the argument as to the interpretation of the sanad to the effect that it conferred upon Kablas Kuar the ordinary estate of a Hindu widow with a power of alienation, failing the exercise of which the estate would go to the husband's heirs. Their Lordships held that the sanad was not susceptible of this construction. Then again it was argued there that the sanad was intended to operate as a grant of property to the widow in trust for the reversionary heirs of her husband. As to this their Lordships observed that no trust had been created either by the sanad or by Act I of 1869 and there was no evidence before them to show that a trust had been created in any other manner. Here, of course, we have been referred to certain evidence outside the sanad for the purpose of establishing the position of Dariao Kuar as a trustee. But that evidence, as we have said, has failed to convince us that Dariao Kuar in any way made herself a trustee for her husband's heirs.

The argument that the widow took the estate "in the right of her husband" was, we think, also put before their Lordships in the case reported, although it has been seriously contended here that the point was not taken, or that at any rate, if it was, the argument was not repelled on the ground that it was a matter of indifference whether she took the estate in her husband's right or her own. The learned Counsel has referred to what was said by Lord Macnaghten in the case of Thakur Tirbhuwan Bahadur Singh v. Raja Rameshar Bakhsh Singh (1), where his Lordship remarked that it was admitted that Dariao Kuar became Taluqdar "in her own right" implying, it is argued, that if she had become Taluqdar in right of her husband the result of the case would have been different.

There is no doubt in our minds that it was argued in Janki Koer's case (2) that Thakurain Kablas Kuar, when the estate was conferred upon her, took it in her quality of widow and it was in support of this argument that reliance was placed in particular upon the letter which Kablas Kuar wrote in reply to Col. Macandrew and in which she prayed that a sanad for life might be granted to her. It was this request of Kablas Kuar which was strongly relied upon before their Lordships for the purpose of showing that what Kablas Kuar took under the grant was only the life-estate of a Hindu widow. But it seems to us that their Lordships treated that fact as being of no avail, when it was evident that in spite of the request so made the Government by the sanad conferred the estate upon her and her heirs male "without even mentioning her status as a widow either in the operative words or in describing her."

The case was in this respect a stronger one than the case now before us, for it cannot be pretended that Dariao Kuar, although she generally described herself as Basant Singh's widow and referred to the property as having descended in her husband's family, ever asked for the grant of a sanad for her life only. If it was possible to hold, as it was held in Kablas Kuar's case, that the widow received a full estate notwithstanding her prayer for the grant of a limited estate only, it seems to follow a fortiori that it should be so held when, as here, there never was any such request on the part of Dariao Kuar.

As we have already said, the question is not what the lady took but what the Government conferred and intended to confer by the declaration contained in the letter of the 10th of October 1859. The grant made by that letter was, as their Lordships observed in the Chillaree case (3), "an act of grace," and the nature of the interest which came to Dariao Kuar by the exercise of this act must be determined by ascertaining, not what Dariao Kuar wished or did not wish to receive, but what the Government thought fit to bestow upon her. This question is to be answered by interpreting the language of the letter of the 10th of October 1859 and of the sanad which followed it; and, as observed by their Lordships in Janki Koer's case (2), there is nothing in either document to suggest that Government was in any way influenced by the fact that Dariao Kuar was a Hindu widow to whom her husband's estate had descended under the ordinary Hindu Law before the date of confiscation. As in the case of Kablas Kuar so here the sanad neither in its operative part nor by way of description refers to Dariao Kuar's status as a widow, and we think we are right in holding that this particular fact was treated by their Lordships of the Privy Council in the reported case as being decisive of the matter.

To sum up, the decision in Janki Koer's case (2) appears to us to be conclusive as regards the nature of the interest acquired by Dariao Kuar. The only ground upon which it is possible to suggest that there is any distinction between the cases is that certain evidence has been put forward here for the purpose of showing that Dariao Kuar acquired the property in circumstances which made her a trustee for the heirs of her husband. The evidence, as we have said, fails to establish this position and we find accordingly that by reason both of the letter of the 10th of October 1859 and of the sanads which followed thereupon, and by reason of the provisions of the Oudh Estates Act, Dariao Kuar was the full owner of the Samarpaha Taluqa. This being so, succession to the estate was governed by the terms of section 22 of Act I of 1869, and the defendant Rameshar Bakhsh Singh took as her heir. The plaintiff has no claim whatever to this property. To say that the property was the lady's stridhan does not in our opinion advance the plaintiff's case in any way, for whether it is stridhan or not it is clear from the decision in Janki Koer's case (2) that succession to it is governed by the rules laid down in section 22 of the Oudh Estates Act and Rameshar Bakhsh Singh is the lady's heir under the provisions of clause 6 of that section.

LIMITATION.

The next matter for determination is the question of limitation. The decision of the Court below is that the claim was barred by Article 141 of the First Schedule to the Limitation Act. This Article, which is to be read along with Article 140, lays down a period of limitation governing a suit brought by a Hindu or Muhammadan entitled to the possession of immoveable property on the death of a Hindu or Muhammadan female. Article 140 relates to suits brought by a remainderman, a reversioner (other than a landlord), or a devisee, for possession of immoveable property. Article 141 lays down that the suits to which it relates must be "like suits" to those provided for by Article 140.

We have had occasion in a case decided some time ago to discuss the meaning and scope of Article 141 and our judgment in this case is reported as Ghisa Singh v. Gajraj Singh (15). In that case it was held on a review of the history of the Article in question that it did not apply to cases in which the Hindu or Muhammadan female had been in possession of a full estate, but only to cases where the title of the person bringing the suit is independent of the title of the female who was in possession of the intermediate estate. In other words, Article 141 lays down a rule of limitation for those suits in which it is sought to recover estates which, having once been estates in expectancy, have become vested in the heir of the last male owner on the determination of a limited estate held by a Hindu or Muhammadan female. It was held in the case just referred to that where the Hindu or Muhammadan female had a full estate and where the title of the plaintiff is derived through the female, the proper article to be applied is Article 144. We adhere to this view of law, the correctness of which has been admitted by the learned Counsel for the appellant, who relied upon this decision. We may add that its correctness has not been seriously challenged by the learned Counsel for the respondent. The plaintiff has found himself in difficulties with regard to this question of limitation, for it appears to us that if he contends that the estate which was held by Thakurain Dariao Kuar was a full estate which was vested absolutely in her he is out of Court on the question of title; for, as we have pointed out, if Dariao Kuar was the full owner the defendant is her heir and has the right to the property. The plaintiff has no standing whatever as an heir of Dariao Kuar. On the other hand, if it is the plaintiff's case that Dariao Kuar held only an intermediate estate, which was to revert after her death to the heirs of her deceased husband, the case is clearly governed by the provisions of Article 141.

(15) 33 Ind. Cas. 371; 18 O. C. 289; 3 O. L. J. 45.

In the third paragraph of the plaint the allegation was that after the death of Basant Singh in November 1857 Dariao Kuar as his widow came into possession and enjoyment of the Talaqa. That prima facie amounts to an allegation that Dariao Kuar was in possession with the limited estate of a Hindu widow. Then again in the 7th paragraph of the plaint it was alleged that for various reasons therein specified the grant to Dariao Kuar was the grant of an estate which was to descend after her death to the nearest reversioner of Thakur Basant Singh. So far, therefore, it appears that the case set out in the plaint was that Dariao Kuar was in possession of a limited estate only; and if the question of limitation is to be decided by the statements put forward in the plaint, the opinion of the Subordinate Judge to the effect that the suit is barred by Article 141 appears to us to be perfectly correct. In the argument which took place in the Court below before the issues were settled the plaintiff's Counsel admitted that Dariao Kuar, by reason of the Summary Settlement and the sanad, had acquired a permanent, heritable and transferable right in the estate in suit; but this statement was qualified by a plea to the effect that her right in the property was subject to all the conditions attached to her status as a Hindu widow under the Hindu Law, although she had full proprietary rights in the property. It is somewhat difficult to ascertain what the meaning of these statements is, but we take it that they amount to a plea that in spite of the language of the sanad Dariao Kuar was in reality in possession not of a full but of a limited estate only. On this statement of the plaintiff's case, therefore, it appears to us that the appellant is not in a position to contend that the law of limitation has been misapplied by the Court below. It has indeed been argued here, as it was before the Subordinate Judge, that Dariao Kuar did not occupy the position of a tenant for life inasmuch as she had an absolute power of disposal, and it has further been argued that Article 141 could not apply by reason of the fact that Dariao Kuar was in possession of the property till the time of her death. But if the intention of this argument is that Dariao Kuar in spite of having an absolute power of disposal was in possession of anything short of the full estate, we hold that Article 141 would apply so as to bar the claim. Nor do we think that the Article would cease to apply in a case where the Hindu or Muhammadan female was in possession till the time of her death. The language of the Article itself does not suggest any such distinction. Limitation under this Article begins to run from the time when the female dies, because it is from the date of her death that the right to sue accrues and it seems to us that the right accrues only on her death and irrespective of the question whether she is in possession or not. On the merits, of course, we are bound by what we have just decided to hold that Article 141 would not apply to the facts as proved, for we have expressed our opinion, that Dariao Kuar was the absolute owner of the property. However, that was not the case with which the plaintiff came to Court and dealing with the matter on the footing of the allegations contained in the plaint, we agree with the Court below that the suit was barred by Article 141 of the First Schedule to the Limitation Act.

RES JUDICATA.

We have now to deal with the question of res judicata which was raised in the lower Court and which was decided adversely to the plaintiff. The learned Subordinate Judge was of opinion that the present suit was barred under the provisions of section 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure by reason of what was decided in a previous suit between the same parties. In order to elucidate the argument on this point we have to refer to the pleadings and the judgment in the previous suit. This previous suit was brought on the 30th of May 1911 by Raja Rameshar Bakhsh Singh against the present plaintiff Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh. The purpose of the suit was to recover actual proprietary possession of a village called Shayastabad alias Bharkaspur which, at the time the suit was brought, was in the possession of the defendant. The case for Rameshar Bakhsh was that the title to this village was with him and the title which he pleaded was the title which had been recognised in the litigation between himself and Sher Bahadur Singh, which terminated in the year 1906 with a decree in his favour given by their Lordships of the Privy Council. We have in an earlier part of this judgment referred to those proceedings. Rameshar Bakhsh Singh asserted that at the time he took out execution of the decree the village was in possession of Musammat Gajraj Kuar, who was the mother of Sher Bahadur Singh. He alleged that this lady was in possession as a kham thekadar, her right being the right merely of collecting the rents and of reserving for her own use whatever she could collect in excess of a sum of Rs. 1,126 3-6 which was payable annually to the plaintiff. It was said that when Gajraj Kuar died in the month of December 1906 the defendant wrongfully took possession of the village. The defence which Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh set up is described in his written statement, a certified copy of which is Exhibit No. A 80. In the first paragraph of the written statement Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh admitted that Rameshar Bakhsh Singh had obtained a decree for the whole Taluqa of Samarpaha. He put forward the case, however, that he had a title to this village of Bharkaspur as an under-proprietor. In the 13th paragraph of his written statement it was set out that he and his ancestors had all along been in possession of this particular village in subordination to the Taluqa of Samarpaha and that this tenure had been in existence ever since before the time of the British occupation of Oudh. The allegation was that the defendant and his predecessors had only been liable to pay the land revenue assessed upon this village. In the 14th paragraph of the written statement it was asserted that Dariao Kuar had never denied the under-proprietary rights of Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh and his predecessors, and in the 15th paragraph it was distinctly stated that an under-proprietary right in the village had in any case been acquired by adverse possession. In the 18th paragraph Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh raised a plea of estoppel against the plaintiff, saying that as he had been realising revenue from him (Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh) he could not be permitted to deny that the defendant Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh was in possession as an under-proprietor. In his replication to this written statement Rameshar Bakhsh Singh denied altogether that the defendant, or any of his predecessors, had any under-proprietary right in this village. He denied that either Gajraj Kuar or Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh had even paid him the revenue of the village. On the contrary he said that both of them had been in the habit of sending the Government Revenue direct to the Tahsil and that the money had been refunded to him from the Tahsil as superior proprietor. The result of this litigation was that Rameshar Bakhsh Singh's claim for possession of Bharkaspur was decreed with costs. The issue raising the question of the defendant's title was issue No. 2 and was framed in the following language: "Whether the defendant is an under-proprietor of Shayastabad and did he remain in possession as such for more than twelve years?" The Subordinate Judge came to the conclusion that the defence set up by Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh was a false defence and his decision was that there was no satisfactory evidence to show that Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh, or any of his predecessors, had ever held this village in under-proprietary right. In fact the Subordinate Judge decided that this village had been given by Dariao Kuar to Sher Bahadur Singh by way of maintenance and that the interest so created in Sher Bahadur Singh's favour had come to an end with the latter's death.

It will be observed, and it has been freely admitted, that in the litigation just described Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh did not set up the title which he is asserting as plaintiff in the present suit. He did not claim to be the true owner by right of inheritance of the Samarpaha Taluqa, which includes this village of Bharkaspur. The point, therefore, is whether by reason of his omission to set up this title by way of defence in the previous suit he is precluded by the rule of res judicata from maintaining the present suit, either wholly or in part. According to the view of the law taken by the Subordinate Judge the omission of Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh to plead the present title in the earlier suit is a complete bar to the entertainment of this suit, which relates not only to Bharkaspur but to all the other villages comprised in the Taluqa. The question we have to decide is admittedly to be dealt with in the light of the provisions of section 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure and with particular reference to the language of Explanation IV, which lays down that any matter which might and ought to have been made a ground of defence or attack in the former suit shall be deemed to have been a matter directly and substantially in issue in such suit; and first we have to examine the question as to whether Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh "might" have raised by way of defence the title which he is now asserting to the whole of the Samarpaha Taluqa. There seems to be no doubt from the plaintiff's own statement in the witness-box during the trial of the present case that when he was called upon to defend this previous suit relating to Bharkaspur he was aware of the facts upon which he now relies for the purpose of showing that he is the rightful owner of the Samarpaha estate. He admitted that his father had a claim to the estate after the death of Dariao Kuar, a claim which he was prevented from putting forward because, it is said, Sher Bahadur Singh kept him under restraint. In fact Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh deposed that his father, Sheodat, used to assert his right to this estate even while Dariao Kuar was still alive. He deposed that Sher Bahadur Singh had kept his father under restraint because he knew that he (Sheodat) had a title to the property. We may take it, therefore, on this statement of facts that Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh might in the previous proceedings have pleaded this title to the village of Bharkaspur. He had on his own showing both the opportunity and the necessary knowledge which would have enabled him to do so. This being so, we proceed to consider whether he "ought" to have raised this defence. The question as to whether a particular defence ought or ought not to be raised is one of some difficulty. It does not appear to be possible to lay down any rule of universal application and we have the authority of the judgment of Lord Morris in the case of Kameswar Pershad v. Rajkumari Ruttan Koer (16) for the proposition that the question as to whether a particular ground of defence should be raised is one to be determined with reference to the facts of each case. His Lordship observes as follows:—

"That it 'might' have been made a ground of attack is clear. That it 'ought' to have been appears to their Lordships to depend upon the particular facts of each case. Where matters are so dissimilar that their union might lead to confusion the construction of the word 'ought' would become important. In this case the matters were the same."

Further his Lordship observes, "that the principle is that persons should not be harassed by continuous litigation about the same subject-matter." There is, however, judicial authority which lays down a general standard of duty which is to be observed by defendants, namely, the dictum of Lord Westbury in Srimut Rajah Moottoo Vijaya Reganadha Bodha Gooroo Sawmy Periya Odaya Taver v. Katama Natchiar (17), a dictum which has been frequently cited and followed. His Lordship in the judgment referred to says: "When a plaintiff claims an estate and the defendant, being in possession, resists that claim, he is bound to resist it upon all the grounds that it is possible for him, according to his knowledge, then to bring forward." The reason of this rule consists in the necessity of putting some term to litigation between the parties. It is expedient and proper that a period should be put upon the contentions of parties and it has been observed that there can be no more fit and proper period than that which affords a full and fair opportunity for the examination and decision of the parties' claims, and so the rule is that the plaintiff must support all the issues which are necessary to maintain his cause of action. The defendant, on the other hand, is bound to bring forward all the defences which he has to the cause of action asserted in the plaintiff's pleadings at the time they were filed.

It being ascertained that the facts constituting the title which the plaintiff is advancing in the present suit might have been put forward by way of defence in the earlier suit relating to Bharkaspur, we think with reference to the dictum of Lord Westbury, which has just been cited, it was for him to justify his omission to raise this ground of defence. Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh himself has given no explanation of his failure to do so. He does not seem to have been examined or cross-examined touching this matter. It has been left to his Counsel to adduce reasons for the failure to defend the earlier suit on the title now set up. It has been argued, in the first place, that Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh could not legally have taken this plea in view of his defence that he was the under-proprietor of Bharkaspur and because he was urging in defence that Rameshar Bakhsh Singh was estopped from denying his (Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh's) status as under-proprietor because he had accepted rent from him in that character. Section 116 of the Evidence Act has been appealed to in this connection, a section which lays down a well-known rule that no tenant of immoveable property or person claiming through such tenant shall during the continuance of the tenancy be permitted to deny that his landlord had at the beginning of the tenancy a title to such immoveable property. The argument is that Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh, having pleaded attornment to Rameshar Bakhsh Singh by payment of rent for Bharkaspur, could not possibly deny Rameshar Bakhsh Singh's title so long as he retained possession and that it would only have been permissible for him to do so by walking out of possession. The fact appears to be, however, that no such plea of attornment was really raised. Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh's case was that he and his predecessors had been in adverse possession as under-proprietors for many years upon payment of the revenue and cesses due in respect of this village. We cannot allow that for the purposes of section 116 there is any analogy between the position of a tenant and the position which Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh was taking up by way of defence. The title he was asserting was not a title derived from the superior proprietor but an adverse, though it may be subordinate, title. So much is clear from the allegations contained in paragraph 13 of his written statement, to which we have already called attention. It seems to us that there was absolutely nothing in this defence to show that the title upon which Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh relied was derivative and not adverse, and so we consider that section 116 of the Evidence Act does not apply to the case, for we think it is not correct to say that Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh was setting up any title in the nature of a tenancy. In the next place, it is argued that as Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh was pleading an under-proprietary title to this property, he could not at the same time have asserted a full proprietary title inasmuch as these rights are so dissimilar that they could not be pleaded together for, it is said to have done so would have led to confusion and have tended to embarrass and delay the fair trial of the suit. We have been referred in support of this argument to the terms of Order VI, rule 16, of the Code of Civil Procedure, a rule which allows the Court at any stage of the proceedings to strike out matter in pleadings which may tend to embarrass or delay the fair trial of the suit. We think we may take it on the language of this rule that it is for the Court, and not for the parties, to determine what are the matters which may produce the confusion referred to in the rule. It cannot, in our opinion, be argued that a defendant is to be at liberty to put forward just as much as he chooses of his case for the defence and to reserve the rest, merely because he entertains the opinion that the raising of the other pleas which he has reserved might cause difficulty to the Court. To allow this argument would be to ignore the fundamental principle referred to by Lord Morris that persons should not be harassed by continuous litigation about the same subject-matter. The omission of Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh to put forward the present title by way of defence in an earlier suit is not to be justified on this ground. Nor again are we prepared to allow, if the point is to be argued at all, that Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh is necessarily excused on the ground that proprietary and under-proprietary titles are inconsistent. Assuming for the moment that they are so, there is no provision of law against the setting up of alternative titles by way of defence. The rules of pleading do not prohibit a party from alleging two or more inconsistent sets of material facts and from claiming thereunder in the alternative. It was held in Berdan v. Greenwood (18) that "a defendant may by his written statement raise as many distinct and separate, and, therefore, inconsistent defences as he may think proper, subject only to the provisions contained in rule 1, Order XXVII." This latter rule corresponds to Order VI, rule 16, of the Code of Civil Procedure which authorises the Court to exculde pleas which may lead to embarrassment. It was also held in Morgan, In re; Owen v. Morgan (19) that a pleading is not embarrassing merely because it puts forward inconsistent sets of facts. In short, the law appears to be that a party to a suit cannot constitute himself the arbiter of what is likely to be embarrassing or confusing to the trial; that is a matter for the Court and must be left to the Court. A defendant cannot, we think, on this ground be excused from doing what is his duty, namely, to put forward all the defences he has. It seems to us, therefore, that there is no reason why Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh should not in the suit relating to Bharkaspur have raised by way of defence the title which he now asserts to Bharkaspur and the other villages comprised in the Taluqa.

The question then remains as to what should be the effect in law of Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh having omitted to raise this ground of defence in the previous suit. Is it to be held that he is barred from setting up his title in the present suit to the entire Taluqa or should we hold that the only penalty resulting from his omission is that he can no longer lay any claim to this particular village of Bharkaspur? It has been conceded by the learned Counsel for the appellant that if we hold that Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh both might and ought to have pleaded title as proprietor of Bharkaspur he cannot now be permitted to set up title to this village, it having been finally determined by the judgment in the earlier suit that he has no title to this property. On the other hand the learned Advocate for the respondent supports the view taken by the Court below that not only is the present claim to Bharkaspur barred but the claim to the entire Taluqa is shut out on the ground of res judicata. After careful consideration of the arguments addressed to us and after referring to the numerous authorities which were quoted for our information, our decision is that the judgment in the previous case cannot be set up for the purpose of showing that the plaintiff's claim to the entire Taluqa is barred by the rule of res judicata. It is quite clear that the judgment in the earlier suit does not profess to decide anything more than the title to the Bharkaspur property. It is clear on all grounds that in the present suit the plaintiff cannot be allowed to put forward any case which would have the result of withdrawing this particular subject matter (that is, the title to Bharkaspur) from the operation of the previous decree; but there having been no decision in the former case between the parties as to the title to the other villages comprised in the Taluqa we are unable to hold that the previous judgment constitutes a complete bar to the entertainment of the present suit. While the decision in the previous suit of the issue relating to the title to Bharkaspur concludes the plaintiff from re-agitating that particular matter, it cannot, we think, be held that the case is one in which the former judgment is a complete bar to the present suit. This second action between the same parties is upon a different claim altogether, and it appears to us that the judgment in the prior action can only be treated as an estoppel with respect to the matters in issue or the points controverted in the earlier case upon the determination of which the finding was rendered. The doctrine of 'might' and 'ought' cannot, in our opinion, be pushed to the extent of holding on the facts before us that Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh's failure to put forward by way of defence the present title which he is alleging, raises an estoppel which precludes him from maintaining this suit in so far as it relates to proprety other than the village of Bharkaspur. The doctrine must be kept within limits and the extent of those limits is indicated by the principle to which Lord Morris refers, namely, that parties are not to be continually harassed by litigation in respect of the same subject matter. As was said by Wigram, V. C., in Henderson v. Henderson (20), "the plea of res judicata applies, except in special cases, not only to points on which the Court was actually required by the parties to form an opinion,...but to every point which properly belonged to the subject of litigation and which the parties exercising reasonable diligence might have brought forward at the time." Applying this principle here it seems to us that it cannot be maintained that the title to the entire Samarpaha Taluqa was a point which "properly belonged" to the subject of the previous litigation; and while we are prepared to hold that the present title relied upon by the plaintiff was, qua the property then in dispute, a matter properly belonging to the subject of that litigation, we are satisfied that the title regarding the other villages in the Taluqa was not a matter which could properly be debated in the previous proceedings. This, we think, is equally clear if we refer to Lord Westbury's dictum above quoted: "When a plaintiff claims an estate and the defendant, being in possession, resists that claim, he is bound to resist it upon all the grounds that it is possible for him according to his knowledge, then to bring forward." Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh was in possession at that time of the village of Bharkaspur and he was, therefore, under the duty which is described in these words; but he was not in possession of the other villages appertaining to the Taluqa, nor was he resisting any claim relating to those other villages; and so we hold that he was not under an obligation then to put forward the whole title which he is now asserting. In short, we think that the rule laid down in Explanation IV to section 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure can only properly be applied to cases where the subject of the two suits is the same.

It has been pointed out to us by the learned Advocate for the respondent that in this previous suit Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh actually admitted the title which Rameshar Bakhsh Singh had got under the decree of the Privy Council, and so it has been argued with reference to the provisions of Explanation III to section 11 that the title to the whole Taluqa was a matter directly and substantially in issue in the previous case. This result may indeed follow from the language of Explanation III, but can it be said that because it was for this reason a matter directly and substantially in issue it was also heard and decided? It can only be deemed to have been heard and decided if we apply the doctrine of constructive decision implied in Explanation IV. It seems to us that there can be no decision by necessary implication except in respect of those matters which might and ought to have been made a ground of attack or defence and in this view, we are for the reasons already given, unable to hold that Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh was under an obligation in the earlier case to call for a decision of the Court upon the question of his title to the entire Taluqa. The result, therefore, is that we are unable to agree with the view of this question which was taken by the lower Court. We hold that the present suit for recovery of possession of the Samarpaha Taluqa was not barred by res judicata, except in so far as it relates to the village of Bharkaspur.

ESTATE.

We have only one other matter to notice with respect to the pleas which were raised and argued in the lower Court on behalf of the plaintiff-appellant. In the course of the preliminary arguments before the Subordinate Judge the plaintiff's Counsel sought to argue that the Samarpaha Taluqa was not an "estate" within the meaning of Act I of 1869, for the following reasons:—

(1) because Dariao Kuar executed no kabuliyat for the villages which were settled with her at the Second Summary Settlement;

(2) because there is no list naming the villages and lands comprised in the Taluqa; and

(3) because the villages were not decreed to Dariao Kuar in the manner laid down by section 1 of Act I of 1869.

The learned Advocate for the appellant here, while informing us that he did not abandon this ground of attack upon the lower Court's judgment, admitted that he could not press it strongly. We may say shortly that it appears to us that there is no substance whatever in this plea. The matter has been dealt with by the learned Subordinate Judge in the earlier part of his judgment and we agree with him in holding that the Samarpaha is an "estate" within the meaning of the Oudh Estates Act.

RELATIONSHIP.

There only remains to be noticed one other matter which was raised in argument by the respondent's learned Counsel, and that is with regard to the relationship between the plaintiff and Basant Singh whose heir he claims to be. In paragraph 10 of the plaint in which a reference was made to the alleged custom prevailing among the Bais Taluqdars, it was stated that the rule of succession was that after the death of the widow the estate goes to the eldest among the nearest relations of her deceased husband descended from the common ancestor. In the 12th paragraph it was stated that the plaintiff's father at the time of Dariao Kuar's death fulfilled these conditions and on the pedigree attached to the plaint in this suit the plaintiff represented himself to be the eldest son of his father Sheodat Singh. A good deal of oral evidence was given by both the parties on this question of relationship. The defendant put the plaintiff to proof of the pedigree attached to the plaint. From some expressions in the judgment of the lower Court it would seem that in coming to its decision of this question of relationship the Court was influenced by the fact that Rameshar Bakhsh Singh, the defendant did not put in any pedigree by way of reply to that set up by the plaintiff. It seems to us that Rameshar Bakhsh Singh, not being a member of the family to which Basant Singh belonged, could not reasonably have been expected to furnish any independent pedigree in support of his own case. The most he could be expected to do was to adduce whatever evidence he could in order to meet the evidence led by the plaintiff in support of the pedigree upon which he relied. The learned Subordinate Judge came to the conclusion that on the evidence both oral and documentary the plaintiff had succeeded in showing that he was at the time when this suit was filed the eldest of all living collateral relations of Basant Singh. So far as this finding is concerned we are not disposed to differ from it. We think that although the evidence led by the plaintiff is open to a good deal of suspicion, considering the fact that it has proceeded from witnesses who admittedly are deeply interested in the result of the case and some of whom at least are under the control or influence of the Taluqdar of Khajurgaon who, on the plaintiff's own admission, has been financing this litigation, it has been established that there is no collateral relative of Basant Singh in existence who is older than the plaintiff Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh. The Subordinate Judge, however, went further and held that Bisheshar Bakhsh is not only the eldest existing collateral relation of Basant Singh but that he is also descended in the senior line of kindred. It is upon this latter point principally that the learned Counsel for the respondent has challenged the judgment of the Court below. Before the issues were finally settled, it had been stated by the plaintiff's Counsel that as a matter of fact Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh was not only the eldest living relative of Basant Singh but was also the eldest descendant in the senior line; and when evidence came to be given on this question of relationship the witnesses who were put forward deposed to both these facts. One difficulty which lay in the way of the plaintiff was that in certain earlier cases pedigrees of the family of Basant Singh had been put forward which do not tally in all respects with the pedigree relied upon now. In particular there was put on record a pedigree which is marked Exhibit 148 and which was filed in certain litigation which took place in the year 1877. This document was put in by one Sheo Prasad and it was treated as being admissible evidence by the Subordinate Judge. In the pedigree attached to the present plaint we find that Chhatardhari Singh, who was the grandfather of the present plaintiff, had four sons. They are put down in the following order of age, namely, (1) Raghunath Singh (d. s. p.), (2) Sheodat Singh, (3) Dhaunkal Singh and (4) Udwat Singh. In the 1877 pedigree the sons of Chhatardhari Singh were put down in a different order. Dhaunkal Singh was shown as the eldest son, Udwat Singh as the second son, Sheodat Singh as the third son and Raghunath Singh as the next son. It may, of course, be that the different order in which the names of these sons appear in this latter pedigree is to some extent due to the former pedigree having been written in Hindi from left to right and not in Urdu from right to left. But even so it is apparent that the order in which Dhaunkal and Udwat are mentioned is different. Then we find that in the Bharkaspur case of which mention has frequently been made, a pedigree was put in by the present plaintiff Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh in which he was shown, not as the eldest son of his father Sheodat Singh, but as the middle son. This pedigree is Exhibit A 80 and shows the three sons of Sheodat Singh in the following order, —(1) Jagmohan Singh, (2) Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh and (3) Sheo Shankar Singh. In the pedigree now before us the order is (1) Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh, (2) Jagmohan Singh and (3) Sheo Shankar Singh. It is true that Jagmohan Singh died before the present suit was brought. His son Randhir Singh is still alive and he has a grandson Gaya Bakhsh Singh who appeared in Court as plaintiff's witness No. 15. It is a curious fact that there should be this difference in the order of naming the sons of Sheodat Singh in the two pedigrees. Five of the witnesses including the plaintiff himself, who were examined in this case in support of the pedigree set out in the plaint, were examined in the Bharkaspur case and on that occasion they all supported the pedigree which was then put forward and in which Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh was shown as the middle one of the three sons of Sheodat Singh. The depositions of these witnesses given in the earlier suit are upon the record, and it is quite clear that the statements which they then made do not tally with the statements made now regarding the respective seniority of the three sons of Sheodat Singh. It is true, as has been pointed out by the Court below, that these witnesses were not cross examined with reference to their statements. The plaintiff himself attempted to give some explanation of the discrepancy between the pedigree then put forward and that upon which he now relies,—an explanation which is altogether unsatisfactory and which could not possibly be accepted. He tries to make out now that the pedigree he gave in the earlier case must have been written wrongly by the Pleader to whom he gave the original document. The futility of this explanation is apparent when we find that in the earlier suit

Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh himself recited the whole of the pedigree in the course of his deposition and made it agree with the pedigree attached to the plaint in that suit. The other witnesses who were called in that case and who have been called in the present case did the same thing, and all we can say is that the difference between the statements then made and those which have been made now cannot be explained in any manner which satisfies us. In dealing with this part of the case the Subordinate Judge observes that the difference no doubt looks striking, but he gets over the difficulty by saying that the point of Bisheshar Bakhsh Singh's seniority was not material in the previous case and that might account for the difference. It seems to us that this cannot be treated as an adequate explanation of the discrepancy. It is not, as far as we are aware, the practice of parties who depose to pedigrees to recite the names in a promiscuous order. On the contrary our experience is that names are always given in a fixed order, and this would seem to be inevitable when it is considered how these pedigrees have to be learnt. A pedigree which does not set out the various degrees of relationship in a fixed systematic order would be of no value at all. We cannot, therefore, help feeling that for the purposes of the present case a deliberate attempt has been made to show, for some reason or other best known to the plaintiff, that he belongs to the most senior branch of the relatives of Basant Singh descended from a common ancestor. If anything in the case turned upon this question of his belonging to the senior branch we should feel ourselves bound to hold, disagreeing with the Court below, that the plaintiff had failed to establish this proposition.

We have now expressed our opinion upon the various points which were raised for consideration in this appeal and the result is that we affirm the decision of the Court below. The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

APPEAL FROM ORIGINAL DECREE No. 370 OF 1915.

January 21, 1918.

Present:—Mr. Justice Fletcher and Justice Sir Shamsul Huda, KT.

Srimati SAIDUNNESSA PLAINTIFF—APPELLANT

versus

TEJENDRA CHANDRA DHAR AND OTHERS —DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Court-Fees Act (VII of 1870), s. 7 (iv) (c)—Suit for declaratory decree and injunction—Court-fee payable—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 149—Deficient Court-fee—Extension of time to make up deficiency—Discretion of Court.

The plaint in a case in which the plaintiff not only asks for a declaration of rights but also prays for perpetual injunction restraining the defendant from putting in execution a particular decree is chargeable with ad valorem Court-fee under section 7 (iv) (c) of the Court Fees Act. [p. 399, col. 1.]

Where insufficient Court-fee has been paid on a memorandum of appeal, the Court will not in its discretion under section 149 of the Civil Procedure Code allow the deficiency to be made up on the day of the hearing unless it is satisfied that some grounds exist for the exercise of its discretion, of these grounds the principal one is that a bona fide mistake was made. [p. 399, cols. 1 & 2.]

Appeal against the decree of the Officiating Additional Subordinate Judge, Chittagong, dated the 30th of June 1915.

FACTS appear from the judgment.

Sir Rash Behari Ghose (with him Babus Dhirendra Lall Kastagir and Tarakeswar Nath Mitter), for the Respondents, raised a preliminary objection to the maintainability of the appeal for insufficiency of Court-fees paid on the memo. of appeal. The memo. of appeal was filed with a Court-fee of Rs. 10, although in the plaint the plaintiff prayed for a declaratory decree with consequential relief, viz., an injunction restraining the defendants from executing a decree of the Court. Article 17 (iii) of the Second Schedule of the Court Fees Act does not apply to suits of this nature, and so the appeal is not maintainable unless ad valorem Court-fee is paid.

Babu Probodh Coomar Das, for the Appellant, submitted that the appellant who was very poor could not pay the whole amount of Court-fee at the time of filing the memo. of appeal, but he was ready to pay the requisite Court-fee, if the Court, using its discretion under section 149 of the Civil Procedure Code, allowed it to be paid then.

JUDGMENT.

FLETCHER, J.—A preliminary objection has been taken to the hearing of this appeal on the ground that the appellant has not paid the appropriate Court-fee. The Court-fee paid on the memo. of appeal was a Court-fee of Rs. 10 only and it was paid with a distinct statement on the memo. of appeal which the learned Vakil for the appellant tells us was added subsequently—although the memo. does not show on what date that addition was made—that the fee payable was under Article 17 (iii) of Schedule II to the Court Fees Act. Now, Article 17 (iii) of Schedule II to the Court Fees Act states that on a plaint or memo. of appeal to obtain a declaratory decree where no consequential relief is prayed the fee payable is Rs. 10. The plaint in this case as amended in the Court below shows that that was not the nature of the present suit. Not only three declarations were asked for, but the plaintiff prayed for a perpetual injunction. It is quite clear that that is not a suit for declaratory decree where no consequential relief is prayed. Consequential relief was prayed in this case and it was the main relief, namely, an injunction restraining the defendants from putting in execution a particular decree of the Court. It seems to me quite clear, both on the authorities of this Court and on the wording of the Article of the Court-Fees Act, that the memo. of appeal in the present case was chargeable with an ad valorem fee. The question is whether any ground has been shown on which we ought to permit the deficit Court-fee to be paid now under the provisions of section 149, Code of Civil Procedure. It is quite clear that the appellant has not got the right to pay it now because the words used in the section are that "the Court may in its discretion;" and, before the Court exercises its discretion, the appellant has got to satisfy us that some grounds exist on which the Court ought to exercise its discretion. Amongst those I take it that the principal ground is that a bona fide mistake was made. We have heard the statement of the learned Vakil who appears for the appellant and we are not satisfied that a bona fide mistake was made. That being so, we are not prepared to exercise the discretion that section 149, Code of Civil Procedure, confers on us, to permit the payment of the deficit Court-fee now. In that view, the appeal is incompetent and must be dismissed with costs.

SHAMSUL HUDA, J.—I agree.

Appeal rejected.

Registration Act (XVI of 1908) s. 28—Place of registration—Jurisdiction of Registrar—Transferor not entitled to property—Transfer ostensible—Burden of proof.

In the absence of fraud on the part of the transferee and collusion between him and the transferor, the mere fact that the transferor has no title to that portion of the property which is situated within the jurisdiction of the Registrar is not a bar to the Registrar's jurisdiction to register the document. Where a party alleges that a document to which he put his signature in token of resigning an interest does not contain a correct statement of the facts and of the intention of the parties, the burden of proving his allegation lies on such party. [p. 400, col. 2.]

Messrs. Pugh, P. R. Dass, Chandra Sekhar Bannerjee and Rai Tribhuan Nath Sahai, for the Respondents in No. 163 of 1916.

JUDGMENT.—The facts of these cases have been fully and clearly stated in the judgment of the learned Subordinate Judge. It is sufficient for the purposes of the appeals to reproduce only a part of the narrative given in his judgment. The appellants in Appeal No. 141 are Musammat Ram Dei and her lessees, proprietors of the Motipur concern. The respondent is Chandra Bali Bibi, who derives her interest from a deed of sale executed in her favour by Jeona Bahu. Ram Kishen Joshi and others are the appellants in Appeal No. 163. Musammat Ram Dei is the widow of Radha Kishen. Radha Kishen was the son of Bal Kishen. On the death of Bal Kishen there was a dispute regarding the succession, and this, so far as Musammat Jeona Bahu the widow and Radha Kishen the son were concerned, was settled in 1889 by an agreement by which four annas of the villages in dispute was given to her absolutely and three annas given to her as life-estate. A payment in cash was also to be made by Radha Kishen. Before this payment in cash was made Radha Kishen died. A new agreement was then executed in 1890 between Ram Dei and Jeona Bahu, whereby the payment which was to have been made by Radha Kishen was abandoned and the widows took to themselves each an absolute interest in four annas of the property in dispute. On the death of Jeona Bahu, Ram Dei claimed to be the heir-at-law under the Mayukha School. The Joshis claimed to be her heirs under a Will executed by her. Under the former claim Ram Dei executed a mokarrari patta of the eight annas of the villages in dispute in favour of the Motipur concern. Chandra Bali's kabala is limited to a four-annas share of the villages in dispute. The remaining four annas is claimed by the Joshis. The whole eight annas is in the possession of the Motipur concern. Chandra Bali and the Joshis, therefore, instituted separate suits each in respect of the four-annas share alleged to be theirs.

The issues framed in the Court below were eleven in number. The contest in this Court centres round two issues only. Firstly, whether the ekrarnama or agreement made between Ram Dei and Jeona Bahu was intended to be an operative transaction or was a mere device to defeat the claim of third parties and not intended to be operative. Secondly, whether by reason of a substantial flaw in registration the deed of sale executed by Jeona Bahu in favour of Chandra Bali is void as against the party in actual possession. The learned Subordinate Judge decided that the agreement made in Ram Dei's favour was intended to be operative and conveyed a title in four annas of the property. He also decided that there was no flaw in the registration of the deed in favour of Chandra Bali. He, therefore, declared her entitled to the remaining four annas of the property. Ram Dei and the Motipur concern, therefore, appeal against that part of the decree which maintains Chandra Bali's title, and the Joshis appeal against that part of the decree which maintains Ram Dei's title.

On the first point the burden of proof in cases such as this is on the litigant who alleges that a document to which he put his signature in token of resigning an interest does not contain a correct statement of the facts and of the intentions of the parties. The same rule applies to a representative-in-interest of a signatory to such a document. The first link in the chain of evidence on such a question of fact is a set of circumstances showing that the transferor had a motive for making an ostensible abandonment of a part of his rights without consideration. The next link is a relationship between the parties to the document, and the probability that a fictitious transfer should be made in favour of the ostensible transferee. It is certain that the quarrel between Radha Kishen and Jeona Bahu was a real quarrel. There is no reasonable probability that a wholly fictitious agreement was made between Radha Kishen and Jeona Bahu It is not reasonable to suppose that the widow of Radha Kishen would on his death have abandoned all benefits that might be derived by her from this agreement. Nor is it reasonably probable that Jeona Bahu would have put into the hands of the widow of one who had formerly been her enemy, who herself might at any time again be her enemy, a weapon which could be used against her. There could be no reason for any deliberate cloud upon the title of Jeona Bahu to the property affected by the agreement, for at that time Jeona was undoubtedly in possession of the whole of that property and her title has never since been contested. On the outstanding probabilities of the case it is unlikely that this agreement was fictitious. There is, moreover, a very considerable body of evidence to show that Jeona Bahu intended it to be operative. As the learned Subordinate Judge has pointed out, there is no reason to doubt that Jeona Bahu herself both in 1901 and in 1902, eleven and twelve years after the agreement, made statements on oath admitting Ram Dei's title in this property. She also wrote letters which he believed to be genuine, to Ram Dei again admitting her title in 1904 and 1905. The arguments adduced on behalf of the Joshis to support the theory that the agreement was not a genuine agreement have in them little substance when weighed against the general probabilities and these direct admissions. We are of opinion that Suit No. 278 was rightly dismissed and dismiss Appeal No. 163 with costs.

The ground upon which it is urged that there was a flaw in the proceedings in the registration of Chandra Bali's document is that it was registered at Benares, and contains in the schedule of properties conveyed a garden in Benares which was not at the time of the execution of the document the property of the transferor. The learned Subordinate Judge does not seem to us to have considered the issue whether as a fact this garden house was in Jeona Bahu's possession at the time of the registration He finds only that the existence of the garden has been clearly proved and that it was at one time in Jeona Bahu's possession. He considers this finding to be sufficient to ensure the jurisdiction of the office at Benares to register the document We agree with the finding that the garden was in existence at the time of the registration. We agree also that it was at one time a part of the property of Jeona Bahu, but from the evidence of the witness called by Chandra Bali to prove specifically the possession of Jeona Bahu at the time of registration there can be no doubt that before that registration the properties had passed out of the possession of Jeona Bahu. Damodar Bhardoaji, witness No. 12 for the plaintiffs says that all Bal Kishen's properties in Benares were sold off before he attained discretion. His age is now 42.

We do not understand the decision in Barendra Lal Roy Chowdhuri v. Hari Dasi Debi (1) to be authority for the proposition that a flaw in the vendor's title in the only part of the property in the jurisdiction of the Benares office would be a bar to its registration there. The decision was based on the finding that the only property purporting to give the Registrar jurisdiction had no existence at all. The decision in Broja Gopal Mukherjee v. Abinash Chandra Biswas (2) is direct authority for the proposition that in the absence of fraud on the part of the transferee, and collusion between transferor and transferee, the mere fact that the transferor had no title would not be a bar to the Registrar's jurisdiction. With this decision we are in agreement. There is nothing to indicate any fraud on the part of Chandra Bali, or collusion between her and Jeona Bahu to deceive the Registrar. We therefore, hold that Suit No. 276 was rightly decreed and that Appeal No. 141 should be dismissed with costs.

RAMCHANDRA JAGANNATH —PLAINTIFF

THE GREAT INDIAN PENINSULA RAILWAY CO.—DEFENDANTS.

Railways Act (IX of 1890), s. 75—"Value", "loss," meanings of—Carrier, duty of—Misdelivery, effect of—Damages, suit for.

The term "value of the articles" in sections 75 of the Railways Act means intrinsic or market value, i.e., the price for which they would reasonably sell at the time in the market as well as the value in the market, independent of any circumstances peculiar to the plaintiff [p 404, col 2.]

The loss for which a Railway Company is protected from liability by section 75 of the Railways Act must be loss to the Railway Company itself and it must be loss which occurs while the goods are in the custody of the Company in their capacity as carriers, and cannot apply to a loss to the owner. Negligent misdelivery of goods to a person other than the owner is not such a loss as is contemplated by section 75 of the Railways Act. [p. 405, col. 1.]

Whether the goods are to be delivered to the consignee at his house or at the termination of the journey depends on agreement and on the usual course of business. If the goods are delivered at the house to which they are addressed, the carrier has done all he contracted to do and the mere fact that he delivers to some other person than the consignee at that house is no proof of breach of duty on his part. But if he delivers at any other place to any person other than the consignee, he does so at his peril. But where the carrier is not bound to deliver at the house of the consignee, his liability as carrier ceases when he has brought the goods to the station of destination and has tendered or delivered them within a reasonable time to the consignee or has allowed the consignee reasonable time in which to remove the goods. [p. 405, col. 2.]

Plaintiff delivered 24 account books to the defendant Railway Company for carriage to Nagpur. The books arrived safely at Nagpur but were negligently delivered to some person other than the consignee. The intrinsic value of the books was below Rs. 100. The plaintiff sued the defendant Company for 25,000 as damages for the loss of the books:

Held, that the defendant's liability was not saved by section 75 of the Railways Act, inasmuch as (a) the intrinsic value of the books was below Rs. 100, and (b) the loss occurred not while the books were in the custody of the defendant Company as carriers, but after their arrival at their destination. [p. 404, col. 2; p. 405, col. 2.]

FACTS.—This was a suit filed by the plaintiff against the defendant Company claiming from them Rs. 25,000 as damages on account of the loss of a parcel containing 24 account books caused to the plaintiff by its wrongful delivery by the Railway Company to another person (i. e., the person other than the consignee). The plaintiff was a resident of Nagpur and was doing the agency business of the Bombay. Dyeing and Manufacturing Company at Nagpur. On the 16th of September 1916 he consigned a parcel of 24 account books relating to the agency business from Victoria Terminus to be delivered to his firm at Nagpur. The parcel arrived at Nagpur Station on the 18th of September. The parcel was, however, through the mistake of one of the railway clerks there wrongly delivered to the Superintendent of the Central Jail at Nagpur. The mistake was not discovered till the 22nd of September, when it was ascertained that the books of account had been destroyed by the Jail Authorities. The misdelivery of the plaintiff's parcel to the Superintendent of the Central Jail at Nagpur arose under the following circumstances. The Jail Authorities expected a parcel of old forms from Khandwa for the purpose of being destroyed. The railway receipt in respect of the plaintiff's parcel bore the same number as the receipt in respect of the Khandwa parcel, so that when a peon of the Nagpur Central Jail went to take delivery of the Khandwa parcel, the railway clerk who was in charge of the parcel department looked at the receipt and without reading the address on any of the parcels pointed out the plaintiff's parcel to the peon and told him to take the same.

The plaintiff alleged that the books were the only account books they had containing the dealings of his firm and they were the only source from which he could ascertain the debtors of the firm. He charged the defendants with negligence and sued to recover Rs. 25,000 from them by way of damages in respect thereof.

The defendants inter alia contended that they were not liable to the plaintiff by reason of the provision of section 75 of the Indian Railways Act. That section provided that when any articles mentioned in the Second Schedule of the Act were contained in any parcel or package delivered to a railway administration for carriage by railway, and the value of such articles in the parcel or package exceeded Rs. 100, the railway administration was not to be responsible for the loss, destruction or deterioration of the parcel or package unless the person sending or delivering the parcel caused its value and contents to be declared at the time of his delivery to the railway. The articles mentioned in the Second Schedule clause (i), included maps, writings, and title-deeds. The books of account fell within the meaning of the word "writing" and as the plaintiff had failed to declare the value of the parcel at the time of its delivery and as it was of the value of more than Rs. 100, the railway company was protected from liability to the plaintiff by reason of section 75 of the Act.

The suit was accordingly placed on board for trial of the preliminary issue, whether under the above circumstances the railway company was protected from liability by reason of section 75 of the Act.

Mr. C. H. Setalvad (with him the Hon'ble Mr. M. A. Jinnah), for the Plaintiff, contended that the "value of the goods" in section 75 meant the market value or its intrinsic value. He admitted it was a "writing" within the meaning of that word in the Second Schedule. But the value of the books qua books was less than Rs. 100 and, therefore, the plaintiff was not bound to declare their value at the time of their delivery. The account books when bought were of the approximate value of Rs. 70 or so. After being written on their saleable value in the market became considerably diminished. They could only be sold as so much waste paper. The loss consequential to plaintiff by reason of the destruction of the books was a different matter. But that did not in any way enhance its value. An autograph letter of a great personage, e.g., of Lord Nelson was no doubt a " writing " and the value of it would certainly be more than Rs. 100. That was because of its intrinsic value. It could be sold in the market and its market value would certainly be more than Rs. 100.

Counsel further contended that even if it be held that the value of the books as such was more than Rs. 100, his submission was that the section only applied to goods in transit. In the present case the goods had reached their destination, viz., the station, and from that moment the goods in the hands of the Company remained with them as bailees. The whole object of the Act seemed to be to protect railway companies against undue responsibility and risks as public carriers while they were doing duty as public carriers. The protection only extended to them while the goods were being carried on their lines. After the parcel had reached its destination, they were on no better footing than ordinary bailees. Counsel then cited various authorities in support of his above contentions.

Mr. H. Campbell (with him the Hon'ble Mr. T. J. Strangman), for the Defendant company, urged that the section covered goods which were articles of special value. The company was protected against all liabilities in case of loss of goods of the value of more than Rs. 100, the value being on the basis of their real value to the consignor. The use of the words " map ", " title-deeds " supported that argument. The value of the books of account in the present case was considerably over Rs. 100. The words "value" and " contents " in the same section also supported his contention. As to the point that the exemption of the Company only applied to goods while they were being carried on the line, or in transit, that contention could not prevail. It would be reading in the section the words " in transit " after each of the words " loss, destruction or deterioration. " The Railways Act was a special enactment and where there was a special enactment, it excluded the common law of carriers as prevailing in England. The goods, moreover, were carried not only for the purpose of being consigned to the station but were also to be delivered and in delivering the railway company were still carriers. There were cases which showed from what time the commencement of the liability of the railway company arose and that the liability continued till delivery of the goods. The test was, when did the risk commence and when did it end. Then again it was not a case of loss but a case of destruction and no wilful destruction was alleged.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff in this suit claims from the defendant Railway Company Rs. 25,000 as damages. It appears that on 16th September 1916 the plaintiff delivered to the defendant Railway Company at the Victoria Terminus Station a parcel containing 24 account books consigned to the plaintiff's firm at Nagpur for carriage from the Victoria Terminus Station to Nagpur. It appears that on or about the 21st September 1916 the plaintiff's agent presented the Railway receipt and claimed delivery of the parcel in question, but he was informed by the defendant Company's agent that the parcel belonging to the plaintiff had been received at Nagpur but the same had by mistake been delivered to a representative of the Superintendent of the Central Jail at Nagpur and it was afterwards ascertained that the Jail Authorities had practically all the account books contained in that parcel.

The defendants say that the account books were writings within the meaning of the Second Schedule to the Indian Railways Act, 1890, and that as the plaintiff claims more than Rs. 100 in this suit and that as neither the plaintiff nor the person sending or delivering the parcel to the defendant Company caused its value or contents to be declared or declared them at the time of the delivery as required by section 75 of the Indian Railways Act, they by virtue of the provisions of the said section are not responsible for the loss or destruction of the parcel or the account books. Hence the present suit.

RAMCHANDRA JAGANNATH v. G. I. P. RAILWAY CO.

Pursuant to the consent chamber order, dated 20th December 1917, this suit appeared before me for the trial of the preliminary issue, viz., "whether the defendants are protected from liability to the plaintiff under section 75 of the Indian Railways Act, 1890."

The material portion of section 75 runs as follows:—"When any articles mentioned in the Second Schedule are contained in any parcel or package delivered to a railway administration for carriage by railway, and the value of such articles in the parcel or package exceeds one hundred rupees, the railway administration shall not be responsible for the loss, destruction or deterioration of the parcel or package unless the person sending or delivering the parcel or package to the administration caused its value and contents to be declared or declared them at the time of the delivery of the parcel or package for carriage by railway and if so required by the administration, paid or engaged to pay a percentage on the value so declared by way of compensation for increased risk."

It is conceded by Mr. Setalvad for the plaintiff that the account books are included in the term "writings" mentioned in item (I) of the Second Schedule to the Indian Railways Act, 1890 Mr. Setalvad for the plaintiff states that the value of the account books in question does not exceed Rs. 100, therefore, section 75 of the Indian Railways Act, 1890, has no application to the present case and further contends that even if the value exceeds Rs. 100, section 75 does not exempt the Railway Company from liability for the loss of the account books that has occurred by delivery of the parcel to a wrong person. The first question, therefore, to determine is, "does the value of the articles in the parcel, viz., the 24 account books exceed Rs. 100? From the evidence recorded it appears that these books of accounts when purchased cost the plaintiff between Rs. 60 and 70 and that if these had been sold either when they were delivered at the Victoria Terminus Station or when they reached Nagpur would have fetched only a few rupees as waste paper. It is contended by the Counsel for the plaintiff that the term "value" in section 75 means intrinsic value or the market value of the articles, and not a fancy value which a person sending or delivering a parcel or package puts on the articles in it. The word "value" is unfortunately not defined in the Act. It is clear to my mind that the term "value of the articles" does not mean cost of the articles, for if the Legislature intended that term "value" meant "cost" it could have easily used the word cost instead of the word value. It seems to me, however, that we get some indication as to what the Legislature intended the word "value" to mean, if we look to the nature of the articles mentioned in the Second Schedule to the Act. The articles are gold, silver, plated articles, pearls, precious stones, jewels, watches, Government securities, hundis, bills of exchange, paintings, silks, etc., and if we bear in mind the object of section 75, which is that the railway administration receiving the expected article, may be apprised of its nature in order that it may give a proportionate degree of protection and that as it incurs an additional danger and risk, it should have an increased compensation, it is clear that articles with which the Legislature is dealing are valuable articles whose intrinsic value is appreciable in the market. I, therefore, hold that value of the articles in section 75 means intrinsic value of the articles, i. e., market value, i. e., the price for which they would reasonably sell at the time in the market as well as the value in the market independently of any circumstances peculiar to the plaintiff. I am fortified in this opinion by the cases of Stoessiger v. South Eastern Railway Co. (1) and Blankensee v. London and North Western Railway Co. (2). The result is that the preliminary issue must be found in the negative and against the defendants. But assuming that the interpretation I have put upon the term "value" is erroneous and that the value of the account books in question exceeds Rs. 100 by adding something for the written portion contained in them and that the person sending or delivering the parcel was bound to declare its value and contents and did not do so and the loss occurred, then the question for determination is: "Does section 75 of the Indian Railways Act, 1890, give absolute protection to the Railway Company for loss under every circumstance?" Mr. Setalvad for the plaintiff has contended that section 75 does not apply to a case of loss by misdelivery and that the application of the section must be limited to the loss which occurs in their capacity as carriers, and that once the goods reach its destination safely, the capacity of the Railway Company as carriers ceases and that thereafter they hold them as bailees, and that loss under section 75 means loss to the Railway Company and not loss to the owner. In my opinion loss, on the true construction of section 75, is a loss by the carrier such as by abstraction by a stranger or by his own servants or by losing them from vehicles in the course of carriage or by mislaying them so as not to know where to find them and the like. It includes temporary as well as permanent loss. I, therefore, hold that on the true construction of section 75 of the Indian Railways Act, 1890, loss for which a Railway Company is protected from liability must be loss to the Railway Company itself, and it must be loss which occurs while the goods are in their custody as carriers and cannot apply to a loss to the owner, and this is clear from Hearn v. London and South Western Railway Co. (3), where it was held that the loss or injury to goods against which a career is protected by 11 Geo. IV and I Will 4, C. 68 (which is practically in the same terms as section 75) is a loss by the carrier of the articles committed to him or injury to them whilst in his care, and not a loss sustained by the owner in consequence of non delivery of the articles in due time or altogether, or the loss of the use of the articles by him. I think the interpretation put on the word "loss" by Chatterji, J., in Changa Mal v. Bengal N. W. Railway Co. (4) is correct, where he held that negligent misdelivery of goods to a person other than the owner is not such a loss of goods within the meaning of section 75. The following authorities were cited at the Bar: Heugh v. London and N. W. Railway Co. (5), M'Kean v. McIver (6), Stephenson v. Hart (7), Millen v. Brasch (8), Morritt v. North Eastern Railway Co. (9). After giving the best consideration to them, the principles deducible from these authorities are that whether the goods are to be delivered to the consignee at his house or at the termination of the journey depends on agreement and on the usual course of business. If the goods are delivered at the house to which they are addressed, the carrier has done all he contracted to do and the mere fact that he delivers to some other person than the consignee at that house is no proof of breach of duty on his part. But if he delivers at any other place to any person other than the consignee, he does so at his peril. But where the carrier is not bound to deliver at the house of the consignee, his liability as carrier ceases when he has brought the goods to the station of destination and has tendered or delivered them within a reasonable time to the consignee or has allowed the consignee reasonable time in which to remove the goods. What that time is must depend upon the circumstances of each particular case.

In this case the parcel arrived at Nagpur safely and was delivered by the agent of the Railway Company to a person other than the consignee and as the loss occurred after delivery to the wrong person, I hold that section 75 of the Indian Railways Act offers no protection to the defendant Company and, therefore, the preliminary issue must be found against the defendants and in the negative. Costs of the hearing of the preliminary issue will be costs in the cause.

Order accordingly.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 115, O. XXIII, r. 1—Withdrawal of suit with liberty to bring fresh suit—Formal defect—Revision—High Court, whether can interfere with order allowing withdrawal.

The High Court has power to interfere in revision with an order of a lower Court allowing the plaintiff to withdraw his suit with permission to bring a fresh suit. [p. 407, col. 2.]

Where the defendant sets up a plea that there is a formal defect in the plaint, the Court has jurisdiction to pass an order under Order XXIII, rule 1, of the Civil Procedure Code. [p. 407, col. 2.]

Civil revision from an order of the District Judge, Shahabad, dated the 24th March 1917.

FACTS.—The plaintiff brought a suit for redemption of two mortgages in favour of defendent No. 1. It was alleged that the mortgagee had wrongfully and fraudulently caused the entry of the name of defendants Nos. 2 and 3 in the khatian as tenants of the lands hypothecated in the two mortgages, that defendants Nos. 2 and 3 were never the tenants of the lands and that the lands were zirat of the plaintiffs. The plaintiff, therefore, prayed for khas possession of the lands after redemption. The defendants Nos. 2 and 3 pleaded that the lands were not zirat but were their occupancy holdings hence they could not be ejected. They further pleaded that the suit was bad for misjoinder of parties and causes of action. The first Court decreed the suit as against the mortgagee defendant but dismissed the suit as against defendants Nos. 2 and 3. Against this decision the plaintiffs appealed to the District Judge and the mortgagee defendant filed a cross-appeal. On the date of hearing the plaintiffs applied to the Appellate Court to withdraw the suit with liberty to institute a fresh suit on the grounds (1) that there was a formal defect in the suit, (2) that the plaintiffs wanted to produce some documentary evidence by which they hoped to successfully establish their case as against defendants Nos. 2 and 3 and which they could not produce before. The Appellate Court allowed the plaintiffs to withdraw the suit with liberty to bring fresh suit as against defendants Nos. 2 and 3 on condition of their paying costs to those defendants.

Against the aforesaid order defendants Nos. 2 and 3 applied to the High Court in revision.

Mr. Parmeshwor Dayal, for the Opposite Party, raised a preliminary objection and submitted that the applicants were not entitled to get the order of the Court below set aside in revision. This Court could interfere under section 115, Civil Procedure Code, in a matter where the Court below had decided the case between the parties. Allowing a party to withdraw a suit with liberty to bring a fresh suit is no decision of the dispute between the parties.

He relied on Bansi Singh v. Kishun Lall Thakur (1) and further cited Mohammad Ayub v. Mohammad Mahmood (2), His Highness The Nizam of Hyderabad, In re (3) which he submitted supported his contention in principle.

Mr. Jagar Nath Prasad, for the Applicants, contended that the application for leave made by the opposite party disclosed no valid ground for granting permission to withdraw. The plaintiff wanted to withdraw so that he might find an opportunity to produce fresh evidence which he did not produce before. There was no sufficient ground within the meaning of Order XXIII, rule 1, to enable the plaintiffs to withdraw with permission to bring another suit. Discovery of new evidence without any allegation and proof that it could not be discovered previously on diligent search was legally no ground for permission to withdraw with liberty to sue again. Moreover, the Court below having assigned no reason for granting the leave, the order was illegal.

Mr. Parmeshwor Dayal contended that in this case there was a defect of misjoinder of parties and causes of action. The suit was a suit for redemption against the mortgagee, the plaintiffs could not implead in this suit defendants Nos. 2 and 3 who were mere tenants and eject them. The defendants Nos. 2 and 3,

(1) 26 Ind. Cas. 203; 41 C. 632.
(2) 6 Ind. Cas. 831; 32 A. 623; 7 A. L. J. 741.
(3) 9 M. 256; 3 Ind. Dec. (N. S.) 575.

had nothing to do so with the mortgage. The prayer for redemption as against defendant No. 1 and that for ejectment against defendants Nos. 2 and 3 were two distinct reliefs based on two distinct causes of action. The Court below was justified in allowing the plaintiff to withdraw his suit with liberty to bring a fresh suit within limitation.

Misjoinder of parties and causes of action is a formal defect which is sufficient ground for withdrawal under Order XXIII, rule 1 of the Civil Procedure Code. The defendants had taken the plea of defect of misjoinder of parties in the written statement, it is on account of that plea that the case was withdrawn. It is not open to them now in this Court to say that there was no formal defect in the suit. It is for this formal defect that the Court below granted the plaintiff leave to withdraw the suit. The Court was not bound to give its reasons for its order under Order XXIII, rule 1.

Mr. Jagar Nath Prasad replied.

JUDGMENT.—The facts of this case are that the opposite party before us were plaintiffs in an action framed so as to include relief sought against mortgagees from whom redemption was claimed by the plaintiffs and also against tenants who, it was alleged, had been inducted on to the lands by the mortgagees. The Cout of first instance found that the tenant defendants were in fact ancient cultivators who did not derive their tenancies from the mortgagees. He dismissed the suit against the tenant defendants and made a decree as against the mortgagees giving a right to redeem on certain terms; he also awarded costs against the mortgagees.

From this decree the opposite party appealed to the District Court. The mortgagee defendants put in a cross-objection to the costs allowed in the Court below. The tenant defendants put in a cross-appeal on the ground that the whole action should have been dismissed for misjoinder of causes. Upon this the opposite party filed an application to withdraw his suit on the ground that there were "some formal defects." We must admit that we gather generally from the petition for leave to withdraw from the suit that it was made rather on the ground that there had been an omission to put upon the record in the Court of first instance certain important documents which were in his possession than on the ground that the suit must fail by reason of a formal defect in the plaint. Leave was given to withdraw with permission to bring a fresh suit upon the same cause of action subject to payment of the full costs of the suit and of the appeal to the tenant defendants before the institution of the fresh suit.

By the opposite party before us it is contended that we have no power to revise the order made, on the ground that leave given to withdraw the suit is not a case within the meaning of that section. A solitary decision, Bansi Singh v. Kishun Lall Thakur (1), is quoted in support of this contention. With great respect to the learned Judges who decided that case we are of opinion that it is not in accordance with the established practice of every Court in India including the Calcutta High Court itself. There are innumerable cases in which the High Court has interfered in cases precisely similar to the one before us. It is sufficient to quote in this connection Kharda Co. Ld. v. Durga Charan Chandra (4) and the cases referred to therein.

On the merits, however, we are of opinion that the application has failed. It is not for us to say whether the Court below did really give leave to withdraw because the case had not been proved in the lower Court, or whether at the back of its mind there was a feeling that there had been a formal defect in the suit. From the moment that the defendants Nos. 2 and 3 alleged in their cross-appeal that the suit must fail in appeal owing to a formal defect in the pleadings, the Court had jurisdiction to pass any order it pleased under Order XXIII, rule 1. We, therefore, dismiss this application with costs, hearing fee two gold mohurs.

Appeal dismissed.

Hindu Law—Reversioner, right of, nature of—Guardian of minor reversioner, whether can bind his interest.

A Hindu reversioner has no right or interest in præsenti in the property which a female owner holds for her life, until it vests in him on her death, should he survive her. Till that time he has nothing to assign or to relinquish or even to transmit to his heirs His right becomes concrete only on her demise; until then it is a mere spes successionis. His guardian, if he happens to be a minor, cannot bargain with it on his behalf or bind him by any contractual engagement in respect thereto. [p. 410, col. 2; p. 411, col. 1.]

A Hindu died leaving a widow R., a daughter K. and a daughter's son A. Mutation of his estate was effected in the name of his widow and on the latter's death in the name of his daughter K. His collaterals disputed K.'s right to succeed to his estate and the matter was referred to arbitration. K.'s husband represented K. and her son A., who was a minor, in the arbitration proceedings. Finally a compromise was arrived at and the arbitrators gave an award in the terms of the compromise. On K.'s death A. sued for the possession of the estate:

Held, that he was not bound by the award, inasmuch as his right at the time of the arbitration was a mere spes successionis which could not be dealt with on his behalf by his father. [p. 411, col. 1.]

Appeal from a judgment and decree of the Calcutta High Court, dated the 16th July 1913, reversing a decree of the Subordinate Judge, Patna, dated the 20th January 1909.

FACTS.—One Jhamman Singh died leaving a widow Radha Koer, a daughter Kar Koer and Amrit Narayan, the daughter's son, then a minor. The widow applied for mutation, but her application was opposed by the defendants, who were collateral relations of the deceased. Radha Koer's name was registered but she died in 1853. Disputes as to succession again arose, and Kar Koer and her husband Rajander Singh, father and guardian of the minor Amrit Narayan Singh, on the one side, and the defendants on the other executed an agreement to refer the matter to arbitration. But before the arbitrators could decide anything the parties entered into a compromise, which was placed before the arbitrators, and they were invited to make and did in fact make an award in accordance with the compromise. Under the compromise the properties in suit were awarded to the defendants. On the death of Kar Koer in 1905 the appellant Amrit Narayan brought the present suit to recover possession of these properties from the defendants. The Subordinate Judge found all the material issues in his favour and decreed the suit. He found that the plaintiff was not a party to the arbitration proceedings, that his father was not appointed his guardian under the provisions of Act XL of 1858, that the compromise and award were nullities and that the judgments of the District Judge and the High Court by which the award was made a decree of Court were not binding on the appellant. The defendants appealed to the High Court, which allowed the appeal and dismissed the suit.

Mr. De Gruyther, K. C., (with him Mr. B. Dube), for the Appellant.—Jhamman Singh was admittedly separate and the appellant was, therefore, entitled to inherit his estate. The suit was well within time under Article 141 of the Limitation Act, 1877. Article 95 of that Act does not apply. Plaintiff's claim was not barred by the proceedings in arbitration taken by his mother and father. There was really no arbitration. The award was based on the compromise which Kar Koer and Rajander Singh made. The appellant was not a party to the compromise and the same was made against his interest. The plaintiff did not possess any interest whatever in Jhamman Singh's estate during the lifetime of his mother. His right was merely spes successionis and was not transferable. In any case the Civil Courts which dealt with the award did not adjudicate upon the reversionary right of the plaintiff and the award was made a decree of Court against Kar Koer alone. Further section 3 of Act XL of 1858 was intended for the protection of minors, but Rajender Singh was not appointed guardian of the minor. Reference was made to the following:—

AMRIT NARAYAN SINGH v. GAYA SINGH.

Sham Sundar Lal v. Achhan Kunwar (1), Musammat Bibi Walian v. Banke Behari Pershad Singh (2), Nogendro Chundro Mittro v. Sreemutty Kishen Soondery Dossee (3).

Mr. A. M. Dunne, K. C., for the Respondents.—The plaintiff's mother represented the whole estate and the proceedings by which she sought to set aside the award were properly heard and decided and she failed. It was, therefore, a good judgment and was binding on the reversioners who succeeded the widow. Katama Natchiar v. Rajah of Shivagunga (4).

Further, the arbitrators decided the dispute by holding that the plaintiff and his mother had no interest according to the religious customs and usage of the parties. The minor was a party to the arbitration and the award was binding on him.

No reply was called for.

JUDGMENT.

MR. AMEER ALI.—This is a suit by a Hindu reversioner to recover possession of certain properties that originally belonged to his maternal grandfather, Jhamman Singh. He alleges that the defendants, respondents before this Board, wrongfully possessed themselves of these properties under colour of certain arbitration proceedings whilst the estate was held by his mother, Kar Koer, as a female owner under the Hindu Law. Kar Koer died in 1905, and this action was brought in 1908. The suit is, therefore, clearly within time. The sole question for determination in this appeal is whether the arbitration proceedings and the decree on the award which gave to the predecessors of the respondents possession of these properties are binding on the appellant.

On Jhamman's death Radha Koer, his widow, applied for the registration of her name in place of her deceased husband in the Collector's records. Her application was opposed by some of Jhamman's agnatic male relations, whom the respondents now represent; they claimed the property both under the general Hindu Law as also under some undefined family custom. Their objections were overruled by the Revenue Courts, and Radha Koer's name was duly entered in the Collector's register. Radha died shortly after in 1864, and was succeeded in the possession of the estate by her daughter, Kar Koer, the mother of the appellant. The agnates raised a fresh contest as to her right to hold the property. In the disputes that followed, and which were eventually referred to the arbitration of a number of caste-men, she seems to have been represented by her husband, Rajander Singh. There is nothing, however, on the record to show if he had any authority to act for her as her agent. Before the arbitrators had taken any action in the matter, a compromise was arrived at, in which also Rajander purported to act both for her and her infant son, the appellant. Under this compromise, Kar Koer abandoned, in favour of the agnates, all right to the immoveable property of her father, receiving on her part, besides some moveable property, two small fractional shares in certain lands which stood in her and in her mother's names. The effect of the arrangement was to extinguish completely the reversionary interest of the appellant in his grandfather's estate.

The compromise was placed before the arbitrators and they were invited to make an award in accordance therewith, which they did. It is to be noted that there is nothing on the record to show that the proceedings before the arbitrators ever came to the knowledge of Kar Koer or that she knew of the compromise and its effect. In fact, it appears that Kar Koer did not acquiesce in the award, and the opposite party had to apply to the Civil Court under the provisions of section 327 of Act X of 1859 (the law that regulated at the time the procedure of the Civil Courts in India) for a decree on the award. The Court of first instance held that all the proceedings in connection with the compromise and the award had been without Kar Koer's knowledge It accordingly dismissed the application of the agnates under section 327.

AMRIT NARAYAN SINGH v. GAYA SINGH.

They appealed to the District Judge, who apparently considered that as Rajander, her husband, was a party to the compromise, her denial could not be believed. He accordingly made a decree "to have the award filed and enforced under section 327." From this decision Kar Koer preferred a "special appeal" to the High Court of Calcutta, which was dismissed. She then applied for a review of judgment, in which she was equally unsuccessful. The result of these decisions was to put her out of possession of the properties covered by the compromise, and which form the subject-matter of the present action. Although the respondents or their predecessors appear to have obtained possession of these properties after the proceedings in the High Court, which terminated in 1865, their names were not registered in the Collectorate in substitution of Radha Koer until 1877.

It is to be noticed that neither in the judgment of the District Judge nor in that of the High Court is there any reference to the right of Kar Koer's infant son or to the effect of the compromise which culminated in the award on his reversionary interest. Had the question been presented in any shape to the Courts that were dealing with the matter, it is hardly likely their judgments would not have contained some expression as to whether the compromise and the award based thereon were or were not for the benefit of the reversioner.

In this action the plaintiff charged that the arbitration proceedings, together with the compromise and award, were fraudulent and taken and entered into without the knowledge or authority of Kar Koer; that in any event he was not bound by them. The defendants, on the other hand, among other pleas, urge that the award and decree precluded the plaintiff from maintaining the action. The Subordinate Judge of Patna, before whom the suit came for trial in the first instance, framed a number of issues on the several allegations of the parties, most of which have become immaterial in view of the shape the case took on appeal to the High Court. The Trial Judge, in a well-reasoned and exhaustive judgment, held in substance that Jhamman at the time of his death was separated from his agnates; that the defendants had failed to prove the custom they alleged relating to the exclusion of widows and daughters; and that the plaintiff was not properly represented in the arbitration proceedings or in the proceedings before the Civil Courts, and was not bound by the award or the decree based thereon. He accordingly decreed the plaintiff's claim.

From this decree the defendants appealed to the High Court of Calcutta, where the case proceeded on the assumption that Jhamman was separate from his agnates, and that assumption has not been challenged before this Board. The contest in the High Court turned solely on the binding effect of the award and the decree enforcing it on the rights of the infant reversioner.

The learned Judges state thus the questions they had to determine, viz:—

"(1) Whether Rajander Singh had power to refer the matter on behalf of his minor son to arbitration; (2) whether the plaintiff was properly represented in the proceedings in the Civil Court under section 327 of Act VIII of 1859; and (3) and if he was, whether he can now treat the decree, which was based on the award, as a nullity, and claim possession of these properties at this distance of time."

After answering the first two questions in the affirmative, the learned Judges decided the third against the plaintiff, and reversing the decree of the Subordinate Judge, dismissed the plaintiff's suit.

Their Lordships are unable to concur in the propositions on which the learned Judges of the High Court have based their judgment. With respect, in proceeding to consider, whether Rajander Singh, the plaintiff's father, had power to refer the matter on behalf of his minor son to arbitration, they seem to have misconceived the legal position of the infant under the Hindu Law. Evidently they thought he had a right which could form the subject of bargain. This is an obvious mistake; a Hindu reversioner has no right or interest in præsenti in the property which the female owner holds for her life. Until it vests in him on her death, should he survive her, he has nothing to assign or to relinquish, or even to transmit to his heirs. His right becomes concrete only on her demise; until then it is mere spes successionis. His guardian, if he happens to be a minor, cannot bargain with it on his behalf or bind him by any contractual engagement in respect thereto. Rajander's action, therefore, in referring to arbitration any matter connected with his son's reversionary interest was null and void.

The learned Judges seem also to have lost sight of the fact that the award actually made was based on the compromise; it gave effect to the agreement at which the parties had arrived. Even had the minor an existing right, the father would have no power to enter into an arrangement which wiped out all his interest without any consideration, for the little property that was left to Kar Koer was taken by her under the compromise, and not by virtue of her right to her father's estate. It is difficult to see how the learned Judges came to the conclusion that the compromise was to the benefit of the minor.

Apart from the question whether Rajander could represent his son under the proceedings under section 327 of Act VIII of 1859 without a certificate under section 3 of Act XL of 1858 on which their Lordships desire to express no opinion, it is abundantly clear that the Civil Courts did not purport in any shape or character to deal with or adjudicate upon the reversionary right of the infant. The decree enforcing the award was based on the finding that Kar Koer had acquiesced by her husband in the reference to arbitration, and that she had similarly consented to the compromise, and was, therefore, bound by the award. Beyond that the order of the District Judge, which was affirmed by the High Court, did not go; it affected her interest, and her interest only.

It may be noted here that on the appeal to the High Court the minor was not a party.

In the present appeal it has been attempted on behalf of the respondents to sustain the decree of the High Court on the basis of the dictum of the Judicial Committee in the well-known Shivagunga case [Katama Natchiar v. Rajah of Shivagunga (4)] where, dealing with the question under what circumstances a decree against the widow may bind the reversioners, the Board expressed itself thus:—

"That unless it could be shown that there had not been a fair trial of the right in that suit, or, in other words, unless that decree could have been successfully impeached on some special ground, it would have been an effectual bar to any new suit by any person claiming in succession to Angamootoo. For assuming her to be entitled to the zemindari at all, the whole estate would for the time be vested in her, absolutely for some purposes, though in some respects for a qualified interest; and until her death it could not be ascertained who would be entitled to succeed. The same principle which has prevailed in the Courts of this country as to tenants in tail representing the inheritance would seem to apply to the case of a Hindu widow; and it is obvious that there would be the greatest possible inconvenience in holding that the succeeding heirs were not bound by a decree fairly and properly obtained against the widow."

In the present case their Lordships think it enough to say that the proceedings culminating in the decree by which the plaintiff is sought to be bound are entirely devoid of the conditions on which and which alone a reversioner can be shut out from the assertion of his right, which comes to him altogether independently of the female owner.

Their Lordships are of opinion that the judgment and decree of the High Court should be reversed and the decree of the Subordinate Judge restored. And they will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly. The appellant will have his costs in the High Court and in this appeal.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXI, rr. 54, 90—Execution—Attachment—Sale proclamation, irregular—Under-valuation, effect of—Application to set aside sale—Conspicuous part of property, what is.

Where an under-valuation of the property to be sold made in the sale-proclamation is obviously a gross misrepresentation, the sale will be set aside. [p. 412, col. 2.]

Where a right of fishing which extended over 138 villages and the annual income realised from which was over Rs 1,000 was described in the sale proclamation merely by a tauzi number and a name, the value of the estate being given at Rs. 2,500, and it was sold for that sum:

Held, that the sale proclamation was materially irregular both in the description of the property and in the valuation put upon it and that for that reason alone the sale should be set aside. [p. 413, col. 2.]

Where the property to be sold consists of a right of fishing over a length of stream extending over several miles, it is not possible to say that any particular spot on the stream is a conspicuous part of the property within the meaning of rule 54 of Order XXI of the Code of Civil Procedure. In such circumstances the principle of the rule must be applied and a copy of the order must be conspicuously displayed at various portions of the estate In addition the sale should be advertised either in the local newspapers or in the Gazette. JUDGMENT.

CHAPMAN, J.—This is an appeal by the judgment-debtor. He applied to have an execution sale set aside upon the ground of material irregularity in publishing and conducting the sale. His application was refused by the Subordinate Judge and hence his appeal to this Court.

The property which has been sold is a right of fishing in a river which is partly silted up. This river flows through the thanas of Auraria and Kasba Amore in the District of Purnea. The evidence is that in Auraria thana the river is for the most part silted up, but there still remains in thana Kasba Amore a sufficient length of the river to cover a distance approximately of 20 miles as the crow flies and considerably more than that following the line of the river, which is a very winding one.

The actual collections received from this large estate amounted to Rs. 900 out of a rental of Rs. 1,200 odd. In addition to that there was a rental received from certain se-patanidars of Rs. 739. The rental payable for the estate which was a patni estate was Rs. 601. The actual realised income annually, therefore, from the property was over Rs. 1,000. It was sold for Rs. 2,500, a price which was obviously grossly inadequate, both having regard to the vast extent and promise of the property and having regard to the actual realisations from it.

In the sale proclamation there is no indication that the estate is of this magnitude. The estate is described merely by a tauzi number and a name, in fact the estate ran through as many as 138 villages. There is nothing to indicate this in the notification and the valuation stated in the sale proclamation is Rs. 2,500. It is inconceivable that the decree-holder could have thought such a valuation reasonable in the case of an estate of such magnitude, even though he may not have been aware what the actual income realised from the estate was. The Privy Council have held in the case of Saadatmand Khan v. Phul Kuar (1) that where an under-valuation of the property made in the sale proclamation is obviously a gross misrepresentation the sale will be set aside.

The learned Subordinate Judge in dismissing the application does not appear to have applied his mind to this question. It appeared to him to be necessary only to consider whether the property had been actually proclaimed for sale or not. To so decide the matter was to act in contravention of the principle laid down by the Privy Council in the case to which I have above referred. I am of opinion that the sale proclamation was materially irregular, both in the description of the property and in the valuation put on it, and for that reason alone we should be justified in setting the sale aside. I am confirmed in this view when I come to consider the manner in which the sale was proclaimed. In this long stretch of country 20 miles or more in length, there is one village containing some 30 or 40 houses called Basbeli in which there is a pool of 100 yards long and 150 yards broad. The evidence is that either upon the edge of the water here or upon the land by the side of the pool a notification proclaiming the sale was posted. I am not prepared to differ from the learned Subordinate Judge as to the question of fact whether this notification was actually posted there or not: but it is certainly on the evidence quite impossible to say whether the notification was actually posted on the estate, that is to say, in the water or not. It also seems impossible to say upon the evidence that there was any beating of drum in any village other than the village of Basbeli. It would be difficult to hold that this was a proper compliance with the law in an estate of this magnitude. The rule which is applied is that laid down upon the subject of attachment in rule 54 of Order XXI of the First Schedule of the Code of Civil Procedure, which requires "that the order shall be proclaimed at some place on or adjacent to such property by beat of drum or other customary mode and a copy of the order shall be affixed at some conspicuous part of the property." When the property consists of a right of fishing over a length of stream which may quite reasonably extend to some 30 or 40 miles it is not of course possible to say that any particular spot on that stream is a conspicuous part of the property. In such circumstances the principle of the rule must be applied and a copy of the order must be conspicuously displayed at various portions of the estate. I am of opinion that the principle of this rule has not been applied in the present case when a copy of the order was affixed in only one out of 138 villages. In addition, we think that it would have been certainly desirable in such a case to have adopted some other method of advertising the sale either in the local newspapers or in the Gazette. The result of the inadequate description of the property in the sale proclamation, the gross under-valuation and this perfunctory method of proclaiming the property was that nobody appeared at the sale to make any bid. The decree-holder was the sole bidder and purchased the property himself at Rs. 100 over the valuation which he had stated in the sale-proclamation. All that is required of us to find, in justifying the setting aside of the sale, is that on the facts we are of opinion that substantial injury has resulted; and on the facts even in this case I am entirely satisfied that there has been substantial injury. I am not deterred in setting aside the sale by the fact that on the day of sale the judgment-debtor tried to stay the sale by raising certain objections of want of jurisdiction, that the decree had been otherwise satisfied, without expressly raising any objection to the valuation of the property. I am also not deterred from decreeing this appeal by the fact that the other decree-holders were at the time applying for a rateable distribution and that they might have joined in the bidding. Finding as I do that the property was not sufficiently described, that it was grossly undervalued and that it was not properly proclaimed, I would allow the appeal and set aside the sale. The judgment-debtor is entitled to his costs.

JWALA PRASAD, J.—I agree.

Appeal allowed.

CALCUTTA HIGH COURT.

RULE No. 686 OF 1917.

January 25, 1918.

Present:—Mr. Justice Teunon and Mr. Justice Newbould.

THE CORPORATION OF CALCUTTA—PLAINTIFF—PETITIONER

Sreemati HEMANGINI DASSI WIDOW OF BROJA NATH BOSE AND OTHERS DEFENDANTS—OPPOSITE PARTIES.

Calcutta Municipal Act (III B. C. of 1899), ss. 299, 593—Notice, service of, on one of several co-owners of premises, validity of.

The service of a notice under section 299 of the Calcutta Municipal Act upon one of the co-owners of the property in the manner provided in section 593 is effectual against the other co-owners. [p. 414, col. 2.]

Rule against the order of the Small Cause Court Judge, Sealdah, in Suit No. 1202 of 1917.

FACTS of the case appear from the judgment.

Dr. Dwarkanath Mitter, for the Petitioner.—The learned Small Cause Court Judge fell into an error in reducing the Corporation's claim to the extent of one-half on the ground that there had been no proper service of notice on one of the two co-owners of the premises in question. The notice issued under section 299 of the Calcutta Municipal Act has been served in the manner provided in section 593 of the Act. The sections are quite clear that when there are several owners of the same premises notice may be served upon one of them. Reads sections 299, 593, 597.

Mr. S. N. Banerjee (with him Babu Probodh Kumar Das), for the Opposite Party.—The requisite notice had not been served in the manner provided in section 593 of the Act. Furthermore, the Chairman can issue the notice after obtaining sanction from the General Committee of the Corporation, but there is nothing on the record to show that such sanction or approval of the General Committee had been obtained by the Chairman prior to the issue of the notice. The notice, therefore, was bad in law.

Then, again, the Chairman can demand the costs of the work done by the Corporation if the owner himself was bound to do that work; the owner can be compelled to make connection with the Municipal drain only where such drain is situated within 100 feet from the premises. In this case as the Corporation has not shown the existence of such a drain within the requisite distance the defendant is not liable to pay the amount claimed.

Dr. Dwarkanath Mitter, in reply.

JUDGMENT.—In this case the petitioner is the Chairman of the Calcutta Corporation. He sued in the Small Cause Court at Sealdah to recover the sum of Rs. 325, being the cost of certain work done by him upon premises No. 45, Karaya Bazar Road, under the provisions of section 597 (2) of the Calcutta Municipal Act. The defendants in the suit were the two co-owners who hold, it appears, equal undivided shares in the property in question. One of those did not appear. The second appeared and pleaded that there had been no service upon her of the notice issued under the provisions of section 299 of the Act. The learned Small Cause Court Judge gave effect to this contention and dismissed the suit as against her and decreed the suit against defendant No. 1, upon whom notice had been admittedly served, to the extent of half the claim. Thereupon at the instance of the Chairman of the Corporation this Rule was issued upon both the defendants calling upon them to show cause why the claim of the plaintiff should not be decreed in full against both. As in the Court below, the first defendant does not appear. The second defendant appears and contends, first, that it has not been shown that there is a Municipal drain situated at a distance not exceeding 100 feet from the property, secondly, that it has not been shown that to the issue of this notice the Chairman had obtained the approval of the General Committee and lastly, that no attempt had been made to serve the prescribed notice upon her in the manner provided in section 593.

It is not contested that the work has not been done and it is not suggested that the claim made is unreasonable. With regard to the first two contentions, apart from any presumption that might possibly arise from the failure on the part of the owners to prefer any objection under the provisions of section 598 of the Act, it does not appear that these matters were in fact specifically pleaded in the written statement, and it is clear from the manner in which the case was conducted in the Trial Court that they were not put in issue in that Court. It is too late for the defendant to raise those questions now. With regard to the service of notice we find that as a matter of fact the notice addressed to the owner of the premises has been served upon the co-owner defendant No. 1 by delivery to a male member of her family. The provisions of the section to which we have just referred make it necessary for the Corporation in any such notice to name the owner, and the section further provides that when there are more owners than one, service may be effected upon any one of them. It would rather appear that the learned Small Cause Court Judge had overlooked the provisions of this section, and service upon one being effectual against the other it is clear that against both the defendants there should be a decree in full.

We accordingly make this Rule absolute and allow the plaintiff's claim in full against both the defendants with costs of the first Court against both, and also the costs of this Rule against No. 2. We assess the hearing fee at three gold mohurs.

Rule made absolute.

DORI LAL—PLAINTIFF—APPELLANT

Seth RAM CHARAN LAL—DEFENDANT—RESPONDENT.

Agra Tenancy Act (II of 1901), s. 164—Profits, suit for, against lambardar—Interest, when allowable—Accounts, falsification of, effect of—Lambardar, liability of.

In a suit by a co-sharer against the lambardar for his share of the profits, the lambardar is liable to pay interest on the amount of profits awarded to the co-sharer, where it is found that the lambardar has falsified the accounts. [p. 416, col. 1.]

Appeal from the decree of the District Judge, Sitapur, dated the 25th July 1916, modifying the order of the Deputy Collector, First Class, Kheri, dated the 25th April 1916.

Babu Ramapat Ram, for the Appellant.

Mr. P. C. Gupta, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is a second appeal arising out of a rent suit brought by the appellant against the respondent for the recovey of profits alleged to be due for the years 1320 to 1322 Fasli. The suit was decreed in part in the Court of first instance. The defendant appealed to the learned District Judge who reduced the amount which the first Court had allowed. The plaintiff now comes in second appeal to this Court and there are three points to be considered.

The first point is with regard to the plaintiff's claim in respect of what is called the sawai income of the village. The point taken in this respect is that the amount allowed to the appellant has been miscalculated by the lower Appellate Court. I have had some difficulty in following the judgment of the learned District Judge in this matter. In the statement of account filed along with the plaint the plaintiff had put down the sawai income of this village at Rs. 100 a year. The learned Judge in his judgment referring to the evidence of a kanungo, which is on the record, states that the sawai profits were estimated at Rs. 104-14-0 exclusive of nazrana and farighkhata. He also refers to a previous suit between the parties in which a Rent Court had held that the recurring sawai income was only Rs. 75 a year. He goes on to say that in the present case it was not shown that there was any special occasion during the years in suit on which nazrana was paid or that there was any farighkhata income. The Judge thought that no allowance in respect of these two items should be made and he then records his opinion that the amount of Rs. 104-14-0 is a fair estimate of the sawai income "of the three years." This is a matter in which I cannot follow the learned Judge of the Court below. He seems from what is said in an earlier part of his judgment to have accepted the kanungo's evidence and that evidence was to the effect that the income was Rs. 104 odd per annum, not Rs. 104 odd, for the whole three years. It seems to me therefore that there has been some mistake made in the calculation of the learned District Judge. If we take it that the sawai income was Rs. 104 odd a year and if we bear in mind that the plaintiff claimed Rs. 100 a year in this respect the proper amount allowable to him for three years was a sum of Rs. 50, that being the one-sixth share of this income to which he was entitled.

The next point made against the judgment of the learned Judge is that he has made a mistake in connection with the pay of a sipahi which was allowed to the defendant-respondent. This mistake is admitted by the learned Counsel for the respondent here. The Judge has deducted a sum of Rs. 48 from the amount allowed to the plaintiff. It appears that the plaintiff's share of expenses on this account only comes to Rs. 24 and not to Rs. 48.

The third point taken is that interest should have been allowed by the learned Judge. The learned Judge refused the claim for interest on the ground that there was no proof that any demand had been made from the defendant who is a lambardar, and that it had been decided that in such circumstances interest was not payable. I am not disposed to agree with him in this. Presumably the case which the learned Judge had in his mind was one reported as Mirza Sadik Husain Khan v Hafiz-ul-Rahman (1). There it was held by Mr. Spankie that interest should not be allowed against a lambardar, unless it was shown that he had wilfully withheld his accounts or had done any act which might make him equitably liable to pay interest. In the present case it seems to me quite clear from the evidence on the record which both Courts have accepted that the lambardar has falsified the accounts. He put his agent in the witness-box to swear that there was no sawai income in the village. There is abundant evidence on the record to show that this statement was a false statement and as I have said the learned Judge himself accepted the evidence of a kanungo in this respect. In these circumstances I do not think the lambardar can be heard to say that he is not liable to pay interest to the plaintiff. I make the account therefore out as follows:—

Rs. 176-5-6 due to the plaintiff on account of collections made by the lambardar. Rs. 50 as his share of the sawai income. Total Rs. 226-5-6. From this must be deducted Rs. 24 the plaintiff's share of the cost of entertaining a sipahi. Balance Rs. 202-5-6.

Interest will run upon this at the rate allowed by the first Court and at six per cent. from the date of this Court's decree. I may mention here that the learned Counsel for the appellant raised a new point in argument and asked that a larger sum than Rs. 176-5-6 should be allowed to the plaintiff. This was on the basis of a statement made by one of the patwaris examined in the case. This point was not explicitly taken in the memorandum of appeal and I do not think it can be entertained at the present stage.

The result, therefore, is that the appeal is allowed to the extent above indicated and the appellant is entitled to have his costs both here and in the Courts below from the respondent.

Appeal allowed
